The Week.

Home Rule Bill.

THE First Clause of the Home Rule Bill was adopted on July 6 by 316 votes to 224, after the closure had been applied. The closure was moved by Mr. Asquith and led to vigorous protests. There was a heated scene between Mr. Whitley, Chairman, and Captain Craig, and it was only on the intervention of Mr. Roger Law that the latter could be induced to resume his seat.

Meeting of Emperors.

REUTER wires from Baltic port.—The Tsar and family have arrived. The Kaiser also arrived at Baltic port.

The meeting of the Emperors and its possible results are the subject of much speculation in Germany.

The Kölnische Zeitung dismisses the suggestion that proposals will be made on the German side to end the Turco-Italian War and emphatically rejects the idea that Germany will attempt to thrust a wedge into the Triple Entente.

Germany, it says, only expects the confirmation of confidential relations between Russia and Germany, the foundations of which were laid at the Potsdam meeting.

The Russian Press is lukewarm. It is of opinion that there is no reason to anticipate that Britain and France will be disappointed at the result of the meeting.

Egypt.

THREE Nationalists have been arrested on a charge of conspiracy against the Khedive, Viscount Kitchener, and the Prime Minister.

Reuter wires from Cairo:—Another arrest has been made in connection with the conspiracy against the Khedive, Viscount Kitchener, and the Premier.

The conspiracy is regarded as a most serious one. Numerous documents have been seized. Two of the prisoners are prominent Nationalists.

Universities' Congress.

LORD ROSEBERY opened on the 2nd July the Congress of the Universities of the Empire. He said: "This is, perhaps, the most vitally important and striking of Congresses. To-day the Empire is belted round with Universities." Every great city, he said, regarded a University as a necessary appanage. Each had its own problems. He hoped the Congress would result in a permanent channel for inter-communication to solve these problems.

At the Government luncheon in honour of the delegates, fifty-two Universities were represented. Among those present were Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Harcourt, Lord Curzon, Lord Rosebery, the Earl of Norfolk, Sir Frederick Lugard, Lord Strathcona, and Lord Morley.

Earl Beauchamp presiding officially, welcomed the delegates.

Mr. Harcourt proposed "The Congress" which he welcomed as an "Imperial Conference of the brains of the Empire." He said that Universities in India, the Dominions, and the Colonies were the finest productions of these brains. There could be no nobler aim than the instruction of an Imperial race.

Earl Curzon and Mr. Balfour addressed the Congress of Universities of the Empire on the 2nd July.

Mr. Balfour inaugurated a discussion on the problem of University in the East in relation to moral ideals.

Sir Frederick Lugard read a paper in which he concluded: "Those teaching Orientals should adapt their methods to the requirements of the East instead of attempting to foist the Western system on the East."

Sir Theodore Morison said secular education in India had been a splendid success.

Dr. Ewing (Punjab), Sir Thomas Raleigh, the Hon'ble Mr. Sarvadhikary (Calcutta), and the Rev. Mr. Russell (Madras) also took part in the discussion.

Labour Unrest.

THE House of Commons by 254 votes to 188 has adopted a motion of Mr. O'Grady (Labour): "That it is desirable that the employers should meet the representatives of the men with a view to settlement of the strike in London." Mr. Asquith said that while the intervention of the Government was neither justifiable nor expedient, he considered that such a meeting was desirable, but he would not vote. Mr. Bonar Law thereupon moved a resolution approving the declaration of Mr. Asquith that the constitutional attitude of the Government should be one of complete neutrality. This motion was defeated by 260 votes to 215.

The West Ham Town Council has unanimously agreed that it is impossible to participate in the festivities on the occasion of Their Majesties' visit to the Dock, owing to the Dock strike.

Insurance Act.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE on 30th June addressed a demonstration of five thousand people at Woodford, where a dozen male suffragists were violently ejected and were attended by Ambulance men. Mr. Lloyd George denounced the cowardice of those engineering the opposition to the Insurance Bill. They were really starting a new anarchist movement and seemed to think that laws were devised to protect their property, privileges and sport and to keep the workers in order. It was a dangerous moment to teach such doctrines, and the teachers of them were so sowing a crop which they might reap in tears a few years hence. There was a bigger task in front of the Democracy than they had yet undertaken, namely, the freeing of the land from the shackles of feudalism. The Insurance Bill was but the beginning.

Cotton Growing

LORD CREWE on the 1st July received a deputation of English and Indian Members of the International Cotton Committee, who urged that they should receive the support of the Government of India for the extension of cotton-growing in India. Lord Crewe said he fully recognised the supreme importance of the subject. The Indian cultivator had shown striking adaptability to new methods. He said there were undoubtedly fears in some quarters in India with regard to the danger of cotton-growing competing with food crops and the Government of India have to consider those apprehensions though they might not be entirely well founded. With reference to the suggestions of improvement of the Government of India's agricultural statistics, Lord Crewe pointed out the difficulties arising from the conditions in India, but said he proposed to press the Government of India to make larger and more frequent returns. Lord Crewe said it had been suggested that the tenants along the irrigation canals should be required to grow a certain amount of cotton, as some were required to breed animals for Army Transport. The cases were not parallel. Animals were required for defence and tenants were assured of a market therefor. It was impossible to assure the market for cotton at a particular price. He was afraid that when there was a bumper American crop the cotton trade would not look at the Indian crop with the same favour. Lord Crewe said he had been much impressed with the advocacy of an additional European staff. The difficulty was the cost of a European staff and the lack of Indians suitably educated, but until there were enough Indians capable of undertaking the work, a few more Europeans might be appointed. He did not hesitate to say that there was nothing in the Indian character or intellect to prevent Indians doing this work quite as well as Europeans. He was glad that a number of young Indians were now turning their attention to industry, engineering and similar subjects in preference to literature. It was the desire of the Government of India to assign increasing amounts to the encouragement of different processes of agriculture. It was impossible to fix their minds entirely on cotton, but they were fully alive to its special importance. Lord Crewe concluded with the assurance that the points raised by the deputation would be submitted to the Government of India, and said that with regard to one or two of them he might suggest to the Government of India to do what it could to meet the views of the Deputation.

South Africa.

MR. LYTTELTON on the 26th June called attention to the Bill introduced into the Union Parliament by the Premier's Secretary regulating the holding of lands by natives and described it as tantamount to the introduction of forced labour. He understood that the Bill had been dropped, but said that if it represented the policy of the Union Government, then he pressed Mr. Harcourt to use his diplomatic influence to impress on the Union what he believed was the unanimous opinion of the House, and also the consequences, which would be either a native rising with which the British garrison would have to deal, a trek into towns or an exodus from the Union increasing the shortage of labour.

Mr. Harcourt said that if Mr. Lyttelton's fears were correct regarding the consequences of the Union Bill, the land-holding natives might be quite sure that the Union Government would act rightly in the matter uninfluenced by Mr. Harcourt. It was a matter entirely within the competence of the Union Government. Nobody knew better than Mr. Lyttelton the caution it was necessary to exercise in interfering with self-governing dominions.

General Botha delivered an outspoken speech at Riverside on the 29th June. He strongly deprecated certain private members' speeches in reference to South African affairs, especially natives affairs, in the Imperial Parliament, since people in other parts of the world could not realise the effect which such remarks had on the people of South Africa. The Union Parliament was the only place where the grievances of South Africa should be submitted and heard.

Afghanistan.

News received from Khost is to the effect that the Afghan General Abdul Aziz Khan is still interviewing the elders of Mangals, and Jadrans. He has received several jirgahs and made the Headmen swear on the Koran to be loyal to the Amir. Posts which were destroyed by rebellious tribesmen are being rebuilt and the Fort at Matun is to be strengthened. More Afghan troops are said to be entering the valley to secure the complete submission of all concerned in the recent rising.

The Englishman's correspondent wiring on the 26th June says:—The Amir has ordered that the movable and immovable property of Jehandad Khan, who had fled to British territory, be confiscated and that his sons be kept in Kabul till his return to Afghanistan. Naib Salar Syed Shah Khan is at Shanwar ilaka settling the arrears of the Military Regiments accounts. The Amir has ordered Colonel Wali Ahmad Khan to be transferred to Hazarajat country from Asmar and Muhammad Sarwar Khan Logari from Kabul to Asmar in his place. Our Jellalabad correspondent writes that by the order of the Amir a small pamphlet has been published in the Persian and Pushto languages which will be delivered to the Mullahs throughout Afghanistan for them to preach among the people the Ayats of the Koran and show plainly that it is the duty of each and every Muhammadan who believes the Koran to be a sacred and holy book to be loyal to the King of Islam. The pamphlet is named "Nasayd-Namcha." Sardar Nasrullah Khan has sent instructions to Colonel Abdul Aziz Khan at Khost regarding the arrangement of the country, to select from each and every tribe two old men as Jirgah to sit with the Hakim of every town and settle civil and military cases; to send some old Raisis from Mangal and Jadran tribes to Kabul as Jirgah to the Amir; to keep in each and every town in Khost ilaka a box to receive applications addressed to the Amir and each Hakim is instructed to clear the box and send the contents to the Amir at Kabul.

The Amir now has some three thousand troops and tribal levies in Khost, but the position is still far from anything like what can be regarded from his point of view as a satisfactory settlement. It is true that the Mangals are negotiating, but they are demanding practical independence of Afghanistan as the price of consenting to pay what amounts to little more than a nominal tribute to the Amir's Government. The Afghan General may endeavour to patch up an understanding on this basis, but it is not likely to last for long.

The Pioneer says that during the recent rebellion in the Khost Valley it is now clearly established that none of the really powerful sections of the Ghilzais showed any desire to join the Mangals. Jahandad Khan had only a small personal following and he fled into British territory after a very short stay with the rebels. The Suleiman Khel and Ghilzais of the south never moved a single man and their abstention from joining in the quarrel probably disheartened the Mangals and Khostwals generally. It is now reported from Kabul that the ex-Governor of Khost, whose misgovernment brought about the rebellion, has been imprisoned by the Amir, pending an enquiry into his administration of the province. The rebels began to disperse as soon as Shahgassi, in obedience to orders from Kabul, had left Khost and their Jirgahs are now engaged in amicable negotiations with the Afghan authorities.

China.

A MESSAGE to the Times from Peking denies reports of probable conflict between North and South. The Cantonese in Peking ridicule the idea of a secession. The disbandment of troops continues steadily in many centres. Remittances are being increasingly forwarded to Peking from the Provinces for the expenses of Government.

There has been no fresh news from Kashgaria and it is not known yet what attitude the Peking Government has taken up regarding the future control of Chinese Turkestan as a whole.

Reuter wires from Peking:—Luchenghsiang, the Foreign Minister, has been appointed Premier and the Assembly has endorsed the appointment by 74 votes to 10.

Tibet.

REUTER wires from Chengtu:—The garrison of Lamaya has returned to Litang, which town is menaced by three thousand mounted Tibetans.

Serious dissensions exist among high officials at Litang. The soldiers have retreated to Hokow, loosing heavily. The situation at Batang is reported to be perilous.

A Kalimpong message, dated 29th, June says:—The Dalai Lama arrived in Chumbi yesterday. Now that he has re-entered Tibet another chapter in the life story of this extraordinary personage is closed and a new one begun. Whether this new one will be as stormy and chequered as the previous chapters in his life remains to be seen. There is a strong feeling here that he will have to indulge in another "Hejira" before very long.

There is a rumour current at Kalimpong that the Dalai Lama's favourite minister (who displayed such energy in the recent fighting) has been murdered by jealous Lamas. I hear that the Dalai Lama makes a long halt at Sam Ding ("soaring meditation") monastery, one of the most famous nunneries in Tibet, and the abode of the "pig-headed abbess" Dorje Pagmo ("the thunderbolt sow"). She belongs to the Ningmapa sect, but receives divine honours from Lamas of all sects. An amusing legend relates how one of her predecessors saved the monastery by transforming herself and seventy nuns into pigs. Being a famous defender of Buddhism, the Dalai Lama probably has engaged her services for special ponjas against the Chinese. Sam Ding is only four marches from Lhasa.

The bazar dogs in Lhasa have become so bold and ferocious through feeding on the slain left lying on the streets that they attack people who dare to venture out of doors at night.

The number of high Tibetan officials murdered for their pro-Chinese sympathies is now said to be fifteen. Many of them were tortured. The abbot of Tengeling monastery was crucified and tortured so long as any signs of life remained.

Gulf Gun-Runners.

THE efforts of the Government to control illicit traffic in arms in the Persian Gulf have, according to Reuter's Agency, resulted in an undertaking by the Sultan of Muscat—the headquarters of the trade—that no arms shall in future be issued without a licence. If these regulations are enforced there will be an end to a traffic which has been of the greatest danger to the frontier of India and a cause of great expense to the Indian Government.

The Haj.

THE following communiqué has been issued:—Pilgrims for the Hedjaz are advised that in view of the difficulties in provisioning Camaran caused by the Italian operations they should carry with them sufficient supplies of sound provisions such as will keep good at least till they reach the Hedjaz. Provisions unfit for food will as in the past be destroyed by the Lazaret authorities at Camaran.

Behar Executive Council.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING-EMPEROR has been pleased to approve of the appointment of the following gentlemen to be members of the Executive Council of the Lieutenant-Governor of Behar and Orissa:—Mr. E. A. Gait, Mr. E. V. Levinge and Maharaja Bahadur Sir Rameshwara Singh Bahadur of Durbhanga.

Mr. Justice Karamat Hussain.

MR. JUSTICE KARAMAT HUSSAIN sat for the last time as a Judge of the Allahabad High Court on the 29th June. Before leaving, the retiring Judge sat with all the Judges on the Bench, and Mr. Wallach, on behalf of the barristers, and Pundit Sunder Lall, on behalf of the vakils, addressed the Judge and wished him long life and health in his retirement. Presentations of a silver bowl and a silver inkstand were made by the barristers and vakils, respectively.

Women I.M.S.

IN THE House of Commons, in reply to Mr. Johnson-Hicks, it was stated the Government of India has now collected information for which it has been waiting with reference to the scheme for a Women's Indian Medical Service and that it will deal with the matter without avoidable delay.

Aga Khan's Candidature.

REUTER learns that His Highness the Aga Khan has consented to stand as the Bombay Muhammadan representative at the ensuing election to the Viceregal Legislature.

An Indian's Success.

THE Mechanical Sciences Tripos, which was published at Cambridge in mail week, was notable for the success of Inayatullah Khan, who, although only placed in the second class, is believed to be the first man to take honours in four different Triposes. After being bracketed 27th Wrangler in 1909, he obtained a first class in the Oriental Languages Tripos and a third class in the natural Sciences Tripos two years later. He must be placed in the front rank of Indians who have been educated in this country.

R. P. Paranjpye and A. T. Rajan were both bracketed Senior Wranglers, and S. A. Majid, a lineal descendant of Mahomed the Prophet, passed both parts of the Law Tripos and Oriental Languages tripos.

The nine candidates placed in the first class of the Mechanical Sciences Tripos include Mr. E. L. Kidd, this year's Cambridge cricket captain.

New Delhi.

THE town-planning experts submitted their full report last week which, it is understood, has been accepted by the Government of India. The report will be sent home this week for approval by the Secretary of State.

It is understood that arrangements are under consideration with a view to the provision to be made at the new capital for the educational needs of children, European and Indian, of the Government of India staffs. Statistics are in the first instance to be collected of the number of children for whom the necessary measures will have to be undertaken at Delhi, where existing educational institutions are but few, and inadequate for the condition of affairs, which will hereafter arise at the new capital.

TETE À TETE

WE HAVE received by the last mail through the Bank of Bengal a receipt from the Société du Croissant Rouge, Turkish Relief Fund. Ottoman, for £600, which we had remitted as our second instalment of the Turkish Relief Fund. We have thus been able to send £1,000 up to this time for the relief of the war sufferers, and we hope we will very shortly be in a position to send another remittance of at least £500. We have hitherto been receiving voluntary contributions from all over India to the Fund and we trust the Moslem public will continue to send material help with the same enthusiasm to those who are trying to mitigate the sufferings of their brethren caused by an unrighteous war. Elsewhere we publish an appeal for subscription sent to us by the British Red Crescent Society, London. We also reproduced in our last issue some other appeals which recently appeared in the British press on behalf of the starving Arabs of Tripoli. The tale of misery and wretchedness they disclose is harrowing in the extreme, and we think there is not a single Moslem whose heart will not go out in pity and grief to his brethren in distress. We therefore appeal to the sense of generosity and fellow feeling of the Indian Moslems and earnestly hope that their response to the call of duty, humanity and faith will be ungrudging. The extent of actual want and suffering will be realised by a perusal of the letter which has been sent to us by Mr. F. C. Dixon-Johnson, the Director of the British Red Crescent Mission in Tripoli. He writes: "I have recently returned from Tripoli where the hospital sent out by the British Red Crescent Society is doing good work, not only for the sick and wounded Ottoman soldiers, but also the native population. The thousands of women and children refugees who have fled inland from the coast oases are suffering terribly from hunger and exposure. They have little clothing and no shelter and the nights are often very cold. The Turkish military authorities assist these people so far as they are able: at Azizia every day a little flour and oil is given out to each, but it is very insufficient and soon some of these poor wretches become too weak to attend the daily distribution. Further assistance is most urgently needed and as I am returning again in a very short time I shall be glad to take charge of any funds that are subscribed. All subscriptions should be sent to—Tripoli Famine Fund, British Red Crescent Society, Coutt's Bank, Strand, London. I feel certain that if your readers saw what I have seen not one would neglect to help. The details are too horrible to write about; to appreciate suffering it is necessary to see it. Whether our sympathies are with the Turk or the Italian it is our duty to help these innocent victims. Britain rightly appreciated those splendid men who sacrificed themselves to save the women and children on the Titanic; everyone of your readers can do something to save the women and children in Tripoli. There is an Arabian proverb which says 'It is a thousandfold better to give away your own dinner than that a hungry man should stand at the doorway'."

The figures of the Law Examination results recently published by the Allahabad University afford a very instructive reading. No less than 479 candidates appeared in the Previous Examination of Law out of which 316 were successful. And no less than 133 candidates passed the test for the L.L.B.

Degree out of a total of 239. The number of graduates qualifying themselves for the legal profession is enormously on the increase. The increase is in some respects decidedly alarming. The total number of those who have passed B. A. this year is 359. The comparison of the figures for the degree of the Bachelor of Arts and for the Law (Previous) has a grave significance. In plain language it means that only a microscopic minority of the finished products of the University goes out of the profession of Law to seek livelihood in other fields of activity. While we welcome the growth of the lawyer class in Indian society, we confess we cannot conceal our alarm at the fast pace at which it is multiplying. It means the starving of many other more important functions of society. The lawyer as a class is economically not very productive, and, however useful he may be in the adjustment of social relations, his ultimate value in the sum of things depends only on his proportionate representation in the body social. The scope of career for the Indian graduates is no doubt restricted, but new openings can be created if our graduates displayed greater grit of character, initiative and enterprise. Incidentally it also shows that the prospects of service under the Government are none too attractive for educated young Indians, though we recognise that some of the Law graduates never practise and secure a Law Degree to improve their chances of obtaining a post in the administration.

When Russia first divulged to the world the big project of the Trans-Persian Railway, after she had secured an easy consent from the British Foreign Office, the British public was lost in admiration of the audacity of the undertaking, and very few publicists grasped its strategic and political significance. Very soon, however, the glamour of the bold conception melted into space and the scheme began to look as ugly and ominous as the Russian motives behind it. The Liberal Press in England is now uniformly ranged against it, and many eminent journalists of Conservative leanings have also sounded a shrill note of alarm. The Military Correspondent of the Times came out rather tardily the other day with grave doubts and apprehensions, though the Times itself is as yet too deeply enamoured of the Muscovite blandishments to view the project in its true perspective. Sir Edward Grey had, as usual, committed himself before the House of Commons could have had its say in the matter; and now that the opposition is gaining in strength and volume, he is, as usual, proving himself very resourceful in apologies. Whether the well-founded protests and alarms of the critics of the proposed railway will have any effect is rather doubtful. The formal decision to participate in the project has already been announced by the Imperial Government and it is very unlikely that Muscovite diplomacy will allow Sir Edward Grey to wriggle out of the tight situation. Our wonder, however, is that the process of eye-opening has been so slow. The British stake in the Middle East problem is the heaviest, yet British diplomacy was never so halting, haphazard and short-sighted as it is to-day.

Last year's report on the condition and management of the jails in the United Provinces is just to hand. We cannot say that it is very pleasant reading. Several points are raised by the officiating Inspector-General which call for early consideration by the Government. We note in particular the great inadequacy of the Aid to Discharged Prisoners' Fund. The sum approximately allotted works out to Re. 1 per head. This, even, by the Inspector-General's admission "is barely sufficient to enable the discharged prisoners to reach their homes"—to say nothing of leaving some balance on the strength of which they might try to turn over a new leaf and start an honourable life. "The difficulties of the destitute prisoners on release," continues Colonel Henderson, "scarcely need to be mentioned, and it cannot be wondered, however good their intentions may be, that they sometimes fall through dire necessity." This is the language of the officer in charge of the Department himself, and it discloses a state of affairs which, to say the least of it, is reprehensible. We believe that not the least important function of the jail department is to exercise a reformatory influence on the character of the inmates. As it is, the distress that a released prisoner would suffer (under the circumstances, would only tend to perpetuate—nay, accentuate—the morbid proclivities of perverse natures. It has been proved beyond doubt that the new convict is by no means an absolutely lost creature and that he may be yet reclaimed to serve his community according to the measure of his capacity and opportunities. What we would particularly warn the Government about is that the jail bird when he sinks into the gutter again after his first sentence is alike a more dangerous and a more intractable creature. It would, therefore, be a dark blot on the system of British justice if the jails only ended in making the culprit a more fearless and practised desperado. We confidently hope that now that the attention of the Government has been drawn towards this outstanding defect of jail administration by the Inspector-General himself, the authorities will take early steps to remedy the evil. There is very little else in the report which calls for particular notice. The number of prisoners is a factor dominated by so many diverse influences that it can scarcely be an index to the morality of the people. The Coronation and the good harvest, for example, would naturally combine to produce a decrease, so that we have no reason for gratification in the 37 per cent. fall in the number of prisoners. We are glad to see that the number of deaths has decreased this year and the general health of the patients is very good. The expenditure of guarding and maintaining the prisoners has decreased, and while we do not think this is quite the line along which any great economy should be practised, we are glad that the slight curtailment has partly been the result of increased earnings by the jail factories, and has not been secured at the sacrifice of efficiency in the guarding staff, which—particularly the Indian section—seems to have done excellent work.

We have drawn the attention of the Government time and again to the defects of the system now Declined with Thanks. obtaining of bestowing titles and rewards.

We have never quarrelled with the basic principle of allotting the titles to meritorious gentlemen who have made themselves prominent in the eyes of the bureaucracy by rendering some remarkable Service to the State or by public philanthropy. What is open to question is how far this unimpeachable principle is adhered to in practice. It is a notorious fact that the bestowal of these titles hinges more on the recommendations of the officials than on the position the recipients have attained in the estimation of the public. This system has naturally resulted in a disreputable scrimmage for Khan Bahadurships, and Rai Bahadurships, not by establishing a claim to it by serving the true interests of the public but by adopting means not always above suspicion. True, excuses can be found both for the recipients and the recommending officials. The one succumbs to the great weakness even of the greatest minds—a soul-hunger for fame—the other is after all a man with all the natal imperfections of human nature; and we would be far too exacting if we expected him to be absolutely proof against adulation. But the fact remains that the system now in force has discredited these titles in the public esteem to a degree which cannot by a long way be to the best interests of the recipients or of the State. Far be it from us to deny that amid the galaxy of titleholders there have always been some people who, to quote the words of the late Moulana Nazir Ahmad, I.L.D., brought more honour to the titles than the titles brought to them. But the conviction has of late been gaining ground with the public—and, we are inclined to believe, not wholly without some justification—that these orders and ribbons are badges not of true worth but of proficiency in the arts of dancing attendance on the officials, of laying conscience comfortably to sleep on all those occasions on which the procedure adopted by the Government runs counter to the interests of the public, of being ultra-cautious in the matter of warning the bureaucracy of the evil effects of any blunders it might be disposed to commit—in short of sinking into subservience whenever there is the least suspicion that by asserting themselves in the advocacy of the cause righteous they would be risking the displeasure of the Calattar Sahab, not to mention higher dignitaries. Of late this suspicion in the public mind of the real merits of titleholders has reached such an acute stage that gentlemen of undoubted ability and high standing, who set a proper value on the opinion of the public and are even ready to sacrifice to it the hitherto irresistible charm of official preferment, have been constrained to decline the titles which the Government had conferred on them as a rather tardy recognition of their selfless activities in public life. The most recent of such cases are those of Babu S. C. Sarvadhikary, the editor of the Hindu Patriot and of Maulvie Karamat Hossain Sahab of Arrah, in Behar. We submit that the bureaucracy owes it as much to its own prestige as to the dignity of the titles and the interests of the recipients to give an early consideration to this matter. It is an open secret that the promotions that are now available for the Indian servants of Government are anything but an adequate recompense for really deserving service; and not unoften the Government has to fall back upon the auxiliary reward of recompensing life of incessant activity by awarding titles and badges. Thus whatever reduces the value of these titles in the public eye necessarily weakens their incentive to earnest endeavour. We fail to see the logic of the Government systematically forgetting to consult the views of the would-be recipients before finally gazetting the award of the titles. Such prior consultation is quite as indispensable for saving the face of the Government as for protecting deserving Indians in the Government Service from the odium in which many non-Official Khan Bahadurs and Rai Bahadurs have involved these titles.

Nonoy can deny that although titles and rewards are not a very infallible criterion of true worth, still on many occasions—and we sincerely hope these will be more frequent—a sympathetic and able official recognises the worth of a quiet and earnest worker by recommending him for the due reward of his merit. Thus, we believe, is more often the case with the lately instituted Imperial Service Order and Medals, than with the antiquated Khan Bahadurships and Rai Bahadurships. And though we are disposed to believe that these orders and medals are not as constantly operative a stimulus as the permanent social advancement of a titleholder, still we congratulate the Government on its wisdom in determining—as it seems to have done—to establish the prestige and, in the public eye, the purity of these new decorations by bestowing them on those who are really deserving and are universally respected among its servants,—quite irrespective of colour, rank or creed. One of the quietest of these quiet workers is Mr. Khan Abdul Majid Khan, Inspector of Co-operative Credit Societies in the district of Jullandhur. The sustained endeavours of this worthy officer for the betterment of the condition of the poor agriculturists of his district have just been rewarded by the bestowal of the Silver Medal of the Kaiser-i-Hind. We heartily congratulate the Khan on this public and official recognition of his earnest labour in such a good cause; and many of our readers will discover particular reason for jubilation in the fact that the Khan is the popular late Football Captain, and a prominent Old Boy of Aligarh. That the establishing of these Co-operative Credit Societies all over India is one of the most prominently beneficent acts of a benign Government is a fact, which we take it, has long past the controversial stage. We believe it is accepted on all hands that it is ultimately destined to prove the salvation of the Indian rural community. Alike for the educative, the disciplinary and the constructive side of its usefulness the system has already established itself too firmly in the confidence of the public to need any further advocacy. And the fact that even within such an incredibly short space of time it has attained the catching tendency of a prairie fire and that even in the most backward provinces the number of these Societies, their membership and their capital is doubling itself year after year is ample enough demonstration of the public appreciation of their indubitable merits. In the Punjab these Societies have come more prominently to the fore than perhaps anywhere else. The Land Alienation Act, though rightly intended to save the landed agriculturists from utter annihilation, was likely to destroy credit by destroying the exchange value of land, which has been almost the sole security of agrarian classes in all ages and all climes. No agricultural community in any part of the world has ever been above the need of credit, and as in India particularly the grinding poverty, the notorious improvidence, the variable character of harvests and, more than anything else, the prevailing ignorance and consequent lack of corporate action among the agriculturists, have made credit the mainstay of the cultivating population, the prospects of the land-owning classes with a restricted ownership of land and shattered credit seemed to be conducive to the darkest pessimism. But the establishment of the Co-operative Credit Societies proved their salvation by making available to them a system of credit which, while possessing all the benefits of facility, tended at the same time to minimise, if not preclude, the possibility of the worst abuses of facile credit. When Mr. Abdul Majid Khan was first put in official charge of the Jullandhur Societies in 1908 there were only 56 co-operative banks within his jurisdiction. In 1910 their number rose to 197 and in 1912 it stands at 400. The membership of these Societies was confined to 4,000 in 1908 and now the number has swelled to 26,000. Nor has the increase in the capital of the Societies been less remarkable. The total capital available has multiplied itself five-fold during the régime of Mr. Abdul Majid Khan and has increased from Rs. 4,00,000 in 1908 to approximately Rs. 20,00,000 at the present moment. In fact the progress made is so satisfactory that the Society authorities of this district have found themselves in a position to extend the scope of the usefulness of their Society all over the Punjab, and have given advances to banks in such far off districts as Umballa, Karnal, Grudaspur, Sialkot, Gujranwala and even those of the Provincial capital—Lahore. Nor has the educative influence of these banks and their effect in checking the growing craze for litigation, which is sapping the resources of the country, been less apparent. The District Judge of Jullandhur himself observed in his annual report that these banks are responsible for a decrease of 1,100 in the number of cases which have come up to the Court during the year under review in comparison with the previous year. Besides, the Societies are not limiting their activities to the department of credit, but have even so early as this begun to branch out into those other departments of co-operation: co-operative stores, co-operative purchasing and co-operative sale agencies without which the co-operative movement cannot attain its full fruition. The Khan has also assured the future prospects of the Society by enlisting both the official and the public sympathy in the cause. All the higher Government officials now make it a point to scrutinise particularly the development of the Co-operative Societies in all the districts they tour in and to encourage and foster their uninterrupted development by all the means in their power.

The leisured classes too are now taking a lively interest in the establishment of these institutions and are largely responsible for their flourishing condition. And all this progress has been achieved in face of all that stubborn opposition by the interested and by no means impotent class of Bunnias, against which Society officers have always had to battle in India, to say nothing of the thousand and one obstructions which such a movement is naturally doomed to encounter in a country with no tradition of corporate endeavour beyond the narrow limits of the village community, with a past history by no means conducive to a growth of credit and an outstanding national trait of blind conservatism and stolid imperviousness to the leaven of new ideas. Surely this is a record of which any patriotic Indian official or non-official might well be proud. And we congratulate the Jullandhur public and the district administration on having a zemindar and an officer of Mr. Abdul Majed Khan's calibre in their midst.

Verse.

Ad Aethera.

The star-crowned beauty of this glorious night
Doth make the earth-imprisoned spirit long
To soar on fiery pinions swift and strong
Into the regions of eternal light ;
To gain the constellations burning bright,
To catch the burden of the mystic song
Hummed by the planets as they whirl along
Their destined course upon th' empyreal height !
That deathless melody the soul hath known
Ere mortal birth, when, wafted on the wings
Of Love Divine, it ranged the glittering Zone,
And mingled with the unseen choir that sing
Its hymns of triumph round the Eternal throne
Of Life and Light, whence all Creation springs.

The Comrade.

Some War Publications.*

OF MORE general interest than the other two publications, Mr. Bennett's book deals with many aspects of the war as they presented themselves to an observant man of culture. He has a great admiration for the Turk, and especially for the Young Turk, but it does not appear to be the result of any special predilection of long standing in favour of the Ottomans. He certainly started with sympathy for the Turks in a wholly unprovoked war, but whatever predilection he now has for the Turks is entirely an acquired one and the result of his own observations during the few weeks that he spent in Tripoli. The time has been a very trying one, and the character of the Turks has been well tested by the rigours of the war ; it is therefore unlikely that Mr. Bennett has set too high a value on the soldiers of Turkey. It goes without saying that Mr. Bennett is an admirer of the courage of Turkish soldiers. He refers to their poor equipment during the Cretan insurrections of 1898 when he saw the Turkish troops, and adds that, if the Turkish soldiers were unkempt 14 years ago in Crete, they present even a stranger spectacle in Tripoli to-day. "Most of the soldiers," he writes, "wore bedraggled suits of khaki serge or drill, and many of them had bluish-grey great-coats ; but their garments were torn in every direction, buttons and shoulder-straps were missing, and nothing remained of some of their boots except the soles. Nevertheless, one could travel all over the wide world and find no better soldiers than these ragged regiments—'Si patients, si braves, mais, monsieur, il n'y a pas de l'argent' (so patient, so brave ; but, sir, he has no money), as an old captain once remarked to me in the evil days of the old régime." After this he adds, "The more I see Ottoman troops in various parts of the world, the more I realize their value, and I am convinced that under their new and improved conditions they have few equals. The French are admirable fighters, but they are sometimes too elated by success and unduly depressed by failure. The Turk is a happy mean between these two extremes. He is never boastful, but during the present campaign against immensely superior forces, the Turkish regulars, officers and men alike, have displayed acts of almost incredible coolness and courage. On the other hand, he endures reverses, small or great, with admirable fortitude." He is an eye-witness of the retirement of the small forces at Ain Zara when General Peccori's division, 15,000 strong, menaced their flank. "The regulars," he says, "marched away in a most leisurely fashion without any sign of apprehension as to possible attacks by the enemy's cavalry." But he adds that, perhaps, by that time, they had got to know the Italians and estimate them at their true fighting value ! There is one feature of the Turkish army which struck him as remarkable, and that was the excellent feeling which subsisted between all ranks. "The discipline is," he says, "admirable, and I have never detected any trace of undue familiarity, but officers and men are bound together by ties of real affection and mutual respect."

Mr. Bennett's remarks about Turkish officers are, if anything, even more complimentary. He observes that it was the fashion in the days of the Russo-Turkish war to decry the Turkish officers while according just praise to the gallant soldiers of Suleiman Pasha, Mukhtar Pasha and Osman Pasha. "But if," writes

1. * The Turkish-Italian War and its Problems by Sir Thomas Barclay. (London : Constable and Co., Ltd., Rs. 4-6.)

2. Italian Warfare in Tripoli and Moslem Feeling in India (W. Speaight and Soas, Fetter Lane, London, As. 8.)

3. With the Turks in Tripoli by Ernest N. Bennett. (London : Methuen and Co., Ltd., Rs. 3.)

Mr. Bennett, "general charges of inefficiency and worse were justified in 1878, it is perfectly clear that the Turkish officers of to-day, the men who have passed through the Harbia College and have seen service in Thessaly, Crete and Macedonia, and that scene of incessant conflict, the Yemen, are efficient soldiers, keen about their profession and thoroughly in sympathy with their men. As to their social qualities, go where you will over the wide world, and you will find nobody so kind, courteous and considerate, nobody who better deserves the name of 'gentleman' than the Turkish officer." He acknowledges his deep sense of obligation to good friends and comrades amongst the Turkish officers, and from various incidents during his journey to the seat of war and his sojourn there, it is clear that he has not exaggerated the virtues of the Turks out of excessive gratitude. He, of course, made it a rule from the start in this campaign to cause as little trouble as he possibly could to the Turkish Staff. As he says, "when one saw the cruel difficulties under which these gallant soldiers held their own, and experienced every form of personal kindness and hospitality at their hands, it would indeed have been an outrage to make unreasonable demands." Nevertheless, the Turkish officers went out of their way to make Mr. Bennett comfortable and suffered a good deal themselves in their efforts to secure his comfort and convenience. But this was nothing peculiar to the case of Mr. Bennett. The following extract illustrates the kindly disposition of the Turks admirably:—

One of the correspondents who arrived a week earlier than myself had been lent a horse by the Staff and had "stuck to it," and another had been lent a military bell-tent by the Commandant at Zuara. I do not for a moment criticize either of these gentlemen for their possession of the horse or the tent—they were friends of mine and of Turkey too. I will only say that they were lucky to find a Staff which would provide such requisites. No other army in the world would dream of equipping correspondents in these respects gratis. All that a correspondent can reasonably expect from an army to which he is formally attached is the ordinary food rations. As to liberty of action, the Press representatives were permitted to do practically what they liked, although the vast extent of the area covered by the defensive forces and the difficulties of transport over sandy tracts, rendered it difficult to see as much of the operations as one would have liked. Take one more example of Turkish generosity. In the camp at Azizieh was a gentleman, a British subject, but a Levantine by birth, who had arrived without any regular credentials from a newspaper, but with the express intention of "writing a book." He was a man of real ability and considerable information derived from life and troubles in India and the nearer East, but absolutely devoid of all campaigning experience and without the most elementary knowledge of military affairs. Despite the fact that he was known to have severely attacked the policy of the actual party to which Fethi Bey is a devoted adherent, this gentleman was shown every courtesy by the Chief of the Staff and even permitted to visit the lines of the Turkish Defence. I do not blame him for availing himself of his opportunities. I feel sure he would not abuse them. At the same time I congratulate him on his good fortune in discovering so facile and complaisant a Staff as that of the Azizieh headquarters. He may rest assured that nowhere else in the civilized world would an ordinary journalist, unattached to an army by any formal credentials as the Press representative, be permitted to loam at will in the theatre of war—to arrive when he likes and depart when he likes: And I am bound to add that, in the eyes of anyone accustomed to the conditions of service in modern warfare, the complaisant attitude assumed by the Turkish Staff towards visitors ad extra appeared to extend beyond the limits of reasonable courtesy and pass into the category of a tolerance altogether quixotic and preposterous.

When Mr. Bennett comes to deal with the Arabs, the picture is not uniformly complimentary. He acknowledges the patriotism of the Arabs and ridicules the stories which Italian newspapers have spread that the Arabs are fighting only because compelled by the Turks. "Compulsion indeed! Apart from the numerical proportion of Turks and Arabs, a glance at the faces of these Arabs when the word 'Italiano' is mentioned is enough to disabuse any writer's mind of this belief." At another place he remarks that Turkey is faced with the question—Will the Arabs remain faithful? And his answer is full of assurance.

There are certainly no signs of any defection at present. At the time of the great rains in November the loyalty of the Arabs round Tripoli was put to a severe test. The rainfall for 1908-9-10 had been miserably inadequate and the utter failure of the harvests had caused many Arabs to migrate into Tunis in order to escape starvation. And so when the beneficent rain descended in full measure, the husbandmen were miles away from their little fields. Some few returned for a time to their farms, but the vast majority placed patriotism before pocket and remained at their posts even at the risk of subsequent starvation for themselves and their families.

He is amazed at their physical courage and mentions the case of wounded Arabs absolutely refusing chloroform for their operations.

Men calmly submitted to the amputation of arms and legs without any anæsthetic, a thing almost incredible to Europeans, more susceptible to mental and physical tortures. A poor Arab woman who was operated upon for the removal of an Italian bullet from her side endured the pain of the deep incision and a prolonged operation without chloroform and without tears.

At another place he writes:—

The amount of battering these water-drinking Arabs and Turks will stand, before they succumb, is astonishing. One Arab walked 28 miles to Azizieh from the firing line with seven bullet wounds in him, and, after treatment, refusing to be sent to the big base hospital at Gharian, insisted on returning to the front!

Describing his journey to the Turkish headquarters he says:—

As we reached Bir Terin, our bivouac for the night, the gleaming searchlight of an Italian cruiser swept over the desert and caught our little caravan in the arc of its faint radiance. The sight of the poor Arabs silhouetted against the electric rays saddened me. Searchlights, Maxims, batteries, warships, aeroplanes—the odds seemed so terrible! But these sons of the desert, with their rags and their rifles, have, after all, the essential quality—they are not afraid to die. With anything like equality in military equipment, I doubt if any European troops could stand against these Arabs.

In addition to courage and stamina, the Arab is acknowledged by the writer to be "one of the most mobile of fighting men." "He slings his rifle over his shoulder, carries his cartridges in the folds of his jibbah, can live contentedly on barley bread, a few dates, and a little water, and, finally, can carry out marches of almost incredible length without fatigue."

But here, according to Mr. Bennett, the Arab's virtues end. He is impetuous and reckless. An ever-present terror in camp arises from "the incessant firing of their rifles by the Arabs." "They handled their Mausers," writes Mr. Bennett, "like children with new toys, and directly after cleaning the barrels fired off a cartridge (which of course helped to dirty the rifle again) in order to see if their precious gun was in good order." This led to many accidents, and when Mr. Bennett complained of this wild and dangerous waste of ball cartridges—they even aimed at birds with ball cartridge—to the medical staff and other officers, they only shrugged their shoulders and said it was "impossible to control or discipline these Arabs." As in modern warfare there is not so much of the headlong rush and the "forlorn hope", the absence of fire control and the existence of excessive impetuosity takes a good deal away from the military value of the Arabs.

But even these intractable irregulars have become tractable under the commandant at Zuara, Bimbashi (Major) Mahomed Musa Bey. He comes from the Yemen and is a relative of Imam Yehya, the famous leader in successive revolts against Turkish authority, but now in full accord with his fellow Muslims in face of the common peril to Islam. Musa Bey was trained in the Military College at Stamboul and has shown consummate ability during his command of the Zuara coast-line. The following account of this great Arab leader gives a true picture of the Arab's control over the Arabs.

His influence over the Arabs is amazing. Every morning a crowd of these irregulars would assemble behind the officers' quarters with all manner of requests, grievances and items of information. There stood the Commandant, his well-worn tunic open, slippers on his feet, a small white cap on his head, with no sword—this had been smashed by a shell splinter. In half an hour everything would be settled, and the Arabs would go off to their posts happy and contented. But Musa Bey was firm as well as kind. When the first bombardment occurred the townspeople were filled with dismay, and it seemed for the moment as if a headlong flight of the population might leave Zuara almost at the mercy of an Italian landing party. The Commandant, however, after his orders to "be steady" were disregarded, drew his revolver and without further ado shot the two chief panickmongers dead. Confidence was thus restored, and now every day a large body of Arabs lies waiting along the coast for the long threatened disembarkation of an Italian force, and longing for an opportunity to meet the hated invaders at close quarters.

The effect of the discipline infused into the Arabs can be seen in the account which Mr. Bennett gives of the rout of an Italian force at Sidi Said, the place which is of some importance now as the Italians have proclaimed this week that they have gained a victory there, though presumably it must be a repetition of the Zanzur "victory." He writes that on December 15th, a certain excess of valour having inspired the Italians, two warships arrived opposite the Marabout of Sidi Said some 25 miles from the frontier. The warships came to anchor and a party of the sailors were actually landed from a steam launch. But an Arab woman standing near the tomb of this holy man, who has given its name to the place, witnessed the arrival of the Italians and, like a goose on the Capitol, screamed out her warning notes to some men working in the adjoining fields. These Arabs advanced to give battle, but the landing party did not wait for further developments and instantly clambered into the launch and steamed off to the ship, which thereupon fired many rounds of shrapnel at the sand-dunes and disappeared. Then follows a vivid description of the reception given to the cruisers when they anchored close to the beach next morning.

The Arabs were alert and faithfully carried out the orders issued by Major Musa Bey, the Zuara Commandant, viz., to carefully conceal themselves in the sand-dunes and allow the Italians to land and advance some distance before firing a shot. When I saw the Arabs watching the Italians from their hiding places in the sand, their eyes glistening and their whole being absorbed with the hope that the enemy would come ashore, I was always reminded of my favourite setter "Dick" who sometimes joins me, without permission, when I am waiting for flighting ducks in Norway. When a duck sails up and flops into the water far out in the lagoon, "Dick" shivers and bristles and gently whines in his intense excitement, and I have to hold him down by force. Musa Bey had infused some measure of discipline into his Arabs, and there they lay in the dunes, their fingers itching to fire on the invaders. The first detachment was commanded by an officer and carried trenching tools. The launch made two other journeys, and the three boat-loads, some 150 men all told, advanced cautiously from the beach. The officer led the way, and continually stopped to survey the plain and the distant hills with his field glasses. Just as the landing party commenced to climb the dunes the Arabs opened fire. The officer, badly wounded, fell on his knees, and a second bullet killed him outright. The effect on the Italians was striking. The 150 men simply turned tail and bolted in utter confusion to the beach, hotly followed by 34 Arabs, who could no longer be restrained from pursuit. The sailors managed to carry off the body of their officer and six killed or wounded comrades, but they left on the sand 50 picks and shovels, 300 cartridges, and a number of sailors' caps. One Arab was wounded by a bullet which pierced his cheek and smashed his jawbone.

Apart from the military qualities and shortcomings of the Arabs, Mr. Bennett has many social defects to find in them. "They are," he writes, "with, of course, striking exceptions, mirthless, grim, ungrateful, cruel and, above all, filled with an absorbing spirit of greed from childhood to old age. Pericles in his great speech states that the love of honour is the sentiment which abides latest in the human mind in the case of the Arab it is love of money. The feelings of the average Arab expressed or latent are fixed on 'feluss' and 'baksheesh', and in order to make himself master of a trifle he will sometimes stoop to brutal violence and even bloodshed." In connection with the alleged avarice of the Arab, Mr. Bennett refers to the bribing of Hassouna Pasha and some of his hangers-on. They did their utmost to corrupt the inhabitants of villages near Tripoli, like Gargareh and Zanzur. He says it was notorious all along the coast from Ajilat to the frontier that a certain number of local Arabs had been tampered with by the Italians. The former Commandant of Zuara, Ahmed Bin Muntasir was heavily bribed in order to facilitate the long-delayed landing at that point, but most fortunately the treachery of this scoundrel was detected in time, and he is now undergoing a thoroughly deserved punishment in the common jail at Gharian. Writing on the same subject Mr. Bennett says:—

money is indeed the root of all evil, the ethical system of the average Arab must be in a bad way. Considerations of petty finance form a veritable obsession amongst these natives. Camel drivers will never miss an opportunity of using their monetary difficulties for an appeal ad misericordiam and a demand for large baksheesh at the journey's end. Listen to the incessant prattle of the Arabs as they sit round their fires in the evening and chatter all through the night—the burden of their talk is money, money, money. Franc, piastre, medjidie, soldi, baksheesh, how much, not enough—such terms and phrases occur in damnable reiteration. A group of camel-men will argue hotly with each other for hours about a minute difference in their pay, realized or prospective.

Mr. Bennett contrasts the humanity of the Turks in the treatment of animals with the callous brutality of the Arabs, and says that the latter's treatment of his animals is on a par with what he metes out to his fellow-men.

While the Turk is always kind to children and animals, the Arab is unequalled for his callous indifference to animal suffering. His alleged love for his horse is a mere fable. If his horse or his donkey or his camel can cover so many miles from stage to stage, he rarely troubles to water them on the way, even when the water is easily accessible. If a frightful wound caused by his own brutality or carelessness does not actually injure the progress of the beast, he leaves it untended to fester in the sun.

Once Mr. Bennett noticed with great horror a most shocking wound in the flank of the horse he had hired the evening before. The flesh was torn away and a portion of the ribs exposed. His Arab servant was quite bewildered by his concern and could not be brought to understand why he protested against such treatment. "At length," says Mr. Bennett, "he openly laughed and asked me why I was upset by the appearance of the wound. It did not, he said, prevent the horse from travelling quickly, and it would certainly accomplish the work for which I had paid, viz., my conveyance on its back as far as Zuara." He gives another instance of a camel, a portion of whose hump had been torn off by the careless packing of its heavy load and the bone splintered. These are allegations which we feel bound to believe, although they put the Arab in a much worse light than we have ever viewed him before.

Education in the United Provinces.

THE results of the various examinations recently published by the University of Allahabad call for a detailed study with reference to the general state of education in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. Figures for provincial education as ascertained in the last census have not yet appeared in tabulated form; and we cannot, therefore, estimate the educational progress of the people in the last decade, particularly of the masses, in the absence of adequate data. In some of the larger provinces educational returns have already been compiled. We had occasion to deal the other day with the figures published by the Punjab Government and estimate their bearing on the intellectual and moral condition of the people. We think it should not be necessary to remind the United Provinces Government, which appears to be loudly progressive in some of its ways, that the results of the Census in tabulated form under various heads of general importance and interest should have been published with more despatch.

The last University results, though not an infallible test in themselves, afford a fairly reliable and correct measure of the growth of secondary and higher education in the Province. The total population of the United Provinces, according to the last census, is 48,012,577. This community of about 48 millions, comprising many races and creeds, is in varying stages of social development. In the main features of its social organisation it still retains the old economic basis, though the flood of new ideas and the growth of new economic conditions are gradually demolishing the ancient landmarks. The time is still distant when the provincial communities in India would be efficiently organised and adapted to modern needs. As things are, the social organism is rickety and out of gear. If only the public men of this country realised the enormous waste of power and the economic futility to which the existing social conditions gave birth, there would, we are sure, be a deeper sense of the importance of the educational factor in India's problem. It is only by courtesy that we may at present style as "provincial communities" the mass of human atoms, loosely held together by habit or by traditions that are fast losing their vital force and meaning. The real cohesive force that comes from some great unifying purpose is wanting. To create an intellectual atmosphere for the growth of that purpose is the main task at which the public men of this country should be resolutely engaged. It is only when the ground has been cleared of social prejudices and sentimental humbug that sound and balanced views on the organisation of Indian society would take root, which might ultimately grow up into a complete and co-ordinated system of national education. For the present, we have our provincial communities as so many loose social improvisations for crude economic needs, top-heavy, beginning to lose their essential character as agricultural tribes and feudal organisations in their hopeless economic struggle with the brand new industrial democracies of the West.

It, therefore, requires no large gift of the imagination to realise the urgent need for the spread and many-sided development of provincial education. There is needed, first of all, a widespread enlightenment that there may ultimately grow up a unity of effort and aspiration. But, above all, it is necessary to organise facilities for the diffusion of what is generally known as technical knowledge with special reference to the changing needs of the economic situation. The United Provinces Government made some efforts a few years ago to establish experimental farms and technical schools in order to foster the development of agriculture on modern lines and prepare skilled artisans for provincial industries. No great results have, however, yet been achieved in these directions and we confess we can see no appreciable advantage accruing from half-measures of this kind. The problems of agriculture and of industrial development are gigantic in their scope and magnitude and require a bold, thorough and systematic treatment. One of the most important factors that would have a decisive bearing on the solution of these problems is the mentality of the mass of the people. The organisation of mass education, especially with reference to the agricultural and the industrial needs of the Province, ought, therefore, to claim the undivided attention of the provincial Government. It would appear from the report of the Director of Public Instruction that the condition of primary education in the United Provinces is not very satisfactory. Several primary schools were actually closed last year and the number of school-going children fell appreciably. Whatever may have been the causes, this state of things is obviously not desirable. Some of our educational "experts" regard efficiency as only another name for restricting the area of education and increasing the strength of the inspecting staff. If these "experts" have not the capacity or the will to extend education without impairing its efficiency, they have no business to supervise or direct the educational activities of the Government. Men with greater strength of purpose, more energy and larger constructive gifts are needed to undertake the task.

The state of secondary and higher education in a community of 48 millions, judged by the University examination results of this year, is not at all hopeful or encouraging. According to a most generally accepted standard, one-sixth of the total strength of a nation or a community is always at a stage of life when it ought to be subject to some organised process of training and education, i.e., 8 millions of the population of the United Provinces must at this time be in what is known as the preparatory stage of life. Let us, however, reduce the number by half in view of the fact that organised female education is practically non-existent in this country. Let us also make a further reduction of $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions representing those who may be said to have not yet grown out of the cradle and the nursery. After these liberal deductions we have as residue $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions who ought to be undergoing some sort of training organised by the community or the State. We doubt, however, if the Education Department of the United Provinces and private enterprise have together been able to cover even a tenth part of the ground. More than two millions of the younger generation are growing up to man's state on whom the collective will and intelligence of the community has never been brought to bear, who are without a chart for the voyage of life and are feeling their way through accident, misdirection and failure to an inadequate, cramped and ineffectual manhood. In an efficiently organised community of about 48 millions there must be about half a million boys in the secondary and the higher stages of education in all its branches. Industries and professions requiring technical knowledge and skill may claim 3 lakhs, leaving 2 lakhs for the study of the liberal arts and sciences. Of this number two-thirds, we suppose, should be in schools and one-third in the arts colleges. There exists, however, a wide gulf between what is and what ought to be. The state of secondary education in the United Provinces may be gauged from the fact that the number of the boys who appeared this year in the matriculation examination of the Allahabad University was 3,415. And it must be remembered that the figure, paltry as it is, includes hundreds of students who were educated in schools outside the territorial limits of the United Provinces, in Central India and the Central Provinces. As regards the higher education, the figures are more paltry still. The Degree Examinations have added 25 M.A.'s, 8 M.Sc.'s, 49 B.Sc.'s and 359 B.A.'s this year to the ranks of the educated classes. Our estimate of the social value of these results is this. The community of 48 millions in the United Provinces, whose requirements as a civilised social group can adequately be satisfied only if $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions of its male population are being constantly trained under collective will and intelligence, gets only about 3,000 young boys every year as the raw material for manufacturing the wheels of social efficiency, while the annual output of about 400 graduates represents, so to speak, the brainpower that is to keep the huge machine going. The utter inadequacy of these results stands in no need of further elucidation.

Apart, however, from the actual state of secondary and higher education in the United Provinces, which ought to be a matter of very anxious concern both to the people and the Government, the University results throw instructive sidelights on the standard of collegiate teaching and on the comparative position of the various religious communities in the scale of education. As regards the first, it is a matter of genuine surprise to us that such a large percentage of students should fail to satisfy the University test. Excepting the M.Sc. degree for which 8 out of 10 candidates have been declared qualified, the results in every other case point to an alarming condition of things. The percentage of passes in the B.Sc. is 34.7; in the B.A. 40.1; in the Intermediate examination 41.4. There can be only two reasons for this frightful and enormous wastage. Either the standard of collegiate teaching is low and the teaching itself inefficient, or the University tests are pedantically severe and irrelevant. In either case there can be no justification for such a heavy percentage of failures. The state of affairs is hardly creditable to those who control the work of the Allahabad University or guide collegiate teaching. There must be something radically wrong in the system of education which leads to about 70 per cent failures even after the scholars have undergone a normal course of instruction. No such disparity between efforts and results is known to exist in any other University in the world outside India; and we hope we would not be asked to believe that the Indian student is lacking in habits of application or intelligence.

As everywhere else, the spread of secondary and higher education has been most marked amongst the Hindus of the United Provinces. The number of the Hindu students in the University examination figures is proportionately higher than the relative strength of the community in the population. The proportion of the Mussalmans is comparatively lower; and the circumstance becomes much more alarming when we take into account the representative character of the College at Aligarh. The Mussalmans comprise 14 per cent. of the population of the Provinces and their proportion in the University results should, in consequence, be 14 per cent. We must, however, bear in mind in this connection that the Aligarh College, the most important centre of Moslem education in India, is situated in the United Provinces and is affiliated to the University of Allahabad. It draws its students from every part of the country. The University examination figures relating to Mussalmans will, therefore, be misleading in regard to the actual state of Moslem education in the U. P. if the Aligarh contribution to the University successes is not subjected to a careful analysis. If we leave Aligarh out of the calculation, the number of the Mussalmans is reduced to an altogether negligible quantity. For instance, not a single Mussalman has passed M.A., M.Sc., or B.Sc. from any College outside Aligarh. Similarly there are only 37 Moslem B.A.'s, out of 359 and 77 Moslems out of the total of 599 who have passed the Intermediate Examination. Thus, it would appear, the Mussulmans avail themselves but little of the educational facilities in the colleges maintained out of the revenues of the State to which they contribute an appreciable share. An overwhelming number of those who get collegiate education is attracted to Aligarh. Taking the number of the Mussulman students as a whole, they comprise 24 per cent. of the total passes in M.A.; 2.04 per cent. in B.Sc.; 29.2 per cent. in B.A.; and 23.03 per cent. in the Intermediate; while not a single Mussulman appeared in the M.Sc. examination. The Moslem percentage seems to be proportionately higher, except in the M.Sc. and the B.Sc. results. The reason for this has already been explained, viz., the inclusion in the Aligarh College figures of those who come from the other provinces of India. We cannot give the exact number of such students, but we believe it is about half. If we eliminate this disturbing factor from the calculation, the Moslem percentage in the higher education of the Provinces cannot be considered to be very satisfactory.

The results of the Aligarh College in the Arts Faculty are, on the whole, satisfactory. Of the six candidates for M.A. all have passed: the University percentage being 55.5. Out of 132 students 68 have passed in B.A., giving a proportion of 51.5 per cent. against that of 40.1 per cent. for the University. In the Intermediate Examination 61 have passed out of a total of 126, the proportion in this case, too, being higher than that of the University by about 7 per cent. It is, however, in the Science Faculty that the most disappointing results are shown. In the B.Sc. Examination only one has passed out of 4, while not a single student appeared this year in M. Sc. And yet these results do not seem to be accidental and appear to be a tame repetition of recent exploits. We are sure the Mussalman public has a right to demand an explanation of the disgraceful state of the teaching of science at Aligarh. The Prince of Wales School of Science has for some years past been annually costing the community an enormous sum of money. The expenditure for its maintenance in 1909 was Rs. 17,580, and it has been mounting up rapidly since then. The estimated expenditure for the year 1911-12 stands at the huge figure of Rs. 28,257. The staff of the School consists of two Professors of European qualifications, two Assistant Professors, and two demonstrators, all of whom draw liberal salaries. If, however, in spite of such enormous expenditure only one student has the ability to pass B. Sc. and not a single student is prepared for M. Sc., we think the best course would be to dismiss the staff, get rid of this white elephant of a School and divert the money to some more useful ends. The Mussalman community can ill afford to tax itself to the tune of Rs. 28,257 a year for the luxury of manufacturing a B.Sc. If that is how Aligarh has learnt to organise the teaching of the most important branch of modern knowledge, one may well despair of the Moslem communal education ever getting on the right track. We trust the Trustees of the College will make a searching enquiry into causes of such glaring inefficiency and extravagance and either mend the teaching of the School of Science or end it. Is it too much to hope that the Science Staff, which is responsible for these results and has not recently been conspicuous for modesty in its own estimate of its value, will now have some of its guid conceit of itself knocked off by these results.

Anecdote.

MR. SEYMOUR HICKS tells of a quaint little incident that happened once when he was playing in a musical comedy at the old Gaiety. Much to his annoyance, the chorus girls would persist in chattering to each other while he was singing his verses. On one particular evening—it was a Monday and on Mondays the ladies seemed to have even more than usual to talk about—one of the ladies was telling her neighbour some experience so loudly while Mr. Hicks was singing that she knocked all the words out of his head.

"Hush!" said Mr. Hicks; but the lady went on with her story. After he had said "Hush!" half-a-dozen times with no effect, he determined to give her a lesson.

"One moment," he said to the conductor, and the orchestra stopped suddenly.

Then Mr. Hicks turned to the lady of the wagging tongue and, thinking to frighten her out of her wits and stop her from ever talking again on the stage, said:—

"Dear lady, will you finish your story, or shall I finish my song?"

"The lady took a step forward and beamed on him.

"Do you know, dearie," she replied, calmly, "it's a matter of the utmost indifference to me what you do."

"The house shrieked with laughter," says Mr. Hicks. "I retired feeling that I had not scored at all that time."

IN SOME reminiscences of the late Boer War, Colonel Kekewich, who so gallantly defended Kimberley for 126 days, tells the following story.

One day he was approached by a private, who asked:—

"Colonel, when do you expect we are going to get something to eat?"

"Eat!" exclaimed the colonel. "Did you join the Army merely to get something to eat?"

"Well, that's about the size of it," replied the soldier.

"Here," said the colonel, calling an officer, "give this man something to eat, and then have him shot."

The officer understood the joke and replied:—

"All right, colonel."

The private, however, exhibited no alarm, and, turning to the officer, said:—

"Boil me a ham, cap'n, stew up a couple of chickens, bake two or three pounds of potatoes, fetch a gallon o' beer, and load yer guns! With such inducements, the man who wouldn't be willing to die is a blithering idiot!"

A hearty meal was prepared for the soldier, and the threatened execution never came off.

THEODORE DREISER, the novelist, was talking about criticism.

"I like pointed criticism," he said; "criticism such as I heard in the lobby of a theatre the other night at the end of the play. The critic was an old gentleman. His criticism, which was for his wife's ears alone, consisted of these words:—

"Well, you would come!"

News of the Week.

The French Chamber has adopted the Bill establishing a Protectorate over Morocco by 460 votes to 79.

Reuter wires from Tangier:—Serious disturbances have broken out at Marrakesh owing to the appointment of an unpopular Governor. Europeans have been stoned, but looting was suppressed by the Sherrefian troops.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Mogador, May 31 (?).

The Nationalist movement originating in the Southern Provinces, and headed by Mulai Hamed el Haiba, is daily assuming a more serious character. The reported abdication of Mulai Hafid has given a powerful stimulus to El Haiba's enterprise, and it seems that all the Atlas chieftains have now sided with the "Pretender." I had some conversation to-day with an influential supporter of his, who said: "We recognise that France has secured control of the seaports at present open to foreign trade and the seven-mile zone defined in the Algeciras Convention, but we deny the right of any foreign Power to control the interior of our country. On this issue we shall fight. No Sultan imposed on us by a European nation will be recognised by the people of Morocco. If you can do it you may massacre our men, women, and children, but we will never willingly submit to foreign control."

My recollection of the Pretender based on a glimpse I had of him when he was last at Mogador, gives him middle height, a light brown complexion, slightly bronzed by an outdoor life; large and expressive eyes, and a firm, not unpleasant mouth—altogether a typical Arab of the purest breed. An enthusiastic friend of his tells me that he is now thirty-one or thirty-two years of age, and that he has latterly grown rather stout, which is the way of most Moorish "personages." Save for headgear, consisting of an exceptionally high turboosh and turban, his garb is simple but of the best material: a dark blue kaftan, with silk embroidered pattern, for indoor use, this being hidden by a blue haik when "his Majesty" rides or walks abroad. His food is the same as that of his poorest dependents, being mainly confined to dates and camel's milk. He is well versed in Moslem literature, follows devoutly the precepts of the Koran to the letter, and leads much the same sort of life as did the early disciples of Mohammed.

Paris, June 7.

The Sultan of Morocco has left Fez for Rabat, and this is probably the last act in his reign. His departure is described as having been very picturesque. Mulai Hafid left his palace on horseback, accompanied by Generals Lyautey and Moinier, and preceded by his richly caparisoned stud of horses. A cloud of Moorish cavaliers hovered round him, galloping backwards and forwards and clearing the way, but few of the population turned out into the streets to watch the cortège. The Liberté says that it is needless to remark that the Sultan will never return, I have every reason to believe this is beyond dispute.

Who the next Sultan will be does not appear to be settled, and, whoever it is, his education as a ruler and as a protégé of France will soon have to be considered. For the present, General Lyautey will to all intents and purposes govern Morocco through the Makhzen, and he has already given such proofs of coolness and readiness of resource under the peculiarly difficult circumstances which marked his arrival that every confidence is felt in him. It is clear that in him the French Government have another Kitchener.

Tangier, June 7.

To-morrow will be the first anniversary of the occupation of the Larache and Alcazar zone by Spanish troops. Whatever may have been said at the time as to the much-disputed necessity of this action on the part of Spain, it is most satisfactory a year later to state that during the entire period not one life has been lost, not one shot has been fired, and, I believe, not one justifiable complaint has been made of ill-treatment of natives. The same may be said of the wild mountainous zone lying between Ceuta and Tetuan, through which the Spanish forces have advanced almost to the gates of the latter town without ever ceasing to maintain with the tribesmen the most friendly relations. In spite of a certain military rashness in the early days of the advance from Ceuta, the Spanish authorities in both spheres of occupation have shown throughout, in their dealings with the natives, tact as admirable as it has been praiseworthy and the highest sense of probity and justice.

If the Spanish Government will treat international commerce and industry in the Spanish zone of Morocco with the same spirit of equity, it will have given proofs of a new capacity and spirit of colonization which others might well emulate.

Madrid, June 7.

M. Guiot, delegate of the Moroccan bondholders, accompanied by the other French members of the Franco-Spanish Financial Commission, arrived in Madrid to-day.

It is understood that, in addition to his functions as a member of the Financial Commission, M. Guiot will probably be the French representative on the Anglo-Franco-Spanish Commission, which is expected shortly to meet in Madrid for consideration of the future régime at Tangier.

Paris, June 11.

While the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber is engaged in examining the Franco-Moroccan Treaty of 3rd April of this year, the Temps publishes the bulk of the correspondence which has passed between the French Foreign Office and the Sultan Mulai Hafid during the past 15 months. The correspondence throws some interesting light upon the Sultan's attitude towards the Franco-German Treaty of November, 1911, and also upon his idea of abdicating, and the way in which it was received by the French Government. The Sultan took considerable pains to guarantee the position and emoluments of the Sherrefian dignity, and it was only after considerable correspondence with the former French Foreign Minister, M. de Selves, that he gave his assent, on 9th November 1911, to the consequences of the important article 3 in the Franco-German Treaty and agreed that the diplomatic and Consular Agents of France should be entrusted with the representation and protection of Moorish subjects abroad, and that the French representative at the Moorish Court should act as intermediary between the Sherrefian Government and the Powers.

On 17th October 1911, Mulai Hafid addressed a long communication to M. de Selves in which he tabulated, in the form of numbered articles, the conditions on which he was willing to adhere to the terms of the Franco-German Treaty then approaching the stage for signature. Several of these conditions referred to the eventuality of his abdication "in consequence of weakness or lassitude." In that event he desired that his Heir should be established on the Sherrefian Throne and that the succession should be assured to the Heir's full brothers. For himself, the Sultan asked that he should, after abdication, be allowed to reside where he pleased, "either in the place where his Heir was, or elsewhere in the Moroccan Empire, or in the numerous towns situated in French or other Colonies, or at Medina or in other Islamic towns." He stipulated, moreover, that if he went to reside in a French colony he should be treated with all the consideration due to his rank. If he should desire to visit foreign towns he would only do so after having come to an agreement with the French Government on the subject. He also insisted that he and his successor should have complete liberty to move about in Morocco according to the traditions of the country.

M. Regnault, when he went on his special mission to Fez a few months ago, gave the Sultan explicit written assurances with regard to his civil list and the other expenses of his position. He also gave the following assurances in a separate document:—

On the day on which your Majesty for any reason should decide to renounce the exercise of power an honourable pension will be assigned you by the Government of the Republic. Your Majesty may, if you think fit, designate one of your sons as Heir-Presumptive to the Sherrefian Throne. An arrangement will be made with the Government of the Republic on this subject. As regards the journey which your Majesty contemplates making to Rabat I have noted your intentions, and shall comply with the invitation which you have addressed to me [to accompany Mulai Hafid on his journey].

On 10th November 1911, Mulai Hafid had expressed a desire to pay a visit to Paris "in May, 1912." He recently desired to fulfil that desire, and he also thought of exercising the right to abdicate which M. de Selves, then Foreign Minister, had agreed to grant him. It was found difficult, however, to fulfil these promises when they were recalled to the memory of the French Government by the Sultan last April. The Sultan, however, has now been allowed to proceed to Rabat accompanied part of the way by M. Regnault, and the latest telegram from Fez says that he is to-day camping close to the Sadi river, and that there has been a slight delay in his progress coastwards.

Persia.

News of the Week.

IN THE House of Commons on the 2nd July Mr. Walter Guinness asked whether the military authorities were asked for their opinion on the general principle of direct Russo-Indian railway communication or merely invited to suggest conditions which would make the scheme least objectionable strategically.

Sir Edward Grey said the general question as well as the particular scheme were considered and the views of the chief military authorities were expressed to the Government of India and at Home.

The Muhammadans of Madras mustered strong on the 28th June in the chief mosque at Royapetta to express the sense of indignation of the Muhammadan community at the sacrilege of the sacred tomb at Meshed by Russian troops as also to protest against Italian naval activities on the Arabian coast and also to express sympathy with the object of the Calcutta Islam Association. The following resolutions were passed:—(1) This meeting views with intense abhorrence the sacrilege of the sacred tomb at Meshed and the plunder of the treasure attached to it by Russian troops; (2) this meeting strongly protests against this unjustifiable Italian naval activities on the Arabian coast to the great annoyance and consternation of Indian Mussulman pilgrims, in spite of repeated assurances that they would be localised to Tripoli, and this meeting expresses its entire sympathy with the objects of the Moirul Islam Association of Calcutta.

Affairs at Meshed.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Meshed, May 24.

SOME days after the bombardment the Russian soldiers were withdrawn from the mosque and shrine, and the whole property was handed back to the "Chief Keeper," who gave a receipt for safe return of the sacred buildings, the priceless historical jewels and other treasures; but there seems to be doubt in the minds of some as to whether all the valuables which disappeared from the mosque and shrine at the time of the bombardment have been replaced. The repairs have not yet been done, and I am told that the damage amounted to 70,000 tomans, which is about £14,000 sterling. This is rather more than it was at first supposed to be. Some of the damage done cannot be made good at any price, because the work belonged to the lost arts.

Before the bombardment there were extensive bazaars in proximity to the holy precincts, which were included in the area to which only Moslems were admitted. The entrances to these bazaars were marked by chains or timbers; but these barricades were destroyed during the bombardment and have not been replaced, and these bazaars are now open to non-Moslems, and the area to which only Muhammadans are admitted—commonly known as the Sacred Precinct or "bast"—is much smaller than before.

The Persian police force, which was dismissed by the Russians when they took over the city, has been restored with its former chief, Munshi-i-Nizam, at its head, and the whole department is under the supervision of Colonel Kharanoff of the Russian garrison.

Rukn-ed-Dowleh, the Governor-General, who resigned when the Russians took the city, left for Teheran, and a few days ago was robbed near the western border of the province and some of his men in attendance were killed.

At the time of the bombardment it was supposed that all the leaders of the agitation who were in the mosque and shrine got out alive and also some of their followers. This supposition has been confirmed. Talib-el-hagh and about a dozen others are in custody in the Russian garrison. Yussuf Khan Herati, the chief agitator, and Muhammad Nishapuri soon appeared in the region of Nishapur and committed such depredations that the Russians were obliged to place a garrison of their own soldiers with a strong battery of artillery in the city of Nishapur. Muhammad Nishapuri is still murdering and plundering in the district; but Yussuf Khan Herati and some of his followers turned south and east toward the trade route to Afghanistan and began operating in that district.

Sheer Ali Khan, who, with a force of men, was sent to capture Yussuf Khan Herati, reported a few days ago that he had captured his man and would bring him into Meshed on a certain day. A scaffold was erected in the public square, the band played, and crowds collected; but at noon report was circulated that the whereabouts of Yussuf Khan Herati were not known, and, therefore, he would not be brought into the city that day. Various rumours then became current. One was to the effect that he had been captured and would be executed and his body brought in and displayed in the public square. It was said that if he were brought into the city alive and given a trial there would be unnecessary delay and complications. It is commonly said that he was a paid agitator and was only a tool in all that he did. Had he been brought in alive he might have escaped, or if he had been given a trial embarrassing information might have come to light. I was told to-day that certain ecclesiastics offered 20,000 tomans (which is about £4,000) for his escape. I do not know by what authority he was captured and executed. But dead men tell no tales!

There is a Russian garrison at Kuchan, about a hundred miles north-west of Meshed on the military road leading to the Russian frontier. A few days ago the Russian Army Chaplain of the garrison in Meshed went to Kuchan to administer to the troops there. While returning he was attacked by robbers near Chinaran, about forty miles from here, and barely escaped with his life. I am told that the Russians sent a punitive expedition and destroyed several villages in the neighbourhood.

The Baluchis are murdering and robbing in the district of Neh in the southern part of this province, a hundred miles west of Seistan. The Afghans, taking advantage of the weakness of the Persian Government, are raiding in the undefined boundary between Persia and Afghanistan, south of Karez. The whole province is in a state of lawlessness and there is not one road safe and free from robbers.

United Tribute to Yeprim Khan.

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 2.

A MEETING held this morning in a public hall in Pera presented a striking picture of some of the forces now at work in the Near and Middle East. The meeting was convened in honour of the memory of Yeprim Khan, the Armenian Commander of the Persian Government forces, who fell in battle against Salar-ed-Dowleh near Hamadan. The organisers of the meeting were the Central Committee of the Dashnaksutun, the party to which Yeprim belonged, and which has branches in Russia, Turkey and Persia. In Turkey this party, which formerly took the lead in the struggle against Turkish oppression, is now pursuing a policy of carefully calculated co-operation with the Young Turks. The audience, which numbered in all about 1,500, was composed almost exclusively of Armenians and Persians. The Persian Ambassador was present, several former Persian deputies, the leading members of the large Persian colony in Constantinople, and the pupils of the Persian School, and there were Armenians of all classes, from dignified Government officials, deputies, and merchants to students, shop assistants, and working men. There was also a sprinkling of Turkish officers, impressed probably by the strangely adventurous career of the brave peasant from the Caucasus.

There was an entire absence of ceremonial, unless the playing of a funeral march be counted as such. The two morning hours were devoted entirely to speeches, to which the audience that filled the amphitheatre listened with eager attention, irrespectively of the variety of languages used. Yet it is hard to reproduce the speeches. They were attempts to express, vaguely or forcibly according to the temperament of the speaker, that profound, yet simple, feeling that moves masses of men when a man upon whom much depends dies fighting bravely for an idea. What was the idea in Yeprim's case? Some, like Mustafa Nejib Bey, who spoke in the name of the Committee of Union and Progress, declared that Yeprim fought for his party, the Dashnaksutun, and its programme. Others again, like M. Agnuni, a member of the Dashnaksutun, declared that his battle was against every form and species of tyranny—tyranny which he had learned to hate during his imprisonment and exile in Russia. Eumer Nadjib Bey, a member of the Central Committee of Union and Progress, affirmed in an impassioned speech that though Yeprim were dead Iran, for whose sake he had fought, would never die. M. Vramean, again, the Dashnakist leader, spoke of the power of the people to bring forth out of its own midst great men and leaders and reproached wealthy Armenians for their indifference to the national cause. Taqi-Zade, again, the former Deputy for Tabriz, spoke gratefully of the loyalty and aid repeatedly shown by Armenians to Muhammadan peoples, and recalled how in Persia Persians and Armenians fought together for a common national cause. Hussein Danish Bey, a leading member of the Turkish Colony in Constantinople, gave direct and forcible expression to his admiration for Yeprim's character and achievements in a Turkish poem. And a tiny Persian schoolboy recited in Persian verses expressive of the common feeling uniting Persians and Armenians.

That this morning a common feeling did unite Persians and Armenians and Turks there could be no doubt. The troubled course of Near Eastern politics—boundary dispute, electoral grievances, jealousies between Persian and Armenians—all this was forgotten for a little while. The three nationalities were for a moment drawn together by the sharp reminder given in Yeprim's death of an ideal that three or four years ago touched many hearts here in the East, but has since been almost forgotten in the multitude of disappointments and failures.

Railway Development in Persia.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, May 30.

CONVERSATIONS have begun between the Russian and British Ministers and the Persian Minister of Foreign Affairs with the object of securing for the Société d'Etudes an option for the survey and construction of the Trans-Persian line. The Anglo-Russian proposal appears to be well received, and when the present Cabinet crisis is over important progress will probably be made. At the same time the British Government has again brought forward the Khoramabad scheme, and an option is sought for a line from Khor Musa, near Mohammerah, to Khoramabad, for a strong English syndicate. The syndicate is composed of six groups, of which four are already connected with Persian commerce, via, the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, the Imperial Bank, the Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Company (Messrs. Lynch) and the British India Steam Navigation Company. The syndicate is prepared to undertake much more extensive railway construction in Southern Persia. As Russia will eventually build a line from Teheran to Khanikin, the Khoramabad line will probably be linked with this line, at Kermanshab or elsewhere, and Persia will thus have two routes from the Gulf to the North.

For the moment the "Trans-Persian" is of greater interest. The first thing to be said is, that, if we consider the routes proposed, the estimates of the cost so far published appear extraordinarily inadequate. The Société d'Etudes is now taking definite shape, and the names of its members already announced fully guarantee its serious character. We may therefore reasonably expect soon to see a change in the nature of the communications to the press. From £21,000,000, of which £3,000,000 was to pay interest on capital during construction, the estimate sank to £15,000,000 for actual construction. The line was to be built in three, or at most five, years. And the longing fancy of the home-sick Anglo-Indian was pleasantly stimulated by announcements, suggesting the poster and the prospectus, such as "London to Delhi in eight days. First Class fare, £40." Now, as the scheme at present stands, the line will run from Astara via Resht, Kasvin, Teheran, Kum, Kashan, Ispahan, either to Yezd or Kirman. From Yezd or Kirman it will turn towards a point on the Persian Gulf, either Bandar Abbas or Chabar, and thence to the Indian frontier at Gwadar. The reasons for this route will be referred to later, but I am now dealing only with the question of cost, and naturally I also omit the Russian and Indian extensions which will be necessary to link Astara with the Russian system and Gwadar with Karachi. If, then, a crow could be found willing to take this unusual flight from Astara to Gwadar, passing the points named, he might be found to have covered approximately 1,500 miles; but, not being a crow, the railway surveyor will cover more nearly 2,500. Those who follow Lord Salisbury's advice and "use large maps" will gain some idea of the détours that will be necessary both for gradients and to serve local needs. The varieties of gradients may usefully be set down, not to suggest the existence of any overwhelming engineering difficulty, but as bearing on the cost of construction:—

Astara	Caspian level, 84 feet below Black Sea.
Resht	75 feet above sea level.
Kasvin	...	4,100	" " " "
Teheran	...	3,860	" " " "
Ispahan	...	5,330	" " " "
Yezd	...	4,020	" " " "
Kirman	...	5,680	" " " "
Bandar Abbas	...	—	—

These points are far apart and give only the most general idea, for there are many ups and downs between. Here, for instance, are the heights over which our friend the crow would pass in succession in a flight from Kirman to the sea at Bandar Abbas:—5,680 feet, 7,530 feet, 10,130 feet, 3,048 feet, 10,990 feet, 660 feet.

The English estimate for the cost of construction of a line from Khor Musa to Khoramabad is £10,000 per mile and the Trans-Persian will have several sections more difficult and therefore more costly. The most recent English estimate for a line from Bushire to Shiraz is £15,000 per mile, and though the Trans-Persian will have to face nothing quite so back-breaking as the famous Royal road between Bushire and Shiraz, the mountains of the Elburz will present problems nearly as formidable. Moreover, the line is to be financed internationally, and the advantages of international finance are not secured for nothing. It seems certain therefore that the cost of construction will approach more nearly to £30,000,000 than to £15,000,000. As this estimate makes no provision either for rolling stock or for the payment of interest on capital during the period of construction, it seems clear that the loan operations involved must eventually total £30,000,000 at least.

The route favoured by Russia runs from Kirman to Robat and thence along the Baluch-Afghan border to the Indian railhead at Nushki. Suspicious souls see in this choice a straining after the Englishman's India, but there is a strong commercial reason, and reasons of commercial war may be frankly stated. Whatever be the fate of the railway scheme in England, it is certain that it has enemies in Russia. Moscow merchants ply great trade in the bazaars of Northern Persia, and the worse becomes the state of the southern roads and the more difficult it is for Manchester goods to penetrate into Persia, the better trade they ply. A railway from the Gulf would restore the balance. The Moscow merchant is very conservative, but the suggestion of a route which nowhere touched the coast roused less alarm, for the long haul from Karachi via Quetta into Persia would considerably add to the cost of English goods, whereas a railway from Mohamerah or Bandar Abbas as an annexe to seaborne traffic, would make competition serious. At the present moment, one may note in passing, Teheran is almost hermetically sealed to English goods. There is not a southern trade route remaining open, and the Russian transit duty makes freight traffic impossible. Europeans live by parcel post, with an effect upon their incomes and their tempers which may be left to the imagination. Even large orders of champagne are regularly imported by parcel post in parcels of two bottles each. The parcel post runs only to Enzeli, and 3s. more has to be paid for transport to Teheran, in addition to Customs duty. Yet, in spite of the expense, much sympathy is felt for the American colony, as there is no parcel post with the United States. Evening frocks, however, have been known to come from America by letter post! This has its compensations, as the parcel post from London takes five weeks, frequently more, whereas epistolary garments come from America in 20 days.

It is matter of public knowledge that the Indian Government found itself unable to approve of the Kirman-Robat line and has insisted that the line shall run either from Yezd or Kirman to the Gulf. This condition is absolute, and if the line be built it will follow this route. At present India favours Yezd rather than Kirman, but the latter is an important market and the question seems open. Bandar Abbas, as the objective on the Gulf, has the advantage of being established as a port; but it will never be a good port, and Chabar far surpasses it in natural advantages. Another Indian condition is a change of gauge either at Yezd or Kirman. While Persia is still an independent country it is reasonable to urge that it is not fitting that the Russian gauge should run to the Indian frontier. But I do not know that it is seriously argued that a change of gauge has an important, or any, strategic value, and the question of gauge seems capable of broader treatment. Why have anomalous gauges, either Russian or Indian, at all? Is it not reasonable to suggest that the modern world needs a standard gauge on all great trunk routes? England as an island can afford a private gauge, but if the Channel Tunnel were built the private gauge would be a public nuisance. And what traveller has not grumbled when he has had to leave his European express on entering Russia? When Count Achrenthal launched his Novi Bazar Railway project there was much ink spilt in Vienna in regretting that the Bosnian Railway had not been built on the Continental 1'435 metre gauge, and I was assured that some day, when the money could be found, this gauge would have to be introduced. The standard European gauge is also that of the Egyptian State railways, and although the temporary advantages of the Colonial gauges now employed in various parts of Africa are obvious, that continent will probably conform to the European system which has spread over Asia Minor. Thanks to this standard gauge men and mails can travel without a change from Ostend to Constantinople. In a few years' time, crossing the Bosphorus, they will be able to continue their journey to Baghdad and the Persian Gulf. The standard gauge will touch the Persian frontier at Khanikin, and Russia has pledged herself that the Persian railway system will be linked with Khanikin and thus with Baghdad. The adoption of the 1'435 metre gauge for the Trans-Persian Railway might thus be the best solution and avoid the somewhat awkward discussions that may arise over the change of gauge.

As to finance, those who declare the scheme impossible are rash in dogmatizing. It is said that the Russian Ministry of Finance is prepared to guarantee loans, but presumably only for the northern sections, out of the surplus revenues of the Russian State railways. If this be so it will greatly simplify the problem. A Persian kilometric guarantee is out of the question. In considering the commercial possibilities of the line, while it has to be admitted that a line from Khar Musa to Teheran and so to Russia has far greater attractions, it is well to remember the American maxim that there is nowhere serve a where it does not pay to build a railway. The proposed route would number of important towns and distributing centres and would undoubtedly carry much trade from the south. The Indian mail is an attractive prospect and so is the passenger traffic. There is an exceeding bitter cry from Anglo-Indians that in the matter of rates they are at present absolutely at the mercy of one steamship company. But if the line is to do a great international carrying trade from the north its Russian supporters seem to realize that Batum must be made a free port and the Russian transit duty abolished. On this the Moscow merchants have a word to say, and will undoubtedly say it. The Treaty of Berlin has been scattered to so many winds that it is perhaps pedantic to mention that Article 59 of that unfortunate document stipulates that Batumi shall be "a free port, essentially commercial."

There are, of course, yet other subjects for discussion in connexion with the Trans-Persian Railway project. Both parties will probably admit that the greatest Parliamentary experts on this subject are to be found in the House of Lords. They have so far preserved an admirable silence, but in time it will be their duty to make their opinions known.

British Interests in the Middle East.

MANY perplexing problems are confronting Great Britain in the Middle East to-day. Some of them are comparatively new, others are old problems in a new guise. Upon their right solution the safety of India may depend; and the safety and welfare of India are matters which nowadays concern, or should concern, the whole Empire. We cannot complain if India is being drawn more than ever into the sphere of international politics. It is no fresh development, for a hundred years ago the external relations of India were a subject of international attention. A great Dependency which keeps the Middle East in equipoise necessarily becomes involved in issues which are not domestic. When we think of India we should not think solely of her internal questions. We should remember that the Indian Empire stands amid "the grim dim thrones of the East," and that when neighbouring kingdoms are troubled, or fall into decay, those responsible for the control of India cannot always remain silent spectators of the difficulties of their neighbours. If, therefore, we would discern the future of India aright, we must, among other things, take note of what is happening in China, in Tibet, in Afghanistan, in Persia, in Arabia, and in Asiatic Turkey.

China and Tibet do not fall geographically into a survey of the affairs of the Middle East. All that need be said here of those countries is that, though the Chinese Revolution may at some future time have an unsettling effect upon the minds of the peoples of India, it does not yet seem to have done so; and that in the present efforts of the Tibetans to throw off the yoke of China, there can be no intervention on the part of Great Britain, because we have undertaken not to meddle with the affairs of Tibet. Our survey must therefore begin with Afghanistan, where the Amir is just now being menaced by a serious revolt. In Persia far larger issues are disclosed. Not only is the preservation of the Persian Monarchy of the utmost moment to Great Britain, but the new proposal for a Trans-Persian Railway to India raises questions which may conceivably complicate the whole policy of Indian defence. In Asiatic Turkey the latest plans for the completion of the Baghdad Railway present cognate problems of vital importance. In Arabia the repeated revolts of the Arab tribesmen against Turkish control touch Indian external policy very nearly. The object of this article is to give a concise explanation of the bearings of some of these questions so far as they effect Great Britain.

The Amir of Afghanistan is confronted by an awkward situation. Certain tribes under his rule, in the neighbourhood of the Indian frontier, have revolted, and all the district which has for its centre the town of Matur is in open rebellion. There is little doubt that the Amir will quell the insurrection, but experts believe that it will take him months to do it. His Army is not as efficient as it used to be, and the country in which it must operate is extremely difficult. It used to be said, as striking evidence of the solidity of King Habibullah's position, that he had never had a shot fired against him. This statement no longer holds good, and there is some reason to fear that the Amir's position is not likely to grow easier as the years pass. The common supposition that Habibullah is in some danger from his brother, Nasrullah Khan, who has great influence with the Afghan Army, is probably unjustified. Nasrullah Khan is well known in England, having spent some time in London on an official visit. While here he seemed fond of mundane pleasures, but of late years he has become an ascetic and the expounder of the most orthodox form of the Islamic creed. He stands for the old bitter Afghan spirit. Habibullah has more generous and progressive tendencies, and stands best with those of his subjects who favour reforms. The two brothers have a good understanding with each other.

There is common agreement among all shades of political thought regarding the value of Afghanistan as a buffer State. Great Britain has waged costly wars in pursuance of her policy of preserving Afghan independence, and placed the late Amir Abdur Rahman upon the throne that he held so firmly. The main reason why we have adhered to the buffer State policy is that we have always wished to prevent Russia from drawing near to India. The fact that north of Chitral the Indian and Russian frontiers are only separated by a narrow strip of Afghan territory does not really alter the success of our efforts. An invasion of India on an extensive scale by way of the Pamirs is practically impossible. Russia has expressly declared Afghanistan to be outside her sphere of influence, while Great Britain controls the external relations of the Amir, except in certain minor matters, and has given him definite assurances of protection.

While our relations with the Amir are not always very cordial, it is very much to our interest that he should remain on his throne. The improbable event of the present revolt threatening his security we should almost certainly go to his assistance, first claiming exemption in this special case from the general undertaking we have given to Russia not to interfere in the internal administration of Afghanistan.

The Amir's kingdom is to-day the most perfect working example in existence of the theory of buffer States. Some people think it is a little too perfect. Afghanistan is practically closed to foreigners, except a few technical advisers of the Amir and an occasional tradesman from Calcutta. Until recently it had no roads at all, and it does not possess a mile of railway. Many soldiers contend that if Afghanistan is to serve its proper purpose as a buffer State it ought to have good internal means of communication. We ought to be able to send an army by rail to Kabul, so that our troops could rapidly hold the passes in the mountain range beyond the Afghan capital if there came a menace from the north. We ought also to be able to send an army by rail north-westward from Quetta, through Kandahar to the plains of the Helmund, if not farther.

The question of railways thus at once emerges. The moment the problems of the Middle East are examined, railway projects immediately come into view. The whole Middle Eastern question is becoming more and more a question of railways. In the case of Afghanistan, men who are not soldiers argue with equal force in favour of its penetration by the locomotive. They insist that nowadays no country can surround itself with a ring fence and claim perpetual isolation. They point out that the time is coming when India must be connected by rail with Europe, and that the best and shortest route lies through Afghanistan. That particular contention is beyond dispute. If railway engineers had to give India communication with Europe to-morrow they would undoubtedly build their line, if they could do so, to Kandahar and Herat, and thereafter to Meshed and Teheran. That route is the coolest, and has the easiest gradients. Another argument in favour of Afghan railways is that they would develop the resources of the country. Afghanistan is terribly poor, but largely because it is so isolated.

On the other side it is urged that the Afghan policy of seclusion is the real secret of the success of the kingdom as a buffer State. Why, therefore, should we seek to press upon a reluctant country railways which might diminish its value to us? Our safest and simplest course lies in doing nothing to discourage the Afghan preference for being left alone, and the advantages we gain thereby outweigh the military reasons in favour of strategic railways to Kabul and beyond Kandahar. The last word—in fact, the only word—at present rests with the Amir, and his attitude is believed to be this. He says that since his visit to India he has fully realized the advantages of railways. He also knows full well that if his kingdom is to become strong it needs more wealth, and can only obtain it by developing its resources which in turn means better communications. But his people dislike the idea of railways and it is not wise for him to be too much in advance of them. Meanwhile, he is doing what he can by making good roads to the Khyber and elsewhere; and forced labour on these roads is one of the causes of the revolt.

The next country which claims attention is Persia, and here again we are immediately confronted by another railway question. The new Trans-Persian Railway project is the biggest issue which has affected British interests in the Middle East for two or three generations. At first sight it appears to strike at the root of some of the most generally accepted principles of British policy; but in examining it we must inquire whether those principles are as valid and as practicable as they were three or four decades ago. It may be that the Trans-Persian scheme is not quite so revolutionary as it seems. It may also, perhaps, be demonstrated that it represents tendencies which are inevitable and cannot be resisted. The Trans-Persian Railway is so incomparably the greatest question now concerning these regions that a great part of this article must be devoted to it. First, however, there are two preliminary points to be considered. One relates to the past attitude of Great Britain towards projects for railway connexion between India and Europe. The other refers to the general question of the isolation of India on the landward side.

In discussing the Trans-Persian Railway project it must not be forgotten that for some decades it was desired by Great Britain, not necessarily to establish direct railway connexion between India and Europe, but at any rate to build a railway part of the way thither. It is further notable that one of the avowed reasons of this desire was the fear of Russian aggression in the direction of India. The Euphrates Valley Railway scheme first came before the public in the reign of William IV., and the last time it was considered by a House of Commons Committee was in 1871-72. Its principal object was to convey troops and mails more rapidly to India. Only a line to the head of the Persian Gulf was contemplated, and the rest of the journey was to be performed by sea to Karachi and Bombay. Expeditions were sent to survey the route, and devoted men like General Chesney and Mr. W. P. Andrew toiled for years at the project. It was killed at last by the Suez Canal, for with a short sea route to India there was no longer any advantage to be gained by building a line through Asia Minor and Mesopotamia.

Nor is the Trans-Persian Railway really a new scheme. Though it never received from the British Government the same degree of countenance as the Euphrates Valley proposal, it was brought before the public long ago. The late Sir Henry Rawlinson, who was for years the leading exponent of British policy in the Middle East, and no friend of Russia, wrote in 1875 that "the completion of a longitudinal line through Persia from west to east—that is, from Baghdad to Herat—ought to enlist the common sympathies and support of all the European Powers, as an independent section of the continuous iron road which must before long unite the East and West." The precise alignment of the route does not very much matter here. The point is that obviously the prospect of a railway across Persia to India had no terrors for the men who devoted the best part of their lives to warning England against the dangers of a Russian advance towards India.

We come next to the question of India's isolation. People often talk and write as though India had been practically shut off from intercourse with the outside world until Europe broke down the barriers. The case is exactly the reverse, and the barriers are largely of European creation. There was a time when Indians did not even shrink from crossing the "Black Water." An Indian expedition, possibly more than one, colonized Java, and it was in Indian ships that the philosophy of Hindustan was carried to Japan. On land the mountain ranges were no obstacle to intercourse with the world without. The long and melancholy list of invasions of India is sufficient proof, but more convincing testimony is forthcoming. The route behind the hills of the Mekran coast, now being surveyed for the Trans-Persian Railway, was once one of the greatest highways of trade between East and West. Alexander and his retreating army were not plunging into an unknown wilderness when they turned westward from the Indus. They were following a trade route which existed long before their advent, and was used long after they vanished.

It was the arrival of Vasco da Gama by way of the Cape of Good Hope which set in motion the tendencies leading to India's isolation. Trade with the West left the land routes and took to the sea. The opening of the Suez Canal simply meant the creation of yet another marine highway. The route through Mekran was long deserted, and now has to be explored afresh. British policy gradually accentuated the tendency towards landward isolation, but only very gradually. Afghanistan was far better known to British officers 60 or 70 years ago than it is to-day. A young British officer, Eldred Pottinger, directed the defence of Herat against Persian besiegers in 1838. The growth of the buffer State policy slowly brought about the closing of Afghanistan to India. Even the principle that India must have no intimate communication with Tibet has only crystallized into a definite part of our policy within the last few years. Successive Governor-Generals, from Warren Hastings to Lord Curzon, sought to establish better relations with Tibet. It was Mr. Balfour's last Ministry that closed the door and Lord Morley locked it.

The landward isolation of India, then, is to a great extent the creation of Europe, but the suggestion that India should always be debarred from land communication with other countries is of quite recent growth. Despite the supposed military dangers, it was not a cardinal principle of policy during last century. So far as communication with Persia is concerned, it is manifestly no part of the official policy of the present British Government, as is shown by the favour extended to the Trans-Persian railway scheme. In those quarters where it is now contended that India should remain completely isolated, the contention is based either upon general hostility to Russia, or upon the sincere conviction that it will be dangerous to the system of Indian military defence to make a way through the deserts of South Eastern Persia and the arid valleys of Mekran. These contentions may be right or they may be wrong; but in so far as they are applied to any scheme for uniting India with Europe by rail, they are new.

The actual Trans-Persian railway project needs no detailed exposition, as the facts are already before the public. The project was initiated in Russia, but has now received strong support in Great Britain, while French capitalists will also participate. An association has been formed, in which British, French and Russian syndicates have equal representation. The association has a capital of £100,000, and its object is to conduct surveys and study the scheme upon the spot. No concession has yet been obtained from the Persian Government. The British and Russian Governments undertake no pecuniary liability. The estimated cost of the line is £20,000,000. After skirting the shores of the Caspian, it will run to Teheran, thence to Ispahan and Kerman, emerging on the shores of the Indian Ocean either at Chahbar or Gwadar, or at Gwettar Bay, on the Mekran coast. The Indian terminus will be at Karachi.

It has been said already that this is not the best route to Europe, which lies through Afghanistan. The Mekran route is longer and the gradients are more difficult; but the great objection is that it is far hotter. The heat question may, however, very easily be exaggerated. Any one who goes to India, during most months of the year, must be prepared to face heat on the way thither. The Red Sea is never very cool, and sometimes fiercely hot, and an inside cabin on an ocean liner is probably worse than a railway carriage will be in Mekran in May. The Kandahar-Herat route would not enable the traveller to escape the high temperatures of Baluchistan, and the Mekran portion of the journey can hardly be more trying than the railway run from Calcutta to Bombay or Karachi just before the monsoon has broken. A journey by rail to India is going to be hot; but on the sea route there are no icebergs.

The Mekran route offers better opportunities of local traffic than Afghanistan, because it will pass through such distributing centres as Kerman and Ispahan. Great trunk lines are chiefly supported by local traffic and not by through traffic. Whether the local traffic will ever be sufficient to make a Trans-Persian line profitable is quite another question. The whole population of Persia is under ten millions. The line only serves two really important cities after leaving Teheran. Ispahan has 80,000 inhabitants and Kerman 60,000. Both Persian and British Mekran are almost uninhabited. The whole population of British Mekran is estimated to be only 78,000, scattered over a very large area. Compare these figures with the population of the rich and fertile province of Manchuria, which had 16 million inhabitants when the Russians began to make the Eastern Chinese Railway. That section of the Siberian line showed a profit from the time it was opened, if the heavy military charges are deducted.

The question of profits is, however, a matter for the promoters rather than for students of politics. It may be contended with greater force that the line will probably tend to assist in the maintenance of British policy in Persia. Whatever impetuous American gentlemen may say, the one honest and sincere object of Great Britain in Persia is the preservation of an independent Persian nation. We have striven towards that end for a hundred years. We do so because it is the natural corollary of our policy of buffer States. The chief cause of the troubles in Persia is the gradual weakening of the central authorities. They are weak because their resources are diminishing and because they cannot dominate the distant provinces. If the Teheran Government had rapid means of communication we should hear less of revolts in Fars and the eastern provinces. Roads will never save Persia now: she must have railways.

The supporters of the scheme further dwell upon the impossibility of shutting India off from the railways of other countries. It is contrary to the whole trend of the world's development, and specially contrary to the processes now at work throughout the whole of Asia. The French are carrying lines from the Tongking coast into the very heart of Yunnan. China is being covered with a network of railways. The Baghdad Railway will certainly be built. The Turks have actually made a line through desolate Arabia to Medina. Only Great Britain lags behind. We will not even make a railway to the Aden Hinterland. We refuse to entertain the suggestion to give India access by rail to the Yangtze Valley. So backward are we that we have never made a railway between India and Burma. Can we continue to resist tendencies which are inevitable? Can we be obstinately conservative and say that people must for evermore take 14 days to go from India to England by sea, when they might soon go by rail in seven days? This much is certain—that we can do nothing to prevent Russia from making a railway to Teheran and Ispahan, for both cities lie within the Russian sphere of influence as laid down by the Anglo-Russian Convention.

Let us now look at the other side of the shield. The opponents of the Trans-Persian Railway can make out a very powerful case. They want to know why Russia is so eager to make a railway across Persia which will manifestly not pay. A railway in Persia will possibly mean troops guarding the line, as in Manchuria; and railway guards are generally the prelude to absorption. Railways which are practically under foreign control will not strengthen the hands of the Teheran Government, but will rather mean more foreign interference than ever. Then there is the military class of objection. Some soldiers, and many laymen, declare that the Trans-Persian scheme will undermine the whole policy on which the land defence of India is based. We have talked without ceasing to make Afghanistan a buffer State. Mr. Gladstone nearly went to war with Russia about Penjdeh, with the approval of the founders of the modern school of Imperialism. We have created a great fortress at Quetta to guard the southern approach to India. We have relied upon the deserts of Eastern Persia to prevent a Russian advance on India from that direction. Our Imperialists have waxed indignant when a few stray Cossacks have appeared on the beach at Bunder Abbas. For 50 years a host of writers, with Vambéry, Malleson and Marvin at their head, have bidden us beware of letting Russia draw nearer India. And now, it is urged, the Government, without consulting Parliament, have practically blessed a scheme which sets at naught all that the creators of the defences of India have tried to do; while publicists, who in the past have fervidly denounced the Russian menace, join in pronouncing benedictions on the Trans-Persian Railway.

Thus say the objectors, but they must be heard a little further. They proceed to remark:—"Ten years ago Lord Kitchener based the urgency of his proposed scheme of military reforms in India upon the sudden revelation that the Russians had completed their Orenburg-Tashkent Railway. Mr. Balfour sounded that same note in a memorable speech in the House of Commons in 1905. Now the Government practically decide to help Russia to build a railway which not only destroys all the value of Afghanistan as a buffer State, but spans the Persian deserts, turns the flank of Quetta and actually enters India. The proposed precautionary break of gauge at Ispahan and elsewhere is no precaution at all. The gauge of a railway can soon be altered. The expedient of taking the line along the Mekran coast, so that it can be commanded by the British fleet, is no precaution either. It is almost impossible to destroy a railway, and the few ships we keep in Indian waters are of no fighting value."

The supporters may be permitted a closing rejoinder. They answer somewhat to this effect:—"The soldiers have always wanted a railway to Kabul, and another to Kandahar, with a possible extension towards Herat. The rails for the Kandahar line were actually collected at Chaman. A line which was meant to turn the Khyber pass was positively built some years ago, and has only recently been torn up. Lord Curzon built a line westward from Quetta to Nushki, and talked of carrying it to the Persian province of Seistan. It is a fallacy of recent growth to suppose that the Indian defence scheme was ever based upon the postulate that railways were never to be carried over the western frontiers of India. Lord Kitchener was alarmed at the rapid completion of the Orenburg-Tashkent Railway, because at that time relations between Great Britain and Russia were strained, and it was honestly believed that Russia meant to try to absorb Afghanistan. The Triple Entente has changed the situation; but whether the Entente endures or not, we cannot take up the archaic position of saying that India shall for ever be isolated by land. The assumption that the line will bring Persia under Russian control is unjustifiable; and as for the deserts, we first talked of spanning them ourselves with the Seistan Railway.

There this very knotty question must be left.

The railway issue apart, British policy in Persia presents some awkward conundrums which can only be tersely indicated, though they are the subject of much not very profitable disputation. There is a school of publicists in Great Britain which in effect claims to be specially pro-Persian. It condemns the British Government for pursuing in Persia a policy identical in principle with that of Russia. It alleges that the real aim of Russia is the absorption of Northern Persia and that meanwhile Russia's object is to keep Persia as weak as possible. It usually depicts Great Britain as the foolish and unconscious tool of Russian diplomacy; but some foreign critics, such as Mr. Shuster, go further, and allege that the British Government are privy to the nefarious designs of St. Petersburg, and in practice abet them. The extreme pro-Persians do not, however, make any practical suggestions as to how the supposed designs of Russia are to be frustrated.

The condition of Southern Persia forms a further subject of controversy, rather different in character. Southern Persia is at present in a state closely approximating to anarchy. Its trade routes are in the hands of freebooters, the transportation of merchandise is impossible, life is everywhere unsafe, and there is no strong control even in the cities. British merchants protest and call for intervention. Others say that Great Britain should occupy Southern Persia, because we cannot afford to see a great region in close proximity to India given over to lawlessness. The pro-Persians, however, object to the British Government doing anything in Southern Persia. They say it must be let alone.

It may be stated as an indisputable fact—and this is not a matter of pros and cons—that Great Britain does not want to acquire, or even to occupy, a single inch of Persian territory. All our efforts are sincerely directed towards the preservation of the integrity and independence of Persia. Whether they are always directed in a manner best calculated to accomplish this object must be a matter of opinion. Those who speak for the British Government say:—"What would you have us do? We have made an Agreement with Russia about Persia, and in our belief she has faithfully adhered to its terms. Her borders march with the more populous parts of Persia, and therefore she has had to intervene more often than we have done during this period of disorder; but she is withdrawing her garrisons in Persia and is otherwise fulfilling her undertakings. Our good understanding with Russia enables us to attain our object of preserving Persia. Without it, what could we do? If we were at cross purposes with Russia, she could occupy Teheran to-morrow and we could not prevent her. As for the south, it is true that its condition is deplorable, but we cannot take over the administration of an enormous area without consenting to a Russian occupation of the north. Military expeditions in Southern Persia to punish the raiding tribesmen would inevitably lead to administration, for the first result of the landing of a large British force would be that the Teheran Government would collapse. We cannot meddle too much with Southern Persia because we are already controlling in the Indian Empire an area of $1\frac{3}{4}$ million square miles and a population of 315 millions, with a force that is small enough for our needs. We are, however, doing what we can to help Persia. In conjunction with Russia we are lending her a little money so that she may organize forces to restore order in the south."

It will be gathered that just now there are few bright gleams in the Persian situation.

It is not possible to set forth the Baghdad Railway issue with the same amplitude as the Trans-Persian scheme. The necessity is less because the arguments are better known. The German holders of the concession for the Baghdad Railway had the right to build the final section from Baghdad to Basra; but they surrendered it in exchange for other concessions, including the right to build a harbour at Alexandretta. The question of building the final section thus entered upon a fresh phase, and the British Government have been negotiating with the Porte for many months on the subject.

Public opinion in Great Britain shows a marked cleavage on the Baghdad Railway question, and the dividing line appears to be drawn between those who favour more intimate relations with Germany and those who mistrust German policy and hold that it aims at weakening or destroying the Triple Entente. The actual merits or demerits of the railway scheme itself are thus often obscured, though the opponents of British participation are also disposed to condemn the scheme on the ground that it is not a good business project. The supporters of participation urge that this was originally a British proposal, and that, therefore, we should take the opportunity of joining in it. International control gives us a better chance of preserving our paramountcy in the Persian Gulf than complete abstention. Our refusal to participate has long been a cause of friction between Germany and ourselves; and our unwillingness to assent to the raising of the Turkish Customs in order to provide kilometeric guarantees for the line has tended to obstruct its completion. If we join with Germany in completing an enterprise which she has very much at heart, we shall thereby promote a better understanding between the two nations. We shall do no harm to our own interests and may conceivably do them some good. The line will in any case be made, and we had better have a share in it rather than remain outside. If we join with Russia in the Trans-Persian scheme we cannot logically decline to become a partner in the Baghdad scheme also.

The opponents of participation come forward with a ready answer to the last-named point. The Trans-Persian scheme, they say, does provide a short cut by rail from India to Europe. The Baghdad scheme does not, has long ceased to pretend to do so, and will never carry either Indian passengers or mails. It is true that Great Britain long dallied with the project for the construction of the Euphrates Valley Railway, but that was in the days when it was hoped to make it a short route for mails and troops. The opening of the Suez Canal killed British interest in the Euphrates Valley scheme and it has never since revived. Direct issue is joined over the suggestion that the Baghdad Railway has been a cause of friction between Germany and Great Britain. If, it is asked, that there has been friction, who has made it? Has Great Britain ever done anything to stop the construction of the Baghdad line? How could she stop it? So long as the line remains within Turkish territory, she could not prevent its construction, and has never sought to do so. One answer to the point about the Turkish Customs is that as the earlier sections of the line are now freed from kilometeric guarantees, the money thus released should now be available to guarantee the later sections. Many who object to British participation profess to look with suspicion upon Germany's insistent desire to have a terminus at Koweit. The natural commercial terminus of a line which claims to be commercial is admitted to be Basra. Why does Germany want to cross the desert to Koweit? May not Turkish aggression, inspired by Germany, turn Koweit into a fortified base when we are in difficulties elsewhere, and thus destroy our paramountcy in the Gulf? Other objectors base their opposition mainly on the business ground that the line will be unprofitable.—The Times.

News of the Week.

The situation in Albania is regarded in Constantinople with considerable anxiety. Soldiers who recently deserted at Monastir, Ochrida and Perlept were mostly Albanians, but apparently they were actuated by strong political discontent. They resent particularly the interference of the Committee of Union and Progress in the last elections and demand the dismissal of the Minister Talaat Djavid. It is evident that a secret organisation similar to that of the Young Turks in 1908 exists with branches at Constantinople, Monastir and Salonika.

Reuter wired from Constantinople:—The Chamber of Deputies has voted a Bill hurriedly introduced by the Government which places penalty on officers and soldiers taking part in politics.

Reuter wired from Rome on the 29th June:—Fierce fighting has taken place at Bukamash. The Italians at dawn, supported by the artillery, attacked six thousand Turks, who were entrenched at Sidi Said. They drove them out of the trenches. The Turks left five hundred dead. Simultaneously the Italians executed a flanking movement and rushed and destroyed the base camp of the Turks. The Italian casualties were 20 killed and 112 wounded.

Reuter wired from Rome:—The news of the Italian victory at Sidi Said was hailed with immense enthusiasm and scenes of patriotic fervour in Parliament.

Reuter wired from Rome:—An official telegram states that fighting was renewed at Sidi Said on the 28th June. Masses of Turks and Arabs who had been heavily reinforced were discovered in deep entrenchments. The whole of the Italian division bombarded their position assisted by three warships and then assaulted it at the point of the bayonet. The Turks were routed and left two hundred dead. The Italians had 10 killed and 78 wounded. A corrected list of the Italian dead in the fighting on the 27th places the number at twenty-nine.

Reuter wired from Tunis:—Of the rioters arrested in connection with the disturbances in Tunis in November last seven have been sentenced to death, five to hard labour and twenty to terms of imprisonment. Thirty-six were acquitted.

The contract given to Messrs. John Jackson and Co. in May in connection with the Mesopotamia irrigation scheme has been withdrawn, owing to conditions imposed by the Minister of Public Works.

A Times message from Salonika states that troops sent to suppress the military revolt in Monastir are encamped outside the town. It is stated that they have resolved not to fire on their comrades. Eight more battalions are en route from the Dardanelles.

Constantinople, June 12.

The Sabah and other journals publish with bitter comments a list, supplied by private informants, of Arabs of the Sahel and Meneshe districts killed by the Italian soldiery. According to the list, which gives the names and ages of the victims, 13 men and boys and 22 women and girls were killed, 12 women were violated, several of whom were afterwards killed, and some 60 persons of both sexes were wounded.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

According to Turkish official advices two encounters took place at the end of last month in the neighbourhood of Tobrouk. In the first the Italian's losses were one officer wounded and six soldiers killed. In the second encounter the Italians retreated after sustaining serious losses.

May 3.

At yesterday's meeting of the Cabinet it was decided to increase the property tax by 25 per cent. in order to meet in part the extraordinary expenditure occasioned by the Italo-Turkish War. This increase of the property tax is only provisional but it will be probably levied so long as the hostilities last.

In official quarters the hope is expressed that the tax will be well received, and it is stated that already numerous telegrams have been received from the provinces announcing that the people themselves demand the institution of a war-tax.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 13.

A Government Bill for the imposition of new taxes to meet the expenses of the war will shortly be submitted to the Chamber of Deputies. The Government's proposals are known to involve a 25 per cent. increase in the taxes on rural and urban property and in the Tenettu or professional tax. The military exemption tax will also be raised.

Nothing is definitely known as to the remainder of the Cabinet's financial programme, but the fact that it proposes to raise from £1,500,000 to £2,000,000 of new revenue justifies the belief that an increase of other categories of taxation is contemplated.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, June 10.

Later despatches from Tripoli show that the action at Zanzur was of considerable importance. The number of the enemy engaged is computed at over 12,000 and their loss at more than 500 killed, according to the official version, though some accounts give double that number. The Italian loss is said to be relatively slight. The battle was fought over a very extended front of almost eight miles with varying intensity. The enemy showed the greatest determination and tenacity, a proof of which is given in the fact that most of the dead were killed by the bayonet.

The Tribuna remarks to night that the moral effect of this victory is even more important than the material. It disproves the legend of the extraordinary mobility of the Arab forces and the impossibility of meeting them at close quarters, and on the other hand shows that the Italian soldier, even after a long march in the Tripolitan summer, is more than a match for his foes.

Tripoli May.

The Italians this morning occupied the shrine of Sidi Abd el-Djellil, near the Zanzur oasis.

The Tripoli telegram appears to make it clear that Zanzur, which is about 12 miles west of the town of Tripoli, was not occupied by the Italians. The shrine of the saint Abd el-Djellil lies a mile or two to the east of Zanzur. Gargaresh is half-way between the latter town and Tripoli.

Salonika, June 9.

The latest report from the Ipek district states that the Albanian rebels have dispersed and returned to their homes; that all the positions of strategic value have been occupied by the Turkish troops and that the Mitrovitz-Ipek and Djakova-Ipek routes are open to traffic. In order to calm the existing excitement, a proclamation has been distributed granting an amnesty to all concerned in the recent rising on condition that they do not again take up arms.

Isa Boletinatz, with a following of 150 Albanians, is said to have gained the mountains of Ragosna. As regards Hassan Bey, the ex-Deputy for Prishtina, it is rumoured at Uskub that he has crossed the frontier into Montenegro with the object of directing a more general revolt from Cettigne.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GARDIAN.")

The Constantinople correspondent of the Kölnische Zeitung communicates to his paper some details of the scheme for the re-organisation of the gendarmerie which has been taken in hand by the Turkish Government. It is contemplated to establish at Salonika the headquarters for the Gendarmerie Corps, which will operate throughout European Turkey, with the exception of the provinces of Constantinople and Adrianople. The chief will have the rank of a general and the rights of a commander of a corps in time of war. The general staff will include three European officers, probably French and English. The chief will have under him sectional officers at Salonika, Uskub, Monastir, Janina and Scutari. The whole force will consist of 16,000 men, divided into flying command ever ready to proceed against the bands. The commander-in-chief will have full power to deal with the situation as it arises, without consulting Constantinople. He will also have the right to call upon officers commanding the regular troops to assist him in carrying out his measures. To this end special detachments of volunteers will be formed and suitably trained in the regiments.

Athens, June 7.

To-day a deputation of Aegean islanders presented a memorandum to the Legations of Great Powers here. The document points out that the autonomous rights which the islands had enjoyed for centuries had been suppressed, but were now restored by the Italian occupation. These privileges were first violated by the Turks after the departure of the Russian fleet which had occupied the Islands from 1769 to 1774. The memorandum also recalls how Greeks in the European villayets of Turkey were punished after the departure of the Russian army in 1878 because they had welcomed the army of a Christian nation. The islanders now implore the signatory Powers to the Treaties of Paris and Berlin to protect them against similar reprisals should territorial changes in the Aegean take place. The islanders desire to record their protest against the injustice done them after the battle of Navarino when other islands were liberated.

The committee of islanders will shortly address to the Great Powers a full memorandum setting forth the local privileges formerly accorded them, including the unrestricted jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarch regarding religious affairs.

St. Petersburg, June 7.

A well-defined rumour is current here that Italy will shortly cede to Germany one of the islands she has occupied in the Aegean. The Novos Vremya, in a leading article, foresees the tardy awakening of Turkey to the real character of her alleged friends and intimates that Russia is playing a dangerous game in espousing the cause of the Triple Alliance.

Mytilene, June 5.

In the fertile island of Mytilene everybody is going about his avocations as usual, although I am informed that commerce has suffered considerably through the war. Italian occupation is not expected for the present. The Turkish troops, however, have withdrawn to mountainous positions in the interior. There are 3,000 regulars and 1,500 volunteers. Some arms have been distributed to the Turkish population, who number 15,000 out of a total of 150,000. Almost all the young Greeks liable to military service have already left the island. The main Turkish army is some 15 miles in the interior. The position is one impossible for the Italian guns to locate from the coast, but is accessible by well-engineered, though badly-kept roads. Two magnificent natural harbours, formed by the Gulfs of Kaloni and Lero, should act as a bait to the Italians. Both, however, have very narrow entrances—Kaloni's navigable channel is only 300 feet broad. This 100 Turkish soldiers are engaged in blocking up with stones blasted from neighbouring rocks.

Chios, June 1.

An order has been promulgated that all Italian subjects must leave the island within a fortnight from 30th May. All the Turkish Judges and Kadis and almost all the other officials have left Chios. The repeated threat and postponement of the Italian attack are proving almost as harassing to the Christian inhabitants as to the Turkish authorities. According to information received from Mytilene the Turkish troops in the island number 4,000. They have been withdrawn into the interior. On 28th May an Italian torpedo-boat passed within three miles of the island going north. On the following day telegraphic communication with the mainland was broken off. No immediate attack by the Italian fleet is anticipated.

The Greek captain of the steamer Xanthi, of the Destouni Yannoulatos Line, reports that immediately after he had left the port of Smyrna about noon on Wednesday, 29th May, there occurred within 50 yards of his ship an explosion in water caused either by a floating mine or by a torpedo directed from a neighbouring Turkish fort. The Xanthi was not damaged.

Smyrna, June 3.

On 30th May two Italian sailors were killed by Turks on shore at Scalanova on the coast of Asia Minor east of Samos. An Italian bombardment followed. It is supposed that the Turkish authorities were withdrawing the troops from Samos to the mainland and that an Italian torpedo-boat destroyer intervened. All the Italian subjects, numbering about 6,000, have now left Smyrna.

The delegates of the International Commission for the protection of the Smyrna trade are forwarding to the Embassies of the Great Powers at Constantinople a circular pointing out that grave injury will result to Smyrna from a blockade of the town by the Italian fleet and urging the Powers to obtain from Italy a promise to refrain from such a measure. The next few months are the busy season of the trade, which employs 80,000 hands, whose earnings in July, August and September practically constitute their means of livelihood for the whole year.

Constantinople, June 8.

Following on the order recently placed for two aeroplanes to be built in England, it is now stated that H.E. Marshal Ghazi Ahmed Moukhtar Pasha, the President of the Senate, together with his son, Moukhtar Pasha, ex-Minister of Marine, have decided to purchase three aeroplanes, which they will present to the Ministry of War. It also stated that another member of the Upper Chamber will propose that the Senators abandon one-half of their salaries during a year for the benefit of the new arm. While I have not had this news confirmed, I repeat it as showing that attention is now being turned in this direction, and in view of what has been accomplished by public subscription by the Navy League in the purchase of two battleships, four torpedo craft, several transports, it would be well if British aeroplane makers kept the possibilities of this market before them. As bearing upon this subject it is announced that two Turkish Army officers who were in Paris studying aviation have just successfully passed the examination of the Aero Club.

Defence of Smyrna.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 7.

THE Italian Fleet continues to observe Chios and other islands, but has not undertaken any offensive action for the last three weeks, with the exception of a raid upon the shipping in the little port of Scalanova. The Turkish military authorities are, however, convinced that the present calm is but the prelude to joint military and naval action on a large scale on the Asiatic coasts of the Aegean, and have in consequence begun to concentrate large forces at Smyrna with the object of meeting any attempt to capture the town. Their knowledge that considerable Italian forces are assembled at Rhodes and that the Italian Press, doubtless with the object of throwing dust in Turkish and other eyes, recently hinted that a force estimated at 35,000 men was about to be transported from Tripoli to the Derna-Benghazi side of the African theatre of war inspires them with the belief that a descent on the coast of Anatolia is more than probable. The present season is eminently unfavourable for operations in Cyrenaica, and the latest information in the hands of the Turkish General Staff goes to show that the troops required for the "expedition into the interior" were really sent from Italian ports to Tobruk, which was used as the place of assembly for the expedition which recently captured Rhodes, and where the Italian garrison is at present exceptionally inactive.

It is impossible to give an exact estimate of the strength of the forces mobilized for the defence of Smyrna, but it is known that the best part of three Redif divisions have been called out in the course of the last two months for the defence of the coast and the 2nd Division of the 1st Army Corps is preparing to leave for Smyrna by rail. It is rumoured that two more Nizam divisions have been warned for mobilization, and in any case the number of troops shortly to be concentrated in Smyrna is likely to exceed 40,000 effectives.

Another possibility discussed in Turkish military circles is a raid by the Italian expeditionary force on Adalia, Marmaris, or other points on the Asiatic coast which are weakly garrisoned and owing to the lack of good communications cannot easily be reached by troops from Smyrna, Konia and other important military centres. The partisans of this theory maintain that the fact that strong reinforcements can be sent by rail to Smyrna from the capital and elsewhere in comparatively short time, though not excluding the possibility of a naval raid, renders a military attack on the town and adjoining district improbable, and believe that the rumours that it is impending are intended to assist the enemy to divert attention from his real objective. The situation is, indeed, an admirable object-lesson in the importance and value of sea power.

LATER.

It is officially reported that Italian warships have appeared off Gulek and Marmaris.

The Turkish Political Situation.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 6.

THE Italians, after occupying Rhodes and the neighbouring islands, have allowed a considerable period to elapse before proceeding to the occupation of the more northerly islands. Whether this delay is due to a concentration of forces with the object of making the occupation more effective or whether it is due to objections raised by the Powers, military operations in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles are questions that are now being discussed without any great display of animation by the Turkish Press. One theory is that the Italians, seeing that the occupation of Rhodes has not had the anticipated impression on Turkish public opinion, are preparing a more effective stroke, say, a descent on the coasts of Asia Minor. It is difficult to see which part of the coast of Asia Minor, apart from the neighbourhood of Smyrna, an Italian descent would produce a great impression, and European commercial interests are so strongly represented in Smyrna that it may be imagined that the Italian Government will continue to hesitate before taking such a step. It is stated here that the Italians have already concentrated 50,000 troops in Rhodes, and the number seems to suggest military operations of a somewhat extended character. In any case the Turkish Government has taken the precaution of transferring this week the Second Division from Constantinople to Cheshnie, the First Division having been sent last week to Albania. In the meantime half the available fleet of lighters has been employed in transporting military stores to the fortifications in the neighbourhood of Constantinople.

An article in the Hakk, in which this organ of the extremely Nationalist section of the Committee of Union and Progress suggested that the Turkish Fleet should go out into the Aegean and, like the fleet of Admiral Rozhdestvensky, risk annihilation in a last heroic attack on the enemy, has caused some excitement among naval officers, which the Minister of Marine tried to allay in the course of a visit to the Dardanelles. It is reported to-day that the members of the War Council of the Ministry of Marine have resigned in a body. These perturbations in the fleet only slightly affect the general political situation, but they will increase the difficulties with which Admiral Lympus is confronted in the task of re-organising the Navy.

Will the present Cabinet remain in office? This is a question that is exciting some discussion at present, though matters have not as yet come to a crisis. Difficulties have arisen in the new Parliament rather sooner than was anticipated. At last Saturday's sitting several Young Turkish Deputies severely criticised the Government amendment to the Assemblies Law forbidding open-air meetings. And at a meeting of the Young Turkish Parliamentary Group this week, 102 out of a total of 126 deputies voted against a further modification of the Constitution giving the Sultan almost unlimited power to dissolve the Chamber. It remains to be seen whether this interesting divergency of views will develop into an acute conflict, or whether both sides will agree for the present to a compromise in view of the external situation.

Italian War News.

THE Italian Commander at Sidi Said has a distinctive style in despatch-writing that make his efforts a sort of guessing competition. On Friday he reported that the Italians had driven 6,000 Turks from an entrenched position at Sidi Said and that the defenders left 500 dead behind them. The Italian casualties, by the way, were 20 killed and 112 wounded. One may pause here to congratulate the Italians upon their superb marksmanship which far excels that of any other army in the world. Then it appears, the fighting was resumed on Saturday on account of masses of Turks and Arabs being "discovered in the trenches." How they got there is a mystery, for the average person, knowing that the position had been captured by the Italians, would imagine that they would garrison and hold it. But perhaps some of the 500 dead came to life and the Italians left for their health. However, our ingenuous commander passes lightly over this difficult point, and rushes on to announce that the trenches had been again captured. But he is more merciful this time and the Turks only lose 200 killed and the Italians 10 killed and 78 wounded.—The Empire.

Italian Views on the Situation.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, May 29.

A TEMPORARY lull in actual military operations has tempted the Italian Press to discuss the present situation of the war. The result is somewhat negative; no newspaper is apparently able to arrive at any definite suggestion of a possible end of hostilities. Public opinion, as displayed in the Press, seems to follow two different currents—one that professes satisfaction with the manner in which the war is being conducted, and the other criticising, to-day rather vigorously, the alleged inaction of the chief command in Tripoli. It need hardly be said that the latter current is restricted to the Opposition journals, notably the Giornale d'Italia of Rome, and that a good deal of this criticism is not more reasonable than that which is ordinarily addressed by an Opposition newspaper to a Government in office. Nevertheless the position of the malcontents is not ill-founded and their arguments a good deal more logical than any that have been brought to the Government's defence. What is the use, asks the Giornale d'Italia, of keeping a large army in Tripoli almost entirely inactive? The object of the Italian campaign was the conquest of Tripoli, and Tripoli seems to be the one place where no effort is being made. The brilliance, even the utility, of the victory gained by General Ameglio in Rhodes is not denied. It is amply proved that Italian officers know how to lead and Italian soldiers how to fight, witness the skill and valour shown, not only in Rhodes, but also in Bu-Kamesh. Why, then, is no serious attempt made to bring the war to an end, in the only decisive quarter, by a real advance beyond the trenches of Tripoli? The Giornale d'Italia discusses the pros and cons of such an advance in a fairly exhaustive fashion and quotes other authority in support of its view. In short it represents the views of those Italians, among whom are the great majority of Italian officers, who believe that Italy can finish the war by her own exertions and are longing to see a fair chance given to her army. A good many very competent foreign critics are entirely of the same opinion.

The whole question of the future issue of the war practically rests upon that of action or inaction in Tripoli. The diversions made by the Italian Fleet in the Aegean, if they were part of another definite and settled plan, might possibly lead to another issue. But no one believes that the Government has any settled plan of campaign in those waters, and it is very difficult to conjecture what plan they could possibly entertain. Meanwhile the Ministerial newspapers are full of rumours of intervention by the European Powers, strenuously objecting to anything in the form of a Conference—which apparently has been suggested in no quarter—and more than insinuating that they would welcome the mediation of a single friendly Power should such a Power, Russia for instance, undertake the duty of making peace. But it is carefully explained that the duty of that Power would be limited to putting pressure on one of the belligerents, Turkey, and persuading her that she was virtually beaten and had no other resource than to accept the accomplished fact. And here lies really the difference that divides public opinion in Italy. The Giornale d'Italia and more enlightened newspapers are willing to recognize that the fact is not accomplished yet. The Ministerial supporters seem to think they can persuade Europe that it is accomplished without the trouble of further expenditure of men and money.

The Italian Epitaphs.

THE account of the recent fighting at Homs that has been received by the editor of the Comrade and is published in our columns to-day vividly emphasizes the great discrepancies between the Turkish and Italian reports of the progress of the war. Our chief regret is that the two sides of the case are never simultaneously presented, for the Italian correspondents, whether veracious or not, obtain by priority of publication an advantage to which they are not entitled. That, however, is inevitable, and perhaps it does not after all make much difference. The reading public, outside Italy, has long ago learned that the despatches published in Italy are, to be believed as readily as an epitaph—and this is so, not because of the corrective afforded by other sources of information, so much as on account of the inherent impossibility of the Italian tale. According to the Italians, the small Turkish force in Tripoli—including Enver Bey—has been killed several times over, the Arabs have either been slain or won over to the invader—attracted by hospitals and other manifestations of Italian civilisation; and yet the fighting goes on and the hosts of Rome still occupy but a narrow strip of sandy coast.—The Times of India.

The Italians and Enver Bey.

THE mother of Enver Bey, the hero of the Ottoman revolution who is now fighting the Italians at Benghazi, relates some exciting experiences.

A few weeks ago a special message came to her through her son's war companion, Eshref Bey, who arrived in Cairo with a few wounded soldiers. He brought her a photograph of her son and a number of costly presents, also a camel of especial vigour and beauty, destined by Enver Bey for the Khalif.

Soon afterwards Enver Bey's mother and Eshref Bey started for Constantinople. They had to travel under special precautions, as the Italians got wind of her having received important information from her son. At one time the Italians thought Enver Bey himself was in her company. She obtained a passport bearing the name of Hanih Hanoum, the companion to the Khedive's wife, and she and those who accompanied her put on Arab costumes.

They left secretly on the Ismailia, of the Khedivial Mail Line. Not far from Crete the steamer was stopped by a cruising Italian warship. The officers of the latter went on the Ismailia and asked for the passports. This was a very trying moment for Enver Bey's mother, as she and her companions had concealed below their luggage important information concerning Italian war equipment.

At the critical moment, however, everything passed off well. The Italian officers were unable to discover anything suspicious. It was amusing to see them comparing a photograph of Enver Bey in their possession with every male passenger on board. They had heard that the young Ottoman hero was returning to Constantinople wounded, and they intended to capture him.

Near the Piræus the ship was again stopped by an Italian cruiser. This time the officers of the latter found the photograph of Enver Bey, but they did not recognise in the bearded image the youthful commander of Benghazi who was clean-shaven when he had left Berlin for Africa. One of the passengers on the Ismailia, Sadyk Bey, who resembles Enver Bey, was submitted by the Italians to a very strict inquiry.

Enver Bey's mother and Eshref Bey arrived at Dedeagatch without further trouble.

Turkey's Arab Problem.

(FROM A "NEAR EAST" CORRESPONDENT.)

IN the course of an interview with Colonel Ihssan Bey the Etat Major of the Yemen Corps, some statements were elicited that are certain to interest your readers, who cannot be indifferent to the political destinies of Arabia. Colonel Ihssan Bey, who knows personally Aziz Bey, the Egyptian leader of the Derna forces that have fought so valiantly against the Italians, declares that it is mainly due to his loyalty and wisdom, and to the peaceful intentions with which he has been able to inspire General Izzet Pasha, that the entente between the Ottoman Government and the Imam Yahya has at last been concluded. It is, moreover, thanks to Aziz Bey's personal charm of manner and persuasive powers, that the Imam has been influenced in the direction of peace, thus further facilitating the progress of the negotiations between him and the Turkish General.

The principal reason of the conflict that developed into open and prolonged warfare between the Imam and the Ottoman Government is alleged to have been connected with the Imam's seal. Before the entente the seal bore the inscription: "May Allah make him victorious," and at the bottom, in the shape of a crescent, "As Sayed Yahya Ibn Mohammed Hamid Eddine, the Prince of the Faithful (Emir El Mu'mineen) who lays his trust in Allah, the Lord of Creation." Now the seal has been modified thus: "Imam of the Zaidiehs, Es Sayed Yahya Ibn Mohammed Hamid Eddine." And it is not strange that for this mere inscription the Ottoman Government risked such onerous and bloody wars; for it implied an actual disavowal of the spiritual, if not of the temporal, authority of the Sultan as Caliph; and, but for the declaration of war by an infidel nation, such a renunciation of spiritual claims, supported by historical and traditional evidence, might have never been made. As it is, out of the 60,000 soldiers sent by the Ottoman Government to subdue the Yemen revolt, about 6,000 are acknowledged to have perished, mostly from epidemic diseases.

By virtue of the new treaty of peace the Imam now receives £11,100 per month, and the leading sheikhs of the Yemen tribes also receive allowances according to the degree of their influence. As soon as the treaty was concluded, the Imam distributed a manifesto among the friendly tribes warning them against rebellion and aggression, and counselling them to relinquish any hostile action against the Ottoman Government and to devote their energies to the tilling of the soil. It may here be parenthetically remarked that the Ottoman Government has been seeking, with special interest, to get the Arabs both in Arabia and Syria to settle down in fixed localities for agricultural pursuits, because it realised that so long as the Arab led the nomadic life he remained an invincible, elusive, and unavailable force. According to Ihssan Bey, Turkish troops now move about throughout the Yemen Province in perfect security. The tax collectors are appointed by the Imam, and constitute at the same time a force of gendarmerie; and it is said that since the entente there has not been a single recurrence of the old quarrels between the tax gatherers and the people, which used often to lead to sanguinary combats.

The Ottoman Government is eager to develop the rich resources of the Yemen now that security reigns therein. A Government railway is being constructed between Hodeida and Jamile, and though only three kilometres of rail have been laid, the embankment works are progressing; but, of course, with the blockade of the Red Sea coast in existence, the transport of all railway material is suspended for the present. Although the line was originally designed purely for strategic purposes, yet Colonel Ihssan is so optimistic about the results of the entente that he believes that, if the Government pursues the conciliatory policy of Izzet Pasha, its eventual use will be purely economic. Much seems to be expected from the Yemenite's intelligence; for it is generally recognised that in the matter of astuteness he surpasses his Bedawi brother of the Sahara. In certain parts of the Yemen the land yields four crops, and in others two; but the patriotic Colonel could not help deploring the fact that a lot of agricultural machinery sent out by the Government has rusted and decayed simply because no agricultural experts were sent with the machines.

It seems that a whole month elapsed before the treaty made by Izzet Pasha with the Imam was ratified by the Government, and Colonel Ihssan severely criticises the latter for its dilatoriness, especially in this matter, because he believes it to be very damaging to its influence and prestige with the Arabs, who often fell out with the Turks for want of open dealing. Colonel Ihssan confirmed the rumour, published some time ago in the papers, that, in return for the privileges and concessions granted him, the Imam has offered to place at the disposal of the Ottoman Government an armed force of about 100,000 men. In this connection may be mentioned the following anecdote, published recently in a local paper. In the course of conversation between Izzet Pasha and the Imam, the former is said to have paid a special tribute to the prowess displayed by the Albanians in the recent revolt, whereupon the Imam exclaimed, "You could not see much of our prowess. Wait till you see us engaged with the real enemy"—meaning the infidel Italians—"and you will know then what Arab mettle is!"

As regards the Idrissi, the Colonel is in favour also of a conciliatory policy, involving, however, concessions far inferior to those granted to the Imam, for the claim of the Idrissi is only recent. Izzet Pasha, while acknowledging the sacred descent of the Imam, which is established by historical evidence, seems to consider the Idrissi as an upstart in Mahdism, and believes that, should his claim be acknowledged in any way, the Government would incur the risk of seeing a legion of other pretenders cropping up. Colonel Ihssan's personal opinion, however, is that, after attempting a war with the Idrissi, Izzet Pasha is likely to incline to a more lenient policy. Being asked whether there are other chiefs in those parts whose influence has to be reckoned with, he said that to the east of the Yemen are some smaller potentates ("sultans") whom Izzet Pasha is anxious to win over in view of the dangers that threaten the Government, especially as a foreign Power has been trying to attract them and secure their allegiance by means of liberal grants and offers of arms. According to the Colonel, two of these minor potentates, on hearing of the entente between the Imam and Izzet Pasha, came to offer, of their own accord, their allegiance to the Ottoman Government. At the same time, they told the Pasha of the intrigues of certain European Powers, confirming their statements by the exhibition of documents sent them by the agents of those Powers. Izzet Pasha is said to have given a cordial welcome to these chieftains, and, to have acknowledged their local authority in Eastern Yemen, and after delivering an Ottoman flag to each of them, to have sent them away with handsome presents.

The Baghdad Railway.

THE Baghdad Railway was first mooted shortly after the visit of the German Emperor to Constantinople and Syria in 1898. Not to weary the reader with aspects of the matter which are no longer of cardinal importance, it may roughly be said that the concessions obtained from the Turkish Government in 1903, 1908 and 1911 contemplate the extension of the Anatolian Railway already existing at the earliest of these dates.

This line extended from Haidar Pasha, a port on the Bosphorus immediately facing Constantinople, through Afium Hissar to Konia the ancient Seljuk capital of Anatolia. From Konia the Baghdad Railway proper may be said to begin. A clause was included definitely granting to the concessionaires the right to extend the line from Baghdad to a point upon the Persian Gulf. The point itself was not named.

This concession was made to a company which, though officially Turkish, was in reality a German enterprise from the outset. The line was to be constructed and managed by a German company. On her side Turkey undertakes to protect the line,—a matter which is of some little importance at the present moment. In return for the services thus rendered by the German company, Turkey agreed to pay the famous kilometric guarantee which figures so largely in all discussions about this railway. It may be as well to have the exact terms of this guarantee:

Le Gouvernement Imperial garantit au concessionnaire par kilomètre construit et exploité une annuité de 11,000f., ainsi qu'une somme forfaitaire de 4,500f., par année et par kilomètre exploité pour frais d'exploitation.

This means that under any circumstances a sum of 11,000f. will be paid by the Turkish Government annually for each kilometre of the line over which the Germans are actually running trains. In addition to this Turkey agrees to pay a contingent sum, not amounting to more than 4,500f. a year, in order, when necessary, to make up the gross receipts of each kilometre to the sum of 4,500f. a year. The terms seem generous. It is to be noted that a newly-sanctioned section of the railway connecting the port of Alexandretta with the main line near Kalaakeui is to be constructed by the Germans without any guarantee from the Turkish Government at all. This too will be seen to be a matter of some importance.

The Germans pushed on the railway from Konia through Ereğli to Bulgurlu, where for several years the rail-head of the line has remained. It is a comparatively small stretch of rails, and it runs through a fertile and well-populated country, presenting no great engineering difficulties. But beyond Bulgurlu the German engineers were faced by nothing less than the gigantic bulk of the Taurus Mountains and all construction work came to an end for a long time. Through this range there is, and always has been, only one feasible pass—the famous Cilician Gates. Through these gates the armies of every conqueror have passed and repassed between Asia Minor and Asia Major, and the Germans, in their turn, have found it impossible to adopt any other route. But the difficulties to be encountered are gigantic. The work will require scores of tunnels through particularly obstinate and close-grained rock and viaducts across yawning ravines. Afterwards, the line descends to Adana, joining the existing little railway between Mersina and Adana, and extending it to the east to the junction to which reference has just been made. From Kalakeui—Osmanieh is the usual name for the place, though the town of Osmanieh lies ten miles to the east—one line will proceed due south to Alexandretta, or, as it is locally known, Iskanderun. To this important branch I shall make a reference later.

The main line, soon turning south itself, and still traversing very difficult country—At one point, between Bagche and Islahie, there is a tunnel 5,500 metres in length—reaches a place called Muslimieh. From this point the trains will run south into Aleppo, the main constructional centre of the entire line, where a very large station and railway works are already in process of construction. The through trains for Baghdad will return as far as Muslimieh, and thence run north-east to Jerablus, on the Euphrates, a place to which the excavations of Mr. D. G. Hogarth have drawn a good deal of attention of late. Here the real desert journey begins, and the difficulties of the line, except for one or two large bridges, from the engineer's point of view, cease. But from this point political trouble begins.

The course adopted runs eastward, and soon reaches Kurdish territory. These descendants of the ancient Medes have never been properly subdued either by the Turks or by the Persians. They maintain an imperium in imperio in the heart of the Turkish Empire, and their objection to railways, which is almost as obstinate as that of John Ruskin, should perhaps have been taken into consideration before the course of the line was finally decided upon. The Kurds near Mosul—the eastern objective of this section of the railway—have announced their intention of preventing by force the construction of any railway through their country. The Baghdad Railway Company has appealed to Constantinople for protection. This the Ottoman Government has been unwilling, and probably unable to afford, as its military forces are urgently needed in other directions, and the last thing it wishes is to provoke a Kurdish rising against itself at this moment. The company then requested that Nazim Pasha, the strong ex-Vali of Baghdad, should be given special powers to secure the protection of the work. It is not impossible that this may ultimately be done, but if so it will take place in the teeth of the strongest opposition from Shevket Pasha, who at present is practically dictator of Ottoman policy, and whose anger Nazim Pasha incurred by some drastic street improvements in Baghdad which threatened the property of Shevket Pasha's brother. The Mosul-Baghdad section of the line will be an easy matter from an engineering point of view. The right bank of the Tigris is followed without interruption.

Now it is not generally known in England that surveys of the entire line from Bulgurlu to Baghdad have now been completed, and that the actual work of construction is being carried on at several points in the north-western part of its course. I had the opportunity the other day of going over the railway works at Aleppo and I was very much impressed by the solidity and importance of the work there done by the Germans. This is no mere light railway, nor is it being made on the principle adopted by the engineers of the Trans-Siberian Railway. The latter, anxious at all costs to have railway communication with the Far East at the earliest possible moment, were content, so to speak, to "tack together" the new line in the first instance, with the knowledge that they would soon afterwards be obliged to go over the entire work in a more permanent manner. The Germans have decided to carry out the construction in a solid and business like way from the beginning. To those who know the kind of material usually employed for the pioneer railways it will be enough to say that the London and North-Western Railway itself might be glad to use the rails and points which are being laid down between Aleppo and Muslimieh. At the present moment the Adana section and the line from Aleppo to the north beyond Muslimieh as far as Akhterin are actually in working order. It is expected that the line will be complete from Akhterin to the Zorina Ara Bridge at Jerablus by October next. The new line between Alexandretta and Osmanieh, for which permission was only granted on the 16th February last year, will be finished on the 1st April, 1913.

This branch line is of considerable importance to the company. In the first place, the linking up of Alexandretta with the main line east of Adana will enable the engineers to collect the labour and material for the Mesopotamian stretch with very much greater ease. Secondly—and this is a matter of the first importance, which was pointed out to me by a resident in Northern Syria, who was considerably interested in the matter—the facts are that this branch line is a direct communication between Mesopotamia and the nearest and best European seaport, and that no tariff conditions attach to this unguaranteed enterprise. Thus the company will be able, if it wishes to do so, to differentiate the tariffs respectively imposed by it, so as largely to transfer any general profit earned by the whole line from the guaranteed section to their own!

In this connection it is important to remember the tariff laid down by the concessions. By this the rate to be charged for the transport of cereals—which, of course, will be by far the most important freight—is at the rate of 22 paras per ton per kilometre. But there is a significant clause, providing that cereals carried in trucks, for a distance of not less than 900 kilometres shall pay a special rate of only 6 paras per ton per kilometre. Put into plain English, this means, that any grain taken to Alexandretta from the fertile districts of Mesopotamia—the 900th kilometre is reached about where the River Zab falls into the Tigris above Tekrit—will only have to pay about 25s. per ton for the whole journey. In view of the intention of the Turkish Government—and if it is not now the purpose of the Turkish Government it will shortly be to the interest of the German Company—to develop Sir William Willcocks' schemes and make of Mesopotamia a fertile grain-producing country, it is as well to remember that grain carried by this railway will not have to pay Suez Canal dues. We all know that it is an axiom of economists that railway-borne freight rates cannot compete with ship-borne freight rates. This is an argument which has been so repeatedly used to minimise the importance of the Baghdad Railway that it is as well to bear in mind the special circumstances of marine competition in this case.

Moreover, under the concession there is nothing whatever to prevent the Germans reducing the rate still further. They do not need for this purpose to obtain the permission of the Turkish Government. It is only necessary for them to give three days' notice of such a reduction, and the thing is done. Should the company, in order to prevent sea competition, think it advisable that American precedents should be followed, the main line might be thrown open for the almost gratuitous transport of grain. There is always the kilometric guarantee to persuade them to this course, for though this reduction may be brought about at the discretion of the concessionnaires, without the assent of Turkey, the latter is still obliged to make good the 4,500fr. per kilometre supplement.

What, it may be asked, is the consideration which has induced Turkey to sign so one-sided an agreement? We have seen that she is bound to pay a sum, which is capitalised at 269,110fr. for each kilometre, constructed and in operation. She is, moreover, bound to make up any deficiency in the annual receipts to the sum of 4,500fr. a year. In return for this she receives, on paper, all sums received per kilometre between 4,500fr. and 10,000fr. Above 10,000fr. 60 per cent. go to the Government and 40 per cent. to the company. It would be difficult to draft a concession which held out more inducements to the concessionnaires to minimise the receipts upon the guaranteed main line, and increase them upon their own short, unguaranteed railway, for which they have a right to charge what they please.

The company has not been slow to realise the advantages of its position. Alexandretta, which even as it exists to day, is the best harbour on the Syrian coast, is being transformed by the construction of a breakwater two kilometres long and enormous quays, which are to be fitted with every modern apparatus for handling grain. At Haider Pasha, opposite Constantinople, the company possesses valuable privileges regarding the handling of freight, but the company clearly intends to make Alexandretta the chief port. Naturally enough.

There remain for consideration certain other extensions of the main line which require a passing notice. Dismissing as of small importance proposed branches to Marash and Aintal to the north of Aleppo, an important feeder of the line runs down from Kharput, through Diarbekr and Mardin, to El Helif. This line, which taps a rich and important territory, largely inhabited by industrious Armenians, will sooner or later be extended northwards to meet what is erroneously called the "French" railway running up from Samsum on the Black Sea to Sivas. The construction of these rails will afford Russia the best steam accommodation with southern Asiatic waters, at least, until the new Trans Persian line has been constructed.

From Mosul a line will be thrown out towards Erbil, if Russian consent can be obtained. It will be remembered that the construction of these branch lines directed towards the Russian sphere of influence in Persia was a matter of special discussion during the "Potsdam" discussions of last year. We shall have to wait to see what the actual form of the agreement between Germany and Russia has now taken. A proposed line from El Baj on the Tigris, to Hit, on the Euphrates, is talked of, as also is a branch in the same district to the east of the main line linking up Kurmatli with Sadiyah. The latter is of no importance. The former may suddenly spring into prominence if the petroleum of Hit is properly developed.

But beyond all question, the most important extensions of the Baghdad line are those which are to link it respectively with the Russian railways in Persia, on the one hand, and on the other with the waters of the Persian Gulf.—PERCIVAL LONDON in the Daily Telegraph.

Its Working and its Growth.

THE Anatolian and Bagdad Railways have published their financial reports for 1911. The receipts of the former amounted to 15,100,271 francs (as against 11,497,999 francs in 1910), repregiving 17,103 francs per kilometre on the main Haidar-Pasha-Konia line and 11,366 francs and 17,358 francs on the branch lines Eski-Shehir-Konia and Arifeh-Ada-Bazar respectively. The number of passengers was 2,709,276 on the main and 212,535 and 124,144 on the two branch lines respectively. The goods carried amounted to 425,027 tons on the main and 216,509 tons and 44,611 tons on the two branch lines respectively. The working expenses were 6,202,444 francs, leaving a net revenue of 8,621 francs per kilometre. The receipts on the main line exceeded for the first time the amount of the kilometric guarantee, so that the Government had no prepayment to make and even received as its share the sum of 352,467 francs. As against this the Government had to pay 1,045,205 francs on the Eski-Shehir-Konia branch line. The report points out that the section Bulgurlu-Ulukishla has been working since June 1, 1911, and that from Dorak to the foot of the Amanus Mountains was opened on April 27 last. On January 4 of the present year the company obtained a concession for a railway, 60 kilometres long, from Ada-Bazar in the direction of Bolu for a period of 90 years. The company contemplates the raising of a loan of 60 million francs at 4½ per cent. for additional work on the existing main and branch lines. The total available surplus amounted to 3,660,094 francs, of which 2,940,160 francs were distributed in dividends of 5 per cent. The total paid-up capital amounts to 58,803,200 francs.

The Bagdad Railway has now a length of 237.6 kilometres. The net receipts amounted to 3,379 francs per kilometre—a total of 740,603 francs (as against 514,285 francs the previous year): 95,884 passengers and 38,056 tons of goods were carried during the year. The Ottoman Government had to pay in kilometric guarantee 238,166 francs (as against 381,135 francs in 1910). It is expected that during the present year 100 to 150 kilometres will be opened from Aleppo towards the Amanus on the one hand and towards the Euphrates on the other. It is also intended shortly to begin work from Bagdad northwards, and on a branch line to Alexandretta, to be completed in 1913. To cover the cost of construction of the line to Alexandretta the remaining 50 per cent. on the shares amounting to 15 million francs will be called up. The year's operation shows a net profit of 799,324 francs and 531,240 was distributed in dividend at 5 per cent.

According to Reuter's Berlin correspondent a telegram from Constantinople states that as the Ministry of Public Works has finally approved the plans for the Mediterranean port of the Bagdad Railway at Alexandretta and the branch line from Toprak-Kale to Alexandretta work was begun at Alexandretta on Monday.

An Anti-English View.

The Berliner Tageblatt gives a report of what was apparently an interesting lecture and discussion on the Bagdad Railway at the "Free Students' Association" in Berlin. The lecturer was a certain Dr. Jaechh, whom the report introduces as an authority on Asiatic Turkey. He observed that the struggle between Germany and England over the Bagdad Railway was the outward symbol of the struggle between these two Powers over Turkey. The Bagdad Railway could alone furnish the "Sick Man" with a backbone and set him on his feet again. Under Abdul Hamid only one-fourth of the line had been constructed in twenty years. The Young Turks, however, insisted upon the entire work being completed within five years. Of the capital 40 per cent. had been supplied by Germany, 30 per cent. by France and 10 per cent. by Switzerland; nevertheless the enterprise was technically a purely German work. The railway was already paying for itself, and, so far from needing the kilometric guarantee, yielded to Turkey a surplus of £200,000. The line was so far only worked in the daytime and the speed did not exceed 30 kilometres an hour. Five hundred thousand hectares along the Anatolian Railway were going to be reclaimed by irrigation by the Germans and 5,000,000 hectares in Mesopotamia were to be irrigated by a British company. The line would not be carried along the Syrian coast but through the Taurus, in order to guard against attacks from the sea. The railway would make Germany independent of the Suez Canal and would thus prevent the closing of a ring round the Indian Ocean, which was the object of the English. Russia's opposition had been transformed by the Potsdam agreement into co-operation. England did not want the independence of Turkey, so that she might obtain, as the greatest Muhammadan Power, the spiritual authority over the entire Moslem world. As had already been remarked by Moltke, Austria was the Power which had the greatest interest in the preservation of an independent Turkey and in the maintenance of order in the Balkans. Co-operation between Germany, Austria and Turkey would be of the greatest importance, not only for Germany, but also for the peace and welfare of the entire world.

Among those who took part in the discussion was Herr Eduard Bernstein, who protested against the anti-British tenor of the lecturer's remarks. Dr. Jaechh, he said, identified whole countries rather too much with the diplomatic game of cross-purposes which was arousing the ever-growing opposition of the peoples. There was no reason why Germany and England should not be able to live on friendly terms. Germany's trade with England was a hundred times greater than the rest of her overseas trade.

As against Herr Bernstein, the well-known Pan-German writer Dr. Paul Rohrbach observed that precisely in the case of the anti-German policy gaining the upper hand in England, the Bagdad Railway would prove an excellent weapon against England.

British Red Crescent Mission.

We reproduce below the letter addressed to the President of the British Red Crescent Society by Mr. Alan Ostler, late correspondent of the Daily Express, recently returned to England, a copy of which has been sent to us by the Secretary:—

SIR,—May I express through you my personal gratitude to the Medical Mission sent to Tripoli under the auspices of the British Red Crescent Society and my strong admiration for the magnificent work which it is doing at Gharieh?

I am sure that if your subscribers could only see for themselves how great and necessary a change has been made in the condition of the sick and wounded Turkish and Arab soldiery, they would be satisfied that their money is being well and nobly spent. I do not in any way disparage the heroic efforts which Turkish medical men, both military and civil, have made to cope with the situation. But the number of patients, the enormous areas over which they are distributed, and the scarcity both of doctors and of medical stores which obtained during the early days of the war, made it impossible to give proper medical aid to those who needed it. Even now, although matters are much better in this respect, there remains much more than the Turkish doctors can possibly hope to do, so that the help given by your Mission is truly of the utmost benefit.

I should like to bear witness to the genuine gratitude of both Arabs and Turks, of which any Englishman travelling at present through Tripoli is invariably made aware. The Arabs of the country, in particular, have always been ready to respect and admire English people; and since the arrival of your Mission, this tendency had markedly increased. The fame of the hospital at Gharieh has spread far and wide; for not the least of your Mission's splendid qualities is its readiness to give medical treatment to all who are in need of it—combatant, non-combatant man, woman or child. In addition to the regular military patients, crowds of suffering country people flock daily to the Red Crescent Tents. Other hospitals receive the sick and wounded of the Ottoman Army alone: but the doors of the English are open to all.

It is a splendid work. You are helping both the heroic army, which has so gallantly resisted the Italians, and the uncomplaining poor of Tripoli, who have suffered bitterly from war following upon many bad seasons. I only venture to hope that, having made so fine a beginning, your Society will find it possible to continue and even to extend the work.

I am, Sir,

Yours very truly,

(Sd.) ALAN OSTLER.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says :—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him..... Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

Dr. Von Bethmann Hollweg, German Chancellor, conferred for one and a-half hours with M. Kokovtseff, the Russian Premier, and M. Sazonoff, Russian Foreign Minister. A state banquet was given in the evening. The Kaiser has bestowed the order of the Black Eagle on M. Kokovtseff.

After a farewell luncheon on board the Russian Imperial yacht Standard the German Emperor left for Swinemunde, whence he proceeds on Tuesday on his annual northern cruise. Dr. Von Bethmann Hollweg has proceeded to St. Petersburg. Semi-official telegrams to Berlin mention the animated character of the conversations of the Emperors and also that the Tsar had two long conversations with Dr. Von Bethmann Hollweg, but there is no hint as to any political result.

A memorable dinner took place on board the Hohenzollern on Friday night when the Kaiser entertained the Tsar, Tsaritsa and family. The decorations were superb. After dinner the Royal guests were entertained by a cinematograph display.

The Times correspondent at St. Petersburg telegraphs that there are positive grounds for asserting that the Tsar is firmly and unalterably resolved to maintain and develop the Franco-Russian alliance and the entente with Britain. His Majesty's special care, as exemplified in the creation of a strong Navy, is to render Russia absolutely independent of German influence.

Semi-official statements published in St. Petersburg and Berlin emphasise the cordiality of the interviews between the two monarchs, at which, it is declared, political questions were frankly discussed, strengthening the conviction of the necessity for maintaining Russo-German sympathy in the interests of general peace. It is added that there was no question of a fresh agreement or of a change in the grouping of Powers.

Imperial Defence.

The Committee of Imperial Defence held an important meeting preliminary to the discussion with the Canadian Minister.

The Imperial Defence Committee met. There was an unusually large attendance which included Lord Fisher, Sir A. K. Wilson and General Sir Ian Hamilton. There were two long sessions.

Afghanistan.

A Frontier correspondent states that the Mangals in Khost are insisting on very favourable terms in their negotiations with the Afghan Military authorities. They are said to have secured a good many rifles and cartridges while the rebellion was in progress. These they refuse to give up.

The Pioneer states that it is reported from Khost Valley that the Jaji tribesmen have made full submission to the Afghan General Nadir Khan.

A Frontier correspondent states that the Kabul authorities have sent sufficient money to Khost to pay the troops. Their payments were apparently three months in arrears.

Liberal-Labour Split.

Ten Labourite Members of Parliament and Mr. Joseph Martin, M.P. (Liberal), supported Mr. Finney, the Labour candidate for Hanley.

The Week.

Franchise Bill.

Mr. Harcourt, moving the Second Reading of the Franchise Bill in the House of Commons on the 8th July, emphasised Government's intention to carry Redistribution in time for the next General Election. He did not think the House was prepared to grant Female Suffrage.

In reply to a question as to whether he was speaking on behalf of M. Lloyd George, Mr. Harcourt said "I am speaking for myself."

Mr. Pretyma moved the Opposition amendment, declining to proceed with the measure on the most important aspect of which, viz., Female Suffrage, Government were not agreed and which left the most glaring electoral inequalities unremedied, being framed solely in the interest of one party.

Meeting of Emperors.

Reuter wires from Baltic port:—The weather is sunny here. The Tsar boarded the German Imperial Yacht Hohenzollern and greeted the Kaiser. The usual salutes were fired.

Reuter wires from Baltic port:—The Kaiser, on the 3rd current visited the Russian Imperial yacht.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald said fifty Liberal M.P's had petitioned the Master of Elibank to give the seat to the Labour party. The Labourites, he continued, were ready to take up the war challenge and give the Government a General Election within a year.

Congress of Universities.

The Congress of Universities of the Empire has closed. It has appointed a committee to form a London Bureau to collect and distribute information about the Universities of the Empire.

China.

Sir Edward Grey replying in the House of Commons on the 4th July to Sir John Lonsdale and Mr. Laurence Ginnell in connection with the Chinese loan, said that the chief British interest is that British money lent to China shall be used to establish security and order. This interest is common also to the other countries. His Majesty's Government had throughout required adequate guarantees for the proper and useful expenditure of any loan. This was only attainable by effective control. The form of this control would necessarily be the result of the agreement between the groups of financiers and China, but the Governments concerned would not approve any scheme which did not provide adequate guarantees.

Reuter wires from Paris:—The Chamber has approved the Indo-Chinese loan of ninety million francs for public works.

Tibet.

Lhasa news is now getting through expeditiously. The last mounted Tibetan special messenger left Lhasa on the morning of the 7th July and reached Gyantse on Tuesday night, thus covering the entire distance from Lhasa to Gyantse in two days and one night. His information is to the effect that fighting continues at Lhasa while the positions occupied respectively by the Chinese and the Tibetans are unchanged. There is no confirmation either of the alleged murder of the Dalai Lama's minister or of the story that the Chinese have in any way materially improved their position.

Egypt.

Reuter wires from Alexandria:—Lord Kitchener has sailed for London.

Public Service Commission.

Active communications are now passing between India and Whitehall about the Public Service Commission and possibly the official announcement will be made during the course of this month. The Commission will be a large and representative body and both officials and non-officials will be fully represented.

Private advices by the last mail indicate that the appointment of Sir K. G. Gupta and Mr. Gokhale to the Commission may be looked forward and that Sir William Meyer will not care for another Commission of Enquiry.

Co-operative Conference.

The Co-operative Credit Societies' Conference will meet early next autumn and Registrars are being consulted as regard the agenda and other details. Nagpur has been suggested as the place for the conference.

Government Securities.

The Government of India have under consideration the question of the revision of the existing forms in which Government securities are held and suggestions have been made for the introduction of bearer bonds. The Government of India will proceed to consult the Chambers of Commerce and other public bodies before deciding the question.

Aviation in India.

A scheme for the establishment of a school of aviation in India is engaging the attention of the army authorities and in this connection Captain Massey, who lectured on "Military Aeronautics" on the 9th, has been on special duty in the General Staff's Division. It is expected that an acceptable scheme will shortly be ready for submission to the Government of India. There are already in existence in this country a Staff College at Quetta, a Cavalry School at Sagar and a Musketry School at Pachmarhi and an aviation school is urgently needed to complete the needs of army training in India. Aeroplanes are regarded as destined to play an important part in India and more specially in frontier regions.

Sanitary Conference.

The All India Sanitary Conference, which Sir Harcourt Butler initiated at Bombay last November, will meet in Madras this year early in the winter. The draft agenda has been circulated.

Indian Students in London.

In order to provide more adequately for the interests of Indian students in London, Lord Crewe has created a Secretaryship for Indian Students. Mr. C. E. Mallet will be the first holder.

The Stead Memorial.

A committee of journalists, headed by Lord Northcliffe and Mr. Lawson, M.P., has issued an appeal for a memorial to the late Mr. Stead.

New Delhi.

Consequent upon the decision to locate the permanent capital in the open ground a mile or two south-west of the existing city of Delhi, instead of in the Durbar area in the north as at first proposed, it has been decided to curtail to a certain extent the buildings for the temporary capital (which, it will be remembered, is still being erected near the Durbar area in and about the civil lines a few miles to the north of the existing city of Delhi.) There is no truth in the story that a halt has been called with any of these plans. The approximate cost of the temporary buildings so far sanctioned is understood to be from twenty to thirty lakhs, including six lakhs for the Secretariat Offices and one and a half lakhs for the Government Printing Press. Bungalows for the Indian clerks, which are being built to the north of the Ridge, are nearing completion. Quarters for the Viceregal menials, south-west of the Circuit House, are well advanced. The construction of bungalows for European clerks near the Kingsway Railway Station is to commence in the middle of the present month. Additional Members of Council are to occupy Metcalfe House. The Ordinary Members of Council are to have bungalows to themselves. The Government of India Secretaries are to occupy Curzon House. The Viceregal Staff will be accommodated in the officers' quarters of the existing Cavalry lines. The temporary Council Chamber will be in the centre of the temporary Secretariat buildings.

Plans for the ultimate construction of the permanent capital away to the south-west are meanwhile gradually maturing. The permanent city will be surrounded by land a thousand feet wide all round and it is understood that the Government will allot plots of land in the permanent city for building purposes to the general public on long leases, a lump sum to be paid down in the first instance in addition to a yearly rent thereafter. Estimates are now being prepared of the probable income to Government from this source.

Pilgrimage.

The Protector of Pilgrims requests us to publish the following:—All pilgrims passing through Karachi for the Haj are informed that it is possible that they may meet with difficulties in obtaining a supply of provisions at Kamran where a lazaretto is established. These pilgrims are therefore advised to take with them a good supply of provision which will not easily be spoilt, sufficient to last them for even the prolonged journey of the Haj.

Verse.

A Persian Love Song.

Dear Love! I know not why, when you are glad,
Blithely my glad heart leaps;
Dear Love! I know not why, when you are sad,
Wildly my sad heart leaps.
I know not why, if sweet be your repose,
My waking heart finds rest;
Or if your eyes be dim with pain, sharp throes
Of anguish rend my breast.
Hourly this shining mystery flowers anew,
Dear Love, I know not why
Unless it be, perchance, that I am you,
Dear Love, that You are I!

WE ARE gratified to learn of the marvellous success that has attended the efforts of the Maharaja of Darbhanga in collecting funds for the Hindu University. The Hindu public in Northern India seems to have taken up the idea with enthusiasm and the promoters of the scheme have had little difficulty in securing promises amounting to 63 lakhs in aid of the University Fund.

The Hindu University.

The collection of money may not be a very difficult matter in the case of a wealthy community that is, at the same time, very public-spirited and alive to the advantages of corporate endeavour in great communal undertakings. The Hindu Princes in Northern India have helped the scheme with generous contributions. H. H. the Maharajas of Kashmir and Bikanir have made an annual grant of Rs. 12,000 each, while the Maharaja of Gwalior has announced the munificent gift of 5 lakhs. The necessary legislation to bring the Hindu University into being will be undertaken as soon as 50 lakhs have been actually collected and put into a bank. To some, however, this amount may appear inadequate and much larger funds may seem to be necessary and desirable if the Hindu University is to discharge its great functions efficiently. True, the Moslem University requires, according to official estimates, 35 lakhs before the Bill for its constitution can get legislative sanction. But the Aligarh College, its nucleus, has already attained to a high stage of development with an annual revenue of 2½ lakhs of rupees. We do not think the income of the Hindu College at Benares exceeds a lakh a year. This is an important aspect of a great undertaking like the Hindu University, which, we are sure, will not be lost sight of by the Hindu leaders. As regards the Moslem University, the necessary funds have already been collected if the grants from Hyderabad nobles are reckoned, and we are confident the Government of India will afford every facility for the Bill to be passed in the Simla Session. Any further delay at this stage will be greatly disappointing and unreasonable. We trust the Moslem University Constitution Committee will finally get through the work of settling the draft constitution as soon as possible and submit it for legislation to the Government. The Government would not be held responsible if the delay occurred owing to the tardy methods of the Committee itself, for we cannot imagine why the Government should postpone legislation when the scheme has been matured up to its final shape, as far as the Mussalmans are concerned.

STRANGE and, in some cases, ridiculous rumours appear to be going the round of a number of Turkish and Egyptian papers about the results of Syed Rashid Raza's recent visit to this country as President of the annual session of the Nadwah. A few of them have gone even so far as to say that "the Editor of Almanar took part in the meeting of the Nadwah and discoursed in terms of praise about Englishmen and the need of implicit obedience to them, which has incensed the Indian Mussalmans and led them to hold themselves aloof from him." Now, this is a statement absolutely without warrant. As we have observed on previous occasions, Syed Rashid Raza aroused warm enthusiasm during his brief sojourn in this country; and his discourses, which were entirely devoted to the intellectual and moral condition of Mussalmans and the consideration of their educational problems, created everywhere an appreciative response. From what we have been able to learn of him he appears to be averse by temperament to the sort of activity associated with politics; and, as a matter of fact, he eschewed all expression of opinion in his speeches in India that could even remotely indicate the trend of his political views, whatever they may be. The Egyptian Nationalists may have their own differences with Syed Rashid Raza and may not be in sympathy with the aims and methods of the movement of which he has constituted himself the mouthpiece. With these differences of standpoint and outlook of an essentially domestic character we have little concern. What we want is to dissipate all false rumours and misrepresentations that appear to have gained credence in some quarters in Egypt about the doings of the Editor of Almanar in India. His visit, we must emphatically say once more, has left nothing but happy memories behind. Whatever he said or did in private or on public occasions, while here, was entirely free from the taint of dubious politics.

THE resignation of Field-Marshal Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, the Ottoman Minister of War, will cause great regret and surprise, if not apprehensions, among the sympathisers of the present regime in Turkey. Whatever may have been the reasons that induced the Minister to take the extreme course, the Turkish Cabinet has been unquestionably weakened by the retirement of one of the most powerful personalities of Modern Europe from its counsels. Reuter's message suggests that "his position was shaken by the outbreaks in Albania," while the Vienna correspondent of the Times in one of his despatches, which is reproduced elsewhere, had hinted at a rumour current in the Vienna political circles, which described Mahmoud Shevket Pasha as favouring more energetic and drastic measures for suppressing the Albanian disturbances. After the recent tour of the Minister of the Interior the Cabinet has embarked on a more pacific policy; and it is possible the late Minister of War may have pressed the view, held with equal strength by many prominent members of the Committee of Union and Progress, that concessions would be interpreted as a sign of weakness, that they would lead to more serious disturbances and further impossible demands and that they were particularly inopportune at the present moment. Be this as it may, Turkey could ill afford to lose at this juncture the services of one of the greatest generals and administrators that have ever directed the affairs of the Saraskariat. Mahmoud Shevket Pasha rose to fame and power after the second Revolution, when he crushed the reactionary revolt and deposed Abdul Hamid, by his famous march from Salonica with his Army Corps on Constantinople. The feat is regarded, on account of its lightning swiftness, consummate generalship and strategy, to have been one of the greatest in military history. Since his elevation to the War Office, he had thrown himself with characteristic energy and devotion into the great task of organising the Ottoman Army. Within a wonderfully short space of time he has brought it, in equipment, training and discipline, to the standard of the best armies in Europe. The most eminent military critics have now declared the Turkish Army to be the most efficient instrument for the purpose for which it has been designed—the defence of the Ottoman Empire. This is an achievement of which any Minister might be proud, though Mahmoud Shevket Pasha himself, with his high ideals of military efficiency and his passion for thoroughness, was still striving hard and with unremitting toil to achieve more. Among the patriotic Ottomans he has become a name to conjure with; and the latter may be trusted to appreciate to the full the unique services to the Empire rendered with enormous labour, courage and devotion by one of the greatest soldiers of modern times. We hope Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, though not in the Cabinet, will take up the active command of an Army Corps. Reuter informs us that his portfolio has been offered to Nazim Pasha. If the latter accepts the offer, the work of the Army reform initiated by his great predecessor will, we believe, be pushed on with ability and vigour, for Nazim Pasha, besides being a great administrator and statesman, is one of the ablest generals in Turkey. In an article on "Asiatic Turkey under the Constitution," which appeared some time ago, Miss Gertrude Lowthian Bell wrote of Nazim Pasha as follows:—"Nazim Pasha is a Liberal of the old school. He belongs to the group of men (they are the best elements of Turkey) who, even under the tyranny of Abdul Hamid, kept alive the traditions that go back as far as the reforms of Abdul Majid—traditions of the movement which centred round the name of Midhat Pasha and culminated in the granting of the first Constitution in 1876. His reputation as an honest man and a good soldier has always stood high, his influence in the Army is considerable; on all these counts, and more than all because of his strong and determined personality, his appointment to the vilayet of Baghdad in 1910 was hailed with acclamation. . . . All along the borders of the Syrian desert brigandage and raiding were put down with a heavy hand; the tribes were given a lesson of which they spoke to me with bated breath, and in the very heart of the desert I heard the name of Nazim Pasha uttered with respect. . . . All through the vilayet the defenders of the peace began to hold up their heads."

OUR readers have no doubt become as disgusted as we have been with European agencies in the matter of supplying accurate news and unbiassed views about Islamic countries, and we have at last put ourselves in communication with likely correspondents and others who are sympathetic to wards Islam and the East, in order to secure our own correspondents in Constantinople, Teheran, Cairo, Tangier, and Fez. Had we, however, consulted our present financial position merely, we would have had no hesitation whatever in rejecting this idea the moment it occurred to us. But even if it is we who say so, it is a fact that there have not been, in India at least, many audacious or quixotic journalistic ventures to match ours; and the audacity and the quixotic character of our enterprise has led even some of those who knew us intimately and with whom we have had no secrets—even if we had any such thing with others—to ask us if we had been heavily subsidised. Our new venture of attempting to secure well-paid Foreign Correspondents of our own is entirely of a piece with our usual recklessness in the matter of our own finance. But we earnestly hope that, like so many other audacious and quixotic ventures of ours, this, too, would be appreciated by our readers and would induce them to redouble their activities in procuring us a larger number of readers. We have always taken our supporters into our confidence, and have published from time to time the number of fresh subscribers that we have secured. Recently, however, we have been directing our attention chiefly towards the Hamdard Debentures which have not yet come up to our expectations. But the case of the Comrade has not been very much better during the last few months. It is true that in April, May and June we secured nearly 450 new subscribers, but we have also to record that we lost in the same period not less than 200 old subscribers. What grieves us specially is that no less than 50 names had to be removed for repeated nonpayment of subscription, and such arrears exceed Rs. 400. This will partly explain that we have been in no great hurry to remove a subscriber's name, for on an average the amount due from each is equal to one year's subscription in the case of students, and nearly three quarters' subscription from ordinary subscribers. There are many others who owe us small amounts—which, however, total no less than Rs. 1,500 approximately—but whose names have not yet been struck off. But clearly, we cannot throw good money after bad by continuing to send the paper to these gentlemen after their neglect of us in a very important matter, viz., the payment of our rightful dues! We have written to those gentlemen whose names have had to be struck off and also to those whose names have yet to be struck off, but only in too many cases our letters have remained unanswered, although the paper is readily accepted and read perhaps with the same old relish. We have a horror of the law courts and have, therefore, to indict these old friends of ours at the bar of their peers, viz., the other readers of the Comrade. We have hit upon a plan of prosecution, or, to use a more civil language, of execution of decrees in our favour. It is this. We select in every district one or two of our most ardent supporters and send them a list of defaulters in their respective districts asking them to collect our bills for us just as they have been our honorary canvassers. Our past experience of bad debts has compelled us to be more strict in the realisation of subscriptions than we like to be. We ourselves have no load on our conscience in the matter of having been prompt payers, and our subscribers can well confound us by quoting from that saddest of all elegies in which Ghalib says:—“Tum aise Khair Kaunse the dild o Sitad Ke.” (You yourselves were never so prompt in payment). But in the language of the lawyers, the case can be distinguished. Our creditors could afford long credit because they were fairly large capitalists, while we have no capital except our confidence in our readers. If that is lost or weakened, we are sure to find ourselves before long in the Insolvency Branch of His Majesty's Court of Judicature for the Presidency of Fort William, and it is doubtful if our weekly message to our many friends, who have had no share in driving us into the all-embracing arms of law, would reach them at all. We, therefore, warn them that, unless they can assist us in recovering our dues and in securing us more subscribers, they will be doing great injury to their own cause. As regards the Hamdard we had hopes of launching it much earlier, but, in spite of the ready promises of purchasing more than 5,000 Debentures, we have had formal applications for less than 2,500. We have therefore a little more than 1,000 Debentures still on our hands, and more than 300 defaulters on our books. Surely the number of Debentures that each has yet to take on an average to bring us the required amount of money is not too large, and we trust that by the end of July we shall be in a position to announce that all Hamdard Debentures have been subscribed for, and that the Hamdard would be launched from the old and the new Capital of India in a month or so thereafter. We hope we shall not have to say with the poet that we love best:

Muft Ki pitl the mai, lekin samajhte the ke han, Rang laigt hamari tija masti ek din.

(We used to drink wine without paying for it, but we knew that the intoxication of hungry poverty would one day show itself in its true colours.)

AFTER it had been decided by the Moslem University Constitution Committee at its Lucknow meeting, held in The Moslem University, the first week of June, that the University Regulations would be published for public discussion, we had hoped such a simple and mechanical work as the publication of the revised draft would be got through without any unnecessary delay. About six weeks, however, have elapsed since then, and for aught we know the draft may be undergoing another metamorphosis in the mystery-laden atmosphere of Aligarh. The delays of Aligarh have wellnigh become proverbial, but this business of the University is being muddled through with an absence of method and despatch that beats all previous records in the line and must strike even the least exacting amongst us as little short of irresponsible. The University has yet to materialise, but the officials in charge of its affairs have already become a bureaucracy. For instance, the Honorary Secretary in charge of the Central Office has a large staff of highly paid office-bearers working under him. The monthly bill of the Central Office is enormous and its activities should at least be commensurate with its cost. Even the publication of the weekly returns of Provincial realizations, which was tardily begun after our repeated demands, has been stopped again. And yet, we understand, an “Inspector of the University Fund Collections in India” has been added to the hierarchy of officials. Verily, they at Aligarh have a perfect genius for creating sinecures! We may yet hope the promised publication of the draft will not be too late in coming for the ultimate introduction of the University Bill in the Simla session of the Imperial Council; though we doubt if the Moslem public will have under the circumstances enough time to consider the constitution and offer useful and well-directed criticism.

WITH the best of intentions, we have repeatedly been accused by our contemporaries of undue partiality towards the Muhammadans of India. We would, however, remind our friends that on some rare occasions their own action forces us to defend the Mussalmans against injustice and aggression. This, we assure our contemporaries, we do not do with any sectarian motives, but just because if we did not voice the grievances of the Mussalmans, we feel that they would not be voiced at all. For our Hindu contemporaries in their sleepless vigilance in safeguarding Hindu interests are very often apt to forget that there is another set of interests which, though we solemnly assert they should not be antagonistic, have under attendant circumstances to be sometimes competitive with those of the Hindus. We yield to none in our whole-souled desire to see the Hindu community prosper. But the attitude of most of our contemporaries being as it is, we find that the Moslem point of view in certain matters would be wholly ignored if we refused to extend the courtesy of our columns to them. This frequent but solitary advocacy of the cause of an important section of the people is almost as distasteful to ourselves as it is repugnant to our contemporaries. But a little unbiased reflection would convince our friends that if anybody is responsible for this state of affairs, it is they themselves. Only lately, for instance, the Associated Press of India reported that out of the 10 Technical State Scholarships not one had been given to a Mussalman. Here was food for reflection for any really sincere Indian patriot and we had hoped against hope that some of our contemporaries would notice this remarkable instance of—let us call it—official oversight. But we have waited in vain. It cannot very well be said that this was merely a matter of course, and deserving of no special remarks. For if we were to imagine just for a moment a complete reversal of the position and a consequent complete ignoring of the Hindu interests—a contingency which would be quite as unpleasant to us as the present one,—we may depend upon it that our contemporaries would have had something to say about it and the authorities concerned would not have been suffered to rest in peace very long. As a matter of fact, only the other day when out of the three new Assistant Traffic Superintendentships, which have lately been thrown open to deserving Indians, one had been given to a Christian and two to Muhammadans, it provoked the “Nationalist Press” into what cannot be adequately described as anything but an undignified convulsion. That was an accidental case when only two posts had been given to the Mussalmans, whereas the Hindus already possessed many. This is one in which all the ten have been declared a monopoly of the Hindus. And yet these unimpeachable contemporaries of ours can afford to look upon it with perfect equanimity. Nor can the usual defence of want of efficiency be advanced on this occasion: for this was a case in which potentialities were to be developed and efficiency acquired. And he would be a bold doctrinaire who would be prepared to assert that the Muhammadans are absolutely wanting even in those potentialities which, if developed, would help them to take their rightful place in that new race of industrial revival on which India is just starting. We have said enough to make the position clear, and we hope our contemporaries may yet redeem their reputation for fair play and make amends for past oversights by voluntarily coming forward and calling the Government to account for this glaring indifference towards the interests of the Moslem community of India. As a great Urdu poet has put it,

میں اگر عرض کروں گا تو شکایت ہوگی

(Do you yourself look at your injustice and cruelty; for if I make a mention of it, it would become a complaint.)

THE question of finding a suitable successor to Nawab Vigar-ul-Mulk Bahadur as Hon. Secretary of the The Hon. Secretary Aligarh College is, at present, considerably exercising the minds of the Mussalmans all over the country. The office is the most important in the gift of the community; and it is hedged round with traditions of such weight, dignity and unselfish service that only men of approved merit, who have won the confidence of the Mussalmans, can be trusted to keep them alive. We need not just now estimate the measure of the success that the present venerable Secretary has achieved during his tenure of office. It is enough for our present purpose to note the universal anxiety and regret that the announcement of his decision to retire has evoked throughout Moslem India. Had it not been for the considerations of health and the imperative need for rest, the Mussalmans, we are sure, would have never dreamt of allowing their one tried and trusted leader to cease guiding their educational affairs and withdraw from public life. As it is, they are looking forward to the choice of his successor with evident concern. As has already been announced in the Moslem Press, Nawab Vigar-ul-Mulk Bahadur and some of the prominent Trustees of Aligarh have proposed Nawab Haji Mohamed Ishaq Khan Sahib, Sessions Judge in the U.P., for election as Honorary Secretary of the College for three years. An agenda on the subject has been issued from the Secretary's Office and a meeting of the Trustees will be held on the 21st July to decide the matter in accordance with the usual procedure. In the absence of any rival candidate for the post, the election of Nawab Mohamed Ishaq Khan Sahib may be taken to be a foregone conclusion. Obviously it is unnecessary to set about to pronounce on personal merit when the field of choice has been narrowed down to a single individual. It is, again, rather melancholy to think that there should be so few Mussalmans of adequate ability, leisure and position who may be fitted for the great trust. This is manifestly the reason why we lack means, under the circumstances, of ascertaining the direction of the popular choice, although much earnest discussion has been going on in the Press. The old type of the Mussalman who combined the experience of the past with a broad comprehension of the present-day problems and enjoyed great position, affluence and public confidence is almost extinct. The younger generation is still a little too young, and is struggling for a position of leisure and independence. The election of Nawab Mohamed Ishaq Khan Sahib will be regarded by the community in the nature of an experiment, and we hope it will be successful.

ELSEWHERE we publish a letter from a Mussalman visitor from South Africa complaining of the religious apathy of the Indian Mussalmans. The occasion of his complaint is the sight he saw common enough to us in India—of European visitors to the Jumma Masjid in Delhi treading the courtyard of the mosque with their boots on. He rightly thinks that the fault rests in the main with the Mussalmans themselves who let such things happen in utter disregard of what they owe to their own places of worship. If the committees in charge of the Indian mosques realised their duty, framed necessary rules in this behalf and enforced strict observance thereof, we do not think any visitors, European or Indian, will deliberately go out of their way to give offence to the Mussalmans. Complaints about the existing state of things have often come to our notice, and whatever may be the feelings of the Delhi mosque committee, some of whose members seem to have converted even that body into a stepping-stone to Khan Bahadurships, the general Moslem public feels very strongly on the subject. Now that Delhi has become the capital of India occasions for such complaints are bound to grow if things are left where they are. We have no great hopes that the mosque committee will energetically move in the matter. But, surely, the matter does not become less scandalous because a body of gentlemen, highly trained in the arts of worldly success, elect to remain indifferent. We think it is necessary to invite the attention of H.E. the Viceroy to the existing state of affairs and request him to issue the necessary orders directing visitors to all places held sacred by the Mussalmans to conform to the requirements of propriety and decency. We do not think in the circumstances it would be too much to ask. We doubt if it would at all look proper or decent if a non-Christian visitor to a Christian place of worship comported himself in a manner offensive to the religious susceptibilities of the Christians. The courtyard of a mosque is as much a place of worship as the inner structure. In fact every inch of space within the outer boundary of a mosque is held sacred by the Mussalmans, and the visitor who saunters forth into its precincts with pride in his port and defiance in his mein and little cares if his conduct is an outrage on Moslem feelings, must, by strict rules, be brought to a proper frame of mind.

THE recent death of Mr. B. M. Malabari from heart failure at Simla recalls to us most pleasant memories of one who loved to encourage the young.

A True Patriot.

Of late Mr. Malabari had been leading rather a secluded life, but before the days of Lord Curzon his name was always prominently before the public in connection with almost all the greatest movements for the political or social uplifting of the Indian peoples. Mr. Malabari was truly that rare and sorely needed specimen of a true patriot to whom difference of religious persuasions was absolutely no bar to human sympathy; and we sincerely hope that our modern Indian leaders—both Muhammadans and Hindus—will take the life-history of this patriotic man as a model for themselves. Mr. Malabari's incessant activities in public life were essentially of a non-sectarian character. As a journalist he stood in a class by himself, alike for ability, for resourcefulness and for rectitude. We may mention in passing that in the Indian Spectator, he wrote a series of comments and criticisms on Mr. Tilak's case, which were far the most honest and the best reasoned out. Some years back he also wrote a series of articles entitled "Forty Years Ago," in his other paper, the East and West, of which he was the founder-proprietor and editor. This series was an autobiographical account of his own early days and gives a most instructing and graphic account of how a child left orphan at the age of six years, battled against all obstacles and forged his way to the very front rank of Indian journalists and social reformers. We think these articles should be read by every young aspirant to literary or social fame in India. The campaign he fought—and ultimately won—on behalf of the Age of Consent Bill perhaps caused some ill feeling during the régime of Lord Dufferin; but the wisdom of Mr. Malabari's suggestion is not challenged anywhere in India to-day. He was also the pioneer of the recently started movement for establishing sanatoria for Indian consumptives; and the first institution of the kind at Dharampur owes its existence greatly to his philanthropic endeavours. His intense enthusiasm for the cause of education in India is well known. He fought a hard fight for the Parsi and Jewish children of Calcutta and secured such valuable concessions for them as now enable them without much difficulty to join the European schools and colleges. Only a short time ago on reading it in these columns he sent a munificent contribution to the Moslem girls' school lately established in Calcutta, and also secured various donations from other gentlemen. Mr. Malabari was one of the first of India's great men to recognise that Social Reform can be the only solid basis on which to build the edifice of future economic and political greatness of the country. Among his most recent activities was the formation of the Seva Sadan—an institution in which Parsi, Hindu and Muhammadan ladies work shoulder to shoulder for the poor of all castes and of all religions. His private charities are known to have been enormous, and a dark day awaits numerous destitutes of all castes now that their great benefactor is no more. We believe Mr. Malabari was the only Indian who twice refused the honour of knighthood. In short, we could multiply instances of the greatness of soul, the unbiassed patriotism, the cosmopolitan sympathies and true philanthropy of the Parsi journalist, whose death all India now mourns. We might almost say with Antonio that of Mr. Malabari, "nature herself might stand up and say, 'Here was a man.'"

تمہیں کہتا ہے مردہ کون—تم زندہ دیکھو زندہ ہو *
تمہارے نیکیاں زندہ—تمہارے خویاں باقی

(Who dares call you dead? Verily! you are the most alive of all the living. For, are not your virtues immortal and your achievements eternal?)

WE HAVE been regularly publishing the correspondence of Capt. Johnson-Dixon, the leader of the British Red-Crescent Mission that has gone to Tripoli to tend the Turkish sick and wounded soldiers. It would be superfluous for us to dilate on the Mission is philanthropy with which Capt. Dixon and his imbued. It is deeply to be regretted, however, that, despite his repeated earnest appeals, the Director is not yet adequately provided with funds: and the last we hear of him is that he is gone to Tripoli, the scene of his activities, with a fresh batch of nurses, but has not got funds enough to employ as many Arab servants as he must do to make his expedition at all a success. It certainly cannot redound very much to the credit of British or Indian if such humane workers are worried by financial embarrassments. We pointedly draw the attention of the Moslem public to this unsatisfactory state of affairs and earnestly appeal to them to make an early provision for the financial help which must be forthcoming before Capt. Dixon can make any headway with this fresh expedition. And we do hope that the Moslems will at once redeem their traditional fame for charitableness by bestirring them selves in this most vitally important matter without any further delay.

The Comrade.

The New Ministry of Hyderabad.

PERSONALITY has always counted as the most important factor in human affairs, and much more so in a State like Hyderabad, where the direct personal will of the ruler has a very important bearing on the happiness of millions. In all such places, not only politics centre round some personal drama charged with intense human interest, but the shifting of individual fortune plays a vital part in the history of the peoples. A good, capable and energetic ruler endowed with almost unlimited powers may accomplish in a decade what a constitutional democracy may not be able to achieve in the course of several generations. But, while the possibilities for good are as great as the capacity and range of the unfettered personal will, the risks are equally many and formidable. This element of chance—the inscrutable fate of the popular imagination—constitutes the thrilling drama of the personal rule. It is, therefore, quite easy to understand why, for instance, a change of ministers in Hyderabad becomes an event of absorbing interest throughout India and gives rise to varied speculation. It is only recently that the State lost its late popular sovereign: and the accession of the present Nizam to the throne of his ancestors was acclaimed with feelings of joy and expectancy by the people. And now, the old Minister, Maharaja Sir Kishen Pershad, has resigned his high office after “a long and eventful career,” and Nawab Salar Jung III, the grandson of the great Sir Salar Jung I, has been appointed in his place with Nawab Imad-ul Mulk Syed Husain Bilgrami, C.S.I., as Assistant Minister. The present régime, therefore, starts with an entirely new personnel, and we earnestly hope that it will fulfil all the high expectations that we have reason to form of its future success. The people of Hyderabad have welcomed the new appointments with rejoicings and the general feeling throughout India will, we are sure, be one of hope, sympathy and confidence about the future progress of Hyderabad.

One cannot adequately estimate the prospects of the new Ministry without casting back a glance on the eventful history of the State. Since the growth and consolidation of British rule in India which owes not a little to the friendly assistance and co-operation of the rulers of Hyderabad, the history of the State, in its broader aspects, consists of the traditions that have gathered round the career of a single great personality who played a momentous part at the critical stages of its affairs. Sir Salar Jung I—the greatest statesman of his time in this country—not only wrestled heroically with political abuses, introduced far-reaching reforms in the administration and saved the finances from bankruptcy, but left the stamp of his policy and purpose on the politics of the State. His ideals have not invariably been pursued after him as energetically and resolutely as he would have wished, but he laid down permanent and broad lines of work which should afford the necessary guidance to the present-day administrators of Hyderabad. We have no concern, at present, with that aspect of the Hyderabad politics which thrives on mischievous activities underground and gives rise to low intrigues. Even the British Residency was, on some occasions, known to have been involved in the schemings and counter-schemings of rival parties bent on securing each other's downfall. This bane of Hyderabad politics has already proved of incalculable injury to the most vital interests of the State. We trust the new Ministry that will have the assistance of such a tried and seasoned counsellor as Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk will make a clean sweep of the nests of intrigue and of the evil broods that thrive there. Our greatest concern, however, is that the ideals of Sir Salar Jung should be recovered and his aim and policy be applied to the governance of the Dominions.

Naturally enough, in all our calculations about the future of the State the personality of His Highness the Nizam must be of the greatest account. We need hardly say that his is the most responsible position as the greatest Ruling Prince in this country. The traditions of his own illustrious House must, again, add to his sense of responsibility as well as be a source of inspiration to His Highness. He is young, with the full promise of life before him. The immense possibilities of usefulness that stretch before his career as a ruler must thoroughly rouse his energies and appeal to all the best elements in his nature of which he has already given an abundant promise. All accounts agree in speaking of His Highness as a ruler endowed with sympathy, intelligence and capacity for personal initiative and hard work. He has inherited his father's deep interest in the welfare of the people. He has shown every disposition to actively direct the administration of public affairs. The recent constitution of the Legislative Council, with a view to broaden the basis of government, is an index of His Highness's desire to give greater stability and representative character to the measures of the State. The generous gift of five lakhs to the Moslem University and the increase of the Aligarh College grant to Rs. 36,000 a year show how far the new Nizam is interested in the development of Moslem education. This is, we are sure, an earnest of the sympathy that His Highness will increasingly manifest in the educational progress of his co-religionists as the years go on. We assume, then, with sufficient reason, that Hyderabad is at the threshold of a new era which holds out large prospects of internal reform and progress and of beneficent help to all measures of public utility. The temptations that beset the path of the ruler of Hyderabad are great, but we have great confidence in the strength of character of His Highness, and, we may be sure, he will manfully withstand them all and make the fullest use of the opportunities that Providence has placed within his reach to do good to his people and to be of great service to his fellow-men.

His Highness the Nizam has given a great proof of his earnestness and knowledge of men and affairs by choosing Nawab Salar Jung to be his Prime Minister. We think the choice could scarcely have been better, and with the association of Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk in the work of the Ministry, the future looks hopeful and bright indeed. It needs scarcely be said that, after the Nizam, his Minister is the most powerful authority in Hyderabad. The responsibilities of the position are even greater, inasmuch as the whole character of the administration depends on the personality of the man who happens to be at the helm of affairs. Nawab Salar Jung is, like his master, in the prime of life. He inherits from his grand-father the most glorious traditions of statesmanship, public service, courage, steadfastness of purpose, independence of character and devotion to high ideals of duty and conduct—traditions of which any nobleman in this country might be proud. He now comes to a position of the greatest power, and perhaps the most onerous, open to any Indian in any country. It will tax his moral resources, intellectual capacity, in fact, his whole strength of character as a man. If heredity, careful training and personal instincts count for anything, we feel confident the young Minister is well equipped for his great task. He is a man of simple habits and of frank and straightforward nature. He is very popular with all classes of the people. Those who have had occasion to come into intimate contact with him speak of his great qualities with enthusiasm. His first public act on assuming the direct charge of his estate was the contribution of one lakh that he made to the funds of the Moslem University. We have reason to believe that his interest in Moslem education is great; and it will not be too much to hope that his example and sympathy will stimulate widespread interest in Hyderabad in the educational affairs of the community and lead to great results. The task that lies before Nawab Salar Jung is heavy. Administrative and financial reforms, development of State education, re-organisation of the judiciary, growth of public works and, above all, the purging of the public services of corruption and abuse and the cleansing of the political atmosphere of rank intrigue are some of the important problems that await solution. The new Minister, we are sure, will not quail before the task. He could have no more experienced statesman to assist him than Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk, who spent about forty years of his life in devoted service to the State. He was in his early career associated with Sir Salar Jung and, after filling various important positions, was Director of Public Instruction before his retirement. His clean, honest and successful career in Hyderabad, his ripe experience in affairs, his intellectual eminence, his broad outlook and trained powers of the mind and his unrivalled knowledge of the requirements of Hyderabad pre-eminently fit him for the great responsibility to which he succeeds in his grey years. The new Ministry starts, therefore, on its career with great popular confidence in its integrity and strength and with universal hopes of its ultimate success. To make Hyderabad a model State in India may satisfy the ambitions of any statesman; and we trust the ideals of the new Ministry would not be less ambitious than that.

No one can think of Hyderabad without speculating about the possibilities for good that are within the reach of its rulers. One cannot help wondering at what might have been, what is, and what might easily be. A territory, larger than many independent states of Europe, rich in agricultural and mineral wealth, containing a population of about 12 millions, may well tempt bold speculations about its future. The great scope for the development of its material resources is only one side of the dream that haunts the imagination of its well-wishers. What great possibilities, for instance, may not be opened up for bold and useful experiments in the many-sided development of Indian education. But, perhaps, the greatest potentiality of Hyderabad is the wide scope it might be made to offer for the development of indigenous talent. The highest public careers open to Indians in British India being few, it is only the Native States that can keep the highest forms of Indian statesmanship from being starved out of existence. Nothing can be more inspiring or worthy of ambition for the rulers of Hyderabad than to try to build up an efficient civil service manned by trained Indian administrators from top to bottom and to evolve efficiently organised Departments of the State presided over by experienced Indian statesmen—the whole machine working smoothly and without the least friction solely with the help of the Indian talent and rendering the Administration the best that could be possible under Indian conditions. The ideal is not difficult of achievement. It is worth trying. The area of choice is as wide as India. The end is the noblest that could be imagined—to increase the happiness and prosperity of the people. The materials are available in abundance, only someone with unfaltering will and resoluteness is needed to make the trial for the lasting good and glory of Hyderabad. Who knows but that under the new régime the dream of the many may turn into a reality and Hyderabad become the training-ground of the best administrative talent and genius for statesmanship that this country can produce.

THE Indian public of Darjeeling gave a fitting reception to the Hon. Syed Shams-ul-Huda, on the 30th June last, which was attended by almost all the leading Hindu and Muhammadan gentlemen of the station, and was pronounced to have been a great success. Rai Hari Mohan Chandra Bahadur, President of the Reception Committee, referred to Mr. Shams-ul-Huda's eminent qualifications and attainments as a literary man, as a lawyer and as a public man, and while acknowledging that his name was known throughout the length and breadth of India, said that it was their fervent prayer that as a Councillor to the Ruler of the Province he would leave behind him a name equally distinguished in history. He recalled the fact that Mr. Shams-ul-Huda was the first Indian and the first Bengali to be a Member of the Executive Council of Bengal. "We are all," said the Rai Bahadur, "proud of his appointment for many reasons. He is a Bengali and knows all the wants and necessities of Bengal. He commands the greatest confidence amongst all communities—Hindus, Mussalmans and Christians. In honouring him we honour ourselves." In concluding his remarks the President hoped that the Hon. Mr. Shams-ul-Huda may be the means of creating an entente cordiale between the Hindus and Muhammadans of Bengal, and of ending once for all feelings of suspicion and animosity between these two great communities. We take it that these highly creditable sentiments were the genuine outcome of the real feelings of the good people of Darjeeling, and this being the case, we feel sure that a repetition of such sentiments can never be tiresome. But we are equally sure that it will serve no purpose if creditable sentiments are repeated as mere conventions which have lost all meaning and sunk into mere "good form." In reply to the Rai Bahadur's sincere words of welcome the Hon. Mr. Shams-ul-Huda expressed feelings which appear unimpeachable not only to ourselves but to our contemporary, the Bengalee. However, we know not whether it is the notorious hostility of the Patrika to the Bengalee, or some other mysterious under-current which deflects the Patrika from the course of ordinary journals: but it is a fact that the leading article of the Bengalee of the 5th instant, which echoed the sentiments of Mr. Shams-ul-Huda, was followed on the 6th instant by an editorial note of the Patrika, concluding with the remark that "such a reply we never expected from Mr. Huda: it is an ill return for the honour and hospitality which the Hindus did to him." We do not know whether the Patrika had contributed anything to the honour and hospitality which the Darjeeling public had shown to the first Indian Member of Council in the Bengal Presidency; nor are we sure that it has been commissioned to voice the feelings of the Darjeeling public. On the face of it, the Patrika's intrusion appears very much like Dadaji ki Patina, Halwai ki Dukan (the confectioner's shop a substitute for the alms distributed for the peace and rest of one's grand-father's soul). But even if we were to assume that the Patrika contributed something to the honour and hospitality, or that it is the accredited representative of the Indian public of Darjeeling, we have still to consider how far it is justifiable for a public man or a public servant to dole out insinuations or belie his real feelings simply because he has been publicly fayed. Mr. Shams-ul-Huda's only sin was that he gave expression to a sentiment which would do credit to any honest man, and that he had full confidence in his hosts when he expressed himself fairly and frankly in a matter in which frankness combined with fairness is very necessary in the interests of public life. Mr. Shams-ul-Huda, in the course of his speech, said—

I may assure you that it is my greatest ambition to serve my country, our common motherland, and in striving to do so I shall never forget that I am not the Muhammadan Member of His Excellency's Council but its Indian Member, and as such it is my duty to serve equally the interests of the Hindus and the Muhammadans. I shall, however, be perfectly frank with you and I would add to what I have said that I shall never purchase a reputation for impartiality by sacrificing the interests of my own community, and I am certain none of you would wish me to do so. But you may be perfectly sure that whatever I may do to advance the interests of my community in any particular matter, I shall always be prepared to do exactly the same thing with reference to other communities when they are similarly placed. It has been a matter of regret and concern to me to find that the relations of Hindus and Muhammadans in Bengal have not been wholly satisfactory. Living side by side for centuries, tilling the same soil and drinking from the same fountain, it is a pity that they do not understand each other a great deal better than they do.

We do not know what there is in such a statement to regret or complain of, but the Patrika comments in this wise:—

So our esteemed Muhammadan friend unsaid what he had said before! Alas! when will men of the stamp of Mr. Huda, about whose brilliant talent and great ability there could be no question, realise the fact that the interests of Hindus and Mussalmans are absolutely identical in matters civic and political: and that it is not at all necessary for Mussalman and Hindu public men to sacrifice the interests of their respective communities in serving the common country! Such a reply we never expected from Mr. Huda: it is an ill return for the honour and hospitality which the Hindus did to him.

Alas for the psychology of poor Patrika! Because a Muhammadan Member of the Bengal Executive Council is not so selfish as to endeavour to win for himself a reputation for impartiality by sacrificing his co-religionists, he makes, according to the Patrika, an "ill return for the honour and hospitality which the Hindus did to him." Really, these have been bad times for the Patrika. A Behari, and, on top of that, a Mussulman, was appointed a Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council two years ago. Last December Behar itself escaped from the clutches of the Patrika's friends and admirers, and the capital of India was again shifted to the historic North where they know what value to attach to Patrika's incessant patter. The only gleam of hope was found in paragraph 3 of the Government of India's Despatch, which no doubt our Bagh Bazar contemporary meant to have given it the undivided rule of Bengal in the place of the divided rule of India. But, alas! a fickle Government has shattered even this hope, and the Patrika has been crying for its lost capital. To these dismal griefs is now added another. A Muhammadan is allowed to poach on the Patrika's preserves in the matter of Provincial Executive Council appointments, and, wonder of wonders! he refuses to butcher his own community in order to make the Patrika's holiday.

We think there was a certain rhetorical over-statement in Mr. Shams-ul-Huda's speech when he said that "even this short experience (of administrative work) enables me to say with confidence that to every single case in which the interests of the Hindus and the Muhammadans are found to conflict, there are ninety-nine cases of much greater importance in which their interests are wholly identical." We are sure we believe as strongly as any one else in the identity of Hindu and Moslem interests, and when we say this we exclude even the solitary point of difference on a minor matter to which the Hon. Syed Shams-ul-Huda referred. But we must explain that the interests which are identical are the ultimate interests of the two communities. These are identical in the case of Indians and Europeans, and officials and non-officials also. But we fancy our contemporary has no use for such an identity of interests. In the matter of immediate interests there are many differences, and they have hitherto served to embitter the feelings of one community against the other the moment the weaker and more ignorant community, after having received modern education and learnt modern methods of political warfare, claimed its proper share in the benefits of good government and in the activities of public life. It is essential that these conflicting immediate interests of each community should be safeguarded in such a manner that they should not blind the people of this country to the identity of their ultimate interests. But this clearly depends upon the good sense of both the communities, and if the share of responsibility of either can be larger than that of the other, it must be so in the case of the larger, the wealthier and the more advanced community. A little magnanimity, or, to put it at the lower level of mere self-interest, a little political sagacity can ease the situation and bring about an entente cordiale between the two communities. But monopolists must beware that monopolies are not going to be tolerated in these democratic times, and the Mussulmans have for the last few years ceased to be mere "Babes in the Wood" who could be gulled by the nearest sentimental twaddle. The political activities of the Mussalmans are the handwriting on the wall, and those who have hitherto been comfortable in the belief that "the Mussulmans don't much matter," and that they can always be put to sleep with the opiate of sentiment, will be warned by the ruin of the monopolists' palace very soon, if they are not already warned of the impending loss of their despotic rule by the handwriting on the palace wall!

Anecdote.

ONE of Lady Reay's recollections is of a dinner party at which she had for her neighbour Mr. Gladstone in his happiest mood. He told her of his Eton experience and tales of terrible little Dr. Keate. The latter always had the names of those doomed to be flogged written down on a narrow slip of paper. One day, picking up such a list, he called up for flogging the boys whose names were inscribed upon it. Upon such occasions the delinquents were not permitted to offer explanations; so boy after boy was castigated and returned, sore and savage, to his seat. Not until the operation was complete did he learn that, instead of picking up the flogging list, he had picked up the slip on which were the names of the boys about to be confirmed.

CORRESPONDENCE

Indian Moslems and their Religious Indifference.

THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,--Permit me to draw the attention of your readers to the following facts.

I am a South African born Indian and have come here for the first time to pay a visit to my motherland. I am sorry to have to confess that I am keenly disappointed with my co-religionists of Hindustan. The feebleness of religious zeal amongst them is appalling. With your permission I will give you an instance of a sore spectacle I saw on the 30th ultimo in the Jumma Masjid of Delhi. A European lady and gentleman were walking about in the courtyard of the mosque with their boots on. I was astonished at this, and on making enquiries I was told that this practice has been going on for some time and no one has raised a single voice against it! The Europeans are only asked either to take off their boots or put on the boot covering when entering the Jamaat Khana. Surely, Sir, the courtyard is just as sacred in the eye of the Moslem, because I have seen that very space filled with people at a Friday prayer.

Now, if the Imam of the Masjid will only take a little pain for the sake of Islam which he seems to profess and put up a few notices asking visitors to take off their boots at the entrance, I assure you, Sir, that not a single person will think of offending the religious susceptibilities of the Muhammadans.

Another thing I should like to mention is that both in the Jumma Masjids of Delhi and Agra I was grieved to find that no prayers were offered for the Caliph and the Ottoman army. I may point out here that in South Africa and I was equally glad to note that in Gujarat also—prayers are offered five times a day for the success of the Turkish arms.

Sir, when those brave Osmanlis are marching at this very moment through the burning sand of Tripoli to uphold the prestige of glorious Islam—is it too much for the Imams to pray for those brave Ottomans even on a Friday?

Yours faithfully,

HUSEIN DAWOOD.

Atrocious Libels on the Turks.

CROFTON-TEES, DAKLINGTON, 8th June 1912.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I send you herewith copy of a letter which I have addressed to the Editor of the Watan as it may be of interest to your readers.

Yours truly,

C. F. DIXON-JOHNSON.

SIR,—I have been informed that a letter has been published in your columns containing the most atrocious libels on the Turks—saying they have abandoned their religion, drink wine publicly and tether their horses and donkeys in the mosques. I am not a Muhammadan although a sincere friend and admirer of Muhammadan races and Muhammadan religion. I have always found Muhammadan peoples most tolerant respecting other religions: but disbelief or sacrilege in any form they will not tolerate.

I have not been in Constantinople since the revolution, but if such things were happening, I should have heard of them—the whole of the Muhammadan world would be bursing with indignation:

it would not be necessary for an obscure writer to be the first person to make public such astounding facts.

What the purpose of this writer is I must leave to the intelligence of the Indian Muhammadan world to decide.

For the last seven years I have travelled in South Albania, my friends have been the Turkish officials and Muhammadan villagers—and sincerely religious people I have found them.

I have lately returned from Tripoli, where the Turkish officers and soldiers are showing such magnificent example to the world, and for anyone to say that their men have abandoned their religion and have desecrated their mosques is an iniquitous lie and damnable libel upon men who win victories against overwhelming forces and suffer the greatest hardships and privations without a murmur because of their faith. Doubters there are I presume in every religious community—in Tripoli I am told that those who were doubters have returned to their Faith because they believe that only by God's aid could they have achieved what has been done.

I ask, would the Arabs of Tripoli and the whole of Northern and even Central Africa crowd to the side of the Turks to fight shoulder to shoulder for their Caliph, to defend their religion, to avenge the massacred women and children and the desecrated mosques if there were a word of truth in these vile charges? I feel strongly and I must write strongly for I have seen these splendid Turks, the sufferings they endure, their patient obedience to their officers, the spirit of comradeship between officers and men, and I cannot keep silence.

It is for your readers and all good Muhammadans in India to show with what contempt they regard this baseless charge on a brave race by redoubling their previous magnificent efforts in sending help where it is so badly needed—help for those who are valiantly fighting to save one of the few remaining independent Muhammadan States for an independent Muhammadan people.

Yours truly,

(Sd.) C. F. DIXON-JOHNSON.

Moslem Education in Bengal.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—While thanking you most sincerely for the valuable expression of opinion on the education of the Mussalmans of Bengal appearing in the columns of the Comrade, we cannot help observing here that, as the ill luck will have it, there has of late sprang up a band of advocates of the cause of Bengali language who have propounded a theory and are trying to press it for general acceptance. They hold that the salvation of the Bengali Mussalmans depends on the production of Bengali Authors and Pandits from among the Bengali Mussalmans, basing their arguments on the assertion that it is impossible for them to rise without improving in the Bengali language which is their mother tongue. Now, although it is admitted on all hands that it is absolutely necessary that for an intelligent grasp of what is to be learnt, the medium of instruction from the very commencement of a child's attendance at school should be the language which he learns in his mother's lap, it may not with any force be contended in the case of the Mussalmans for various obvious reasons, that they should all be well versed in the Bengali language. All that is, perhaps, required is the simple Bengali which is easily understood, or at the most primary education in Bengali. Even for the sake of the argument advanced that in order to enable the Mussalmans to acquaint themselves with the tenets, principles and teachings of Islam, its traditions, histories, etc. should be translated into Bengali, it may not be conceded that Bengali Mussalmans stand in need of Pandits. On the contrary, such translating into simple Bengali may be of more use and service to Bengali-speaking Mussalmans in general. What strikes one as most curious is that, while those concerned with the Muhammadan Vernacular papers and their advocates lament over the limited number of subscribers and try to ascribe it to this and that cause, they overlook the one that lies near at hand—perhaps not less potent than others they have so studiously found out. It is this that the style and language of these Bengali papers, except wherein they deal with news, are hardly intelligible to the so-called literate Bengali Mussalmans. Bengali is still in the course of development, and what is more appalling, is that it has already begun to lose its ground. Middle Vernacular Schools are fast dying out. This year's educational report is expected to disclose a still more gloomy aspect. The Middle English Schools are the most popular institutions now. The advocates who have in the heat of enthusiasm lost sight of this painful fact will not perhaps find their work so easy. It should be the aim of all the Mussalmans to do all they can to draw nearer one another and the saying of our prayers in Arabic is perhaps a remote hint to the Mussalmans about a common language.

What we most earnestly beg of them is to consider once more before they set themselves to work.

A BENGALI MUSSALMAN.

The McCormick Case

MR. CHANNING ARNOLD appeared on Tuesday, the 25th instant, before Mr. A. G. Cooke, District Magistrate, to answer to a charge of having defamed Mr. G. P. Andrew, I.C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Mergui, in two articles of his paper entitled "A Mockery of British Justice." Messrs. G. Rutledge and C. Gaunt appeared for the complainant, and Messrs. C. Hamlyn and C. Campagnac for Mr. Arnold.

Mr. Rutledge, in opening the case for the prosecution, said that Mr. Andrew, the complainant, welcomed and wished the fullest enquiry into every fact connected with this case. He intended to prove that the articles complained of were, on the face of them grossly defamatory and were published and circulated broadcast.

Mr. Andrew was examined by Mr. Rutledge, as follows:—

Your name is George Percy Andrew, I think. You are a member of the Indian Civil Service?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Rutledge: What is the date of your joining the service in Burma, Mr. Andrew?

Witness: At the end of 1890.

Mr. Rutledge: When were you transferred to the Mergui District?

Witness: At the end of January, 1910.

Mr. Rutledge: You have been acting as Deputy Commissioner and District Magistrate of Mergui District since?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Rutledge to the Court: Here is a document. It is a certified copy of the declaration made under Section 5 of Sub-Section 2 of the Printing Presses and Books Act, showing that the defendant Mr. Arnold, and Mr. Liddetter are the printers and publishers of the Burma Critic. I will put it in as an exhibit, Your Honour. I need not put it through the witness.

When you went to Mergui, Mr. Andrew, who was the Sub-divisional Officer at Victoria Point?

Witness: Mr. A. W. Buchanan.

Had he been there long before you came?

I think he went there in September, 1909.

When you went there who was the District Superintendent of Police?

Mr. Macdonald.

When did Mr. Finne become District Superintendent?

Some time in April, 1910.

Now, coming to 1911, what was the first complaint that you received in connection with this case of Anian?

The demi-official letter from Mr. Buchanan.

The Court: Was Anian the complainant?

Mr. Rutledge: Yes, Your Honour.

What date did you receive?

3rd July.

Is that the letter?

Yes.

That letter is dated 3rd July?

Yes.

To the Court: Your Honour, I put in that letter now.

You also received from him, you say, an anonymous petition in Burmese?

Yes.

Is that the petition?

Yes, I think it was.

Now I am not going to take you through Mr. Buchanan's letter, but he suggested that the District Superintendent of Police should be sent down to enquire into this case?

Yes.

And accordingly did you hand over these documents to him?

Yes.

Did Mr. Finnie go down to Victoria Point?

Yes, almost immediately after I handed these letters over.

As a result of that an enquiry was held by Mr. Finnie into the case?

Yes.

You afterwards held an enquiry into the same case, I think, beginning on the 21st of August?

Yes.

And on the 23rd August, 1911, you passed orders in the case?

Yes.

Do you produce a file of the proceedings of that case?

Yes.

Now, was your attention called to an article appearing in the Burma Critic dated the 7th March, 1912?

Yes.

An article entitled "Alleged Grave Scandals in Tenasserim."

Yes.

You produce this?

Yes.

Mr. Rutledge to the Court: I put this in, Your Honour.

Had you any doubt in your mind that the articles referred to your conduct in connection with this case?

No.

Was your attention afterwards drawn to two articles in the Burma Critic of the 28th April entitled "A Mockery of British Justice"?

Yes, I first saw it on the 10th May on my return from Victoria Point to Mergui.

Do these articles contain imputations on you as a man and a Magistrate intending to harm you?

I should think so! Of course they do.

Have you set out the imputations you complain of in your complaint?

Yes.

Have these imputations had a wide circulation?

Well, I do not see all the papers, but I have been shown some of the articles, one in a paper called United Burma. I have seen the libel repeated almost verbatim in a paper called United Burma. I was also shown a Mahomedan paper called The Comrade in which the libels seem to be reproduced.

Is this the copy of United Burma, dated the 5th May, with a leading article entitled "The White Peril"?

Yes.

Have you got a copy of The Comrade?

I have not been able to get a copy, I have taken a note of it—of the number.

I do not suppose you had tried to examine the English and Vernacular Press of the Indian Empire. These two are the only instances which you have come across?

Yes, which people have sent to me.

The witness was then cross-examined by Mr. Hamlyn as follows:—

You have not told us, Mr. Andrew, that these articles are false? They are false on the whole.

Mr. Hamlyn: You do not suggest that they are a tissue of falsehood and a farrago of nonsense?

Yes, I do.

Mr. Hamlyn: You have known Captain McCormick since you went to Mergui?

No, no, since April, 1910.

Mr. Hamlyn: I take it that this is the first time you have seen Mr. Arnold?

Yes.

Now I think you either told us or suggested that you were prepared for something when the first article appeared?

I presumed that that article on the 7th March referred to the McCormick case. I did not know what was coming.

Mr. Hamlyn: You have told us that Mergui received three or four copies of that paper and that you then surmised that it referred to this case.

On the 7th March. I thought it did.

Did you take any steps to suppress it?

No.

You did nothing until you filed your complaint in this Court on the 11th June?

I wired and came up to see Government.

You did nothing except that?

No.

I take it that you mean you wired to the Commissioner of your Division.

Yes.

Did you tell him the business you were going on?

Yes.

Please tell me the date you sent this telegram.

If I can be supplied with a May calendar I will tell you the date.

Looking at the calendar, the witness continued:—"I got back from Victoria Point on the 10th, Friday. I saw this thing on Saturday and wired up the same day, to the best of my knowledge. I think it was the 11th."

Mr. Hamlyn: And I take it you got an immediate reply?

Yes. I left by the very next boat, which was on Tuesday, for Moulmein. I saw the Commissioner at Moulmein and then came on here.

Then you arrived in Rangoon on the 12th or 13th?

I came by train from Moulmein. I arrived on Saturday on the 18th.

Now you must have felt desperately hurt when you saw those articles?

I felt desperately outraged.

Your character had been assailed, and this is the most precious thing.

My character, as a Magistrate.

And not as a man?

My character as a Magistrate and a man. Why ask this question? Read the article.

Did you take the trouble in any shape or form to put an end to the circulation of this paper?

In what way?

Mr. Hamlyn: Well, I am not going to instruct you. Did you go and see Mr. Arnold about it? Did you instruct an Advocate to deny the truth of these allegations?

I did not.

You did not think it worth your while to write and say that the articles were a tissue of lies?

I did not.

Or to demand the insertion of an immediate apology in the paper?

No.

Why did you not do these things? You slept on it?

I did not sleep on it. I took steps to initiate these proceedings as soon as I could. I am not a private person, but a Government official and I had to get permission to do this sort of thing.

Mr. Hamlyn: I am very glad to hear your explanation. Continuing, Mr. Hamlyn asked:—

You did not think it advisable to come on the 19th or on the 21st to this Court and file a complaint?

I had to see the Government Advocate first. I may say that since my first interview with Mr. Rutledge I have acted according to his directions in this case.

Very well, it took from the 19th of May to the 11th of June before you could make up your mind to file your complaint?

No, I made up my mind at once.

I put it to you, Mr. Andrew, you have not brought these proceedings of your own free will. I put it to you that you have been compelled to do so?

No, I have not.

No pressure at all?

No pressure at all.

You do not wish to qualify that statement?

No.

Captain McCormick has left your District?

He has gone on leave, I understand.

Mr. Hamlyn: You know?

Witness: He wrote to me before he went away saying he was going and expected to be away for about six months.

When did he go away?

On the 9th March.

Do you mind producing the letter he wrote to you?

I do not think I have it, but I remember it very well because it contained a letter from Mr. Gaunt about some titles of land.

You don't produce that letter?

I have not got it here.

How many times have you communicated with him since?

I wrote to him forwarding a copy of the article appearing on the 28th April.

The Court: When did Captain McCormick go on leave?

To the best of my knowledge he left Penang on the 9th March. Mr. Hamlyn resuming said:—

How many times have you written to him since?

Once only. I wrote a letter to him forwarding a copy of The Critic. That is the only one, and I also sent one to Mr. Finnie.

The Court: You also sent a copy of the 28th April Critic to Mr. Finnie?

Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn resuming said:—

In sending Captain McCormick a copy of the paper you wrote him a letter?

Yes, forwarding the paper.

Can you tell me where you addressed this letter?

Either to the Junior Conservative Club or to the Junior Constitutional Club.

And Mr. Finnie, where did you address him?

I sent it through Scotts.

Is Captain McCormick coming back to defend his character?

I could not tell you.

After a little hesitation witness continued:—Well, I could tell you so much that only last Friday a man in Mergui told me he had a letter from Captain McCormick announcing that he would be back in September.

Who is the man? What is his name? Mr. Taylor.

Is this the only communication direct or indirect that you have had with Captain McCormick?

Yes.

You had no telegrams?

No.

You have told us that these articles have been spread broadcast by means of reprints?

I mean two papers.

I understand your Advocate to say that the Indian and Colonial Press had got hold of them?

I know nothing about that.

In your complaint when you say that certain low papers had copied the articles, which papers do refer to?

May I see the complaint. Which paragraph?

Mr. Hamlyn: Paragraph 9.

Witness: The complaint has been drawn up by my Advocate.

Mr. Hamlyn: You signed it. It is over your signature.

Yes, I was shown a Moslem paper published in the Vernacular. Give me the same.

One was The United Burma. I forget the name of the other paper. It was published in Burmese and Urdu.

Mr. Hamlyn: These are the two papers to which you referred?

No, no.

Then I suppose you mean The Comrade and you class The Comrade as a low class paper?

I do not class it as anything. I have only seen it for a few minutes. It seemed to me well printed.

I am going to draw your attention to the two articles you complain of on the 28th April. The first article opens with this passage:—"With the utmost reluctance, and only after we have made every effort possible to persuade the Local Government to re-open the matter quietly, we publish to-day the facts of a scandalous case in the Tenasserim Division." You take objection to that paragraph?

I do.

Why?

Because it does not publish facts.

Very well. Counsel continued reading:—"To the last we have desired to avoid the unpleasant duty which we feel now called upon to discharge. It will be observed from the correspondence which has passed between us and Government that a month has elapsed since that correspondence closed. To our letter of the 29th March we received the next day a simple acknowledgment of its receipt, and we had to conclude that our request—almost our entreaty—that the case should be re-opened, was finally refused. But we felt so sincere a reluctance to make public what is so far more wisely dealt with secretly that we have waited on for four further weeks, hoping that some steps would be taken in the matter. We regret the decision of the Government more than we can easily say." Do you take exception to that?

No, no.

Mr. Hamlyn continuing to read :—

"It is clear His Honour has been misled as to the facts of this most shocking case." Do you take exception to that?

Of course, I do.

Mr. Hamlyn continuing to read :—"Naturally, no other conclusion is possible. Sir Harvey has a great and honourable record of work in this Province and in India, and to no mind could the prostitution of British justice be more intolerable than to his. We confess that we have been sanguine enough to hope that we should convince him that he had been hoodwinked. That we have failed we readily account as our blame, not his. In this case we have never sought the sensation which we are now obliged with the utmost reluctance to make." Do you take exception to any of those passages?

Witness : Of course, I do.

Mr. Hamlyn continuing to read :—"There may be those who will hold that, however convinced we are that a grave miscarriage of justice has occurred, however scandalous the facts of the case, it was past and over and were better left to the official oblivion to which Government records consigned it in October last." You agree with that?

I do not agree or disagree with it, I am not responsible.

Mr. Hamlyn continuing to read :—"With these persons, if there are any, we most emphatically and entirely disagree. For the service of which His Honour the Lieutenant Governor is the head in this Province we have a great and abiding respect. It is a noble service, an honour to the glorious Empire from which it derives its honour. Its servants have left and are leaving in every portion of His Majesty's Indian Dominions a splendid record of faithful work, almost always excellently, often bravely, done. It is just because this is so, it is just because the Englishman feels proud of the Indian Civilian as a class that it is intolerable that there should be a smirch upon its fair fame, that our Oriental fellow subjects"

Mr. Rutledge here objected to the reading of this article.

Mr. Hamlyn : Your Honour, both these articles have been put in evidence and I am entitled to read them. I will, however, come down to paragraph 3 on page 8 :—"A Muhammadan Malayan girl of ten is abducted by a white planter, and, as we allege, is criminally assaulted by him. For three months this man dares to retain the child, even from her dying father. For three months, so incapable, so slack, so scandalously undutiful is the supervision of the District that this insolent bully defies the law which his friendship with two of the King's local representatives has made it possible for him to do, so we believe, in more instances than this shocking one." Do you object to that?

I object to that, of course.

Mr. Hamlyn : For three months this man detained the child even from her dying father. You deny that?

Yes. I say it is untrue.

"That this insolent bully defies the law which his friendship with two of the King's local representatives has made it possible for him to do, so we believe, in more instances than this shocking one." Do you deny that?

That is absolutely misleading and false.

That is the first extract from these articles that you have put in your complaint?

Well, that is quite enough. I object to that.

Mr. Hamlyn : I ask you the question, is it not the first.

Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn, continuing to read :—"And when at last a report reaches at least one dutiful official and an effort is made to bring the fellow to justice, what happens?" You know who that dutiful Official is?

I shall know if you will tell me.

Cannot you conjecture?

I conjecture it is the Sub-Divisional Officer.

Mr. Hamlyn : You are about right. Continuing to read :—"The guardians of the Empire's honour betray their trust. The case is burked ; a deliberate conspiracy, as we allege, is entered into between the Deputy Commissioner and the head of the Police to save their friend. For a non-bailable offence he is allowed on bail. The proceeding conducted are an elaborate judicial farce. Every rule and regulation is twisted and strained in the accused's favour. Every advantage is taken of the pauper suppliants for justice." I won't ask you if you take exception to that. Continuing to read : And Mr. Andrew sitting as King George's representative, called upon to exercise scrupulously and reverently the most sacred of the duties with the fulfilment of which he is honoured, discharges a man on whose case he would not have thought of adjudicating, had he been a high-minded man." Do you take exception to that?

I object to that.

Mr. Hamlyn continuing to read :—"By the criminal law against which he had offended the planter McCormick will be dealt with. But what of those officials who condoned his misdeeds, who conspired to protect him from their consequences? They have not offended against the criminal law of the Empire, but they have offended against the Empire itself. It is impossible to imagine a baser breach of trust than theirs. They have traitorously degraded England's name. We can see no excuse for their conduct. The more it is studied, the worse it becomes. The trustees and the representatives of the King's justice, they deny it to the King's subjects, flippantly, insolently, causelessly. And why? Because they are the type of officials who are unworthy of representing the King, of serving the Empire."

You have left that last paragraph out of your complaint. I want to know why you selected certain passages and left others out?

Witness gave no answer.

Mr. Hamlyn continuing to read :—"We know the type : there are all too many of them about all over the King's dominions, and they must all go, or in time the Empire will go. Messrs. Andrew and Finnie did not think it mattered because the complainants were pauper Malays. Was that it? Is that their conception of their sacred duty to the Empire to which they owe everything? Is that the England they desire to show to their Eastern brothers and sisters? There is no test in such questions as sure as the personal test. Let us bring it home to these officers by asking them : "Would you have done the same, would have so prostituted justice been your little sister of ten who had been so treated?" Let them think of their English homes invaded by such a man as this McCormick. Would the King's officer, Mr. Finnie, have called it 'a funny case' then? There must be an end of this nonsense, this peridious nonsense as to the gradations of justice meted out to the different races of His Majesty's subjects. There are probably all too many officials who lean to such a pernicious view. The sooner the Empire is rid of such traitor servants the better for us all. There is only one law and it must be administered impartially. The principles of justice and honour and freedom are the key-stones of the Empire, cannot be played with, even in the remotest corner of the King's dominions, without its evil effect being felt throughout the whole political fabric at last. The Imperial conception of British dominion abroad is an ideal, and ideals are hard to maintain. Faults and grave ones in plenty we all know to exist under our flag ; but they are not without remedy, and they are remedied as they are discovered. British rule has meant and means incalculable blessings to many millions of human beings ; and the British Empire stands for something nobler than a mere political machine. The England which Messrs. Andrew and Finnie have shown the humble Muhammedan Malays of Tenasserim is not England, and steps must be taken to enlighten those humble folks. It is not much that we any of us can do to help the Empire, but to all of us 'out East' there are manifold chances of doing that little which really helps so much. Let us each do our little best. Let us each try, by constant courtesy, by consideration, by sympathy and perpetual self-control, to show the real England to our Eastern brothers. We can all do this at least, however humble our lot in life. For the officers of the King there are greater duties ; and, if they are honourable men, if they are patriots, they will never fail in those duties ; ever protecting the poor and friendless, administering the King's justice, showing to the lowliest as to the most exalted of His Majesty's subjects that England to which Messrs. Andrew and Finnie have been so false." I take it that in general you agree with those sentiments?

Witness : I do not.

Mr. Hamlyn : Now we come to the second article. You agree, I believe, with the opening line : "At or about the beginning of April, 1911, a Muhammadan Malayan couple, Malassa and his wife Fatima, resident in Kampong Tengah, Victoria Point, Tenasserim, sent their daughter Aniah, whose age was between ten and eleven, to stay with one McSone, a neighbour." Is that true or false?

That is true.

Mr. Hamlyn, continuing to read : "The mother declares the child to be under ten, but such people are often vague as to their own or their children's age, and it is therefore best to rely upon medical evidence (subsequently referred to), which fixes the child's age by irrefutable physical proof as much below puberty." You believe that the child was below puberty. That is substantially accurate?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn, reading? "Aniah is said to be a remarkably pretty child with large brown eyes, a rare feature in a Malay." Is that true?

Witness : Yes.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Fez: General Gouraud, making a night march with a light column of four battalions with mountain guns surprised the Pretender's camp. The fighting lasted from four in the morning till afternoon, when two thousand Moors, many of them mounted, fled, leaving many dead and abandoning the camp and much ammunition. The success of this Pretender had been causing some anxiety to the French.

Paris, June 14.

General Gouraud left Fez this morning going in the direction of Sefru, where rebel tribesmen have collected in considerable numbers. The expeditionary column consists of five battalions of Infantry, three batteries of Artillery and four squadrons of Cavalry. Suk-el-Arba is reported to be menaced by some malcontent Zemmurs, who are camped close to the river Kanova. The latest telegrams from General Lyautey are of a reassuring character. The patrols which are scouring the neighbourhood of Fez have restored the confidence of the small cultivators, who are resuming work. General Alix has pursued his journey along the Muluya and has reached Mahridza without having had to report any incident.

The French programme of re-organization of the Shereefian army and of the civil administration as outlined by General Lyautey has been made known this evening. The principal points are as follows:—

(1) To limit action strictly to regions already occupied, while at the same time assuring the security of the inhabitants and effecting their political, social and economic organization.

(2) To "neutralize" the regions outside the occupied zone as far as possible by relying on the chief kaids and assuring their authority and the solidarity of their interests with the French Protectorate.

(3) To centralize efforts for the moment on the Rabat-Fez zone, so as to clear the approaches to Fez and the regions south of the line of communications.

(4) To effect this General Lyautey is establishing a covering zone east and west of Fez, the military and political command of which has been given to General Gouraud, whose principal task will be to harass the rebel contingents and drive them back so that they can no longer menace Fez. On every occasion he will endeavour to persuade the loyal tribes to act with him.

(5) A similar policy will be pursued south of Mekinez, so as to cover the southern approaches of the line of communications, but no attempt will be made to penetrate the Zayan country. This task will be carried out by General Moinier.

(6) Behind these covering zones the authority of the local officials and that of the Maghzen will be re-established as far as possible.

The concluding paragraphs deal with administrative and economic changes which, as General Lyautey remarks, can scarcely be touched until security is assured. General Lyautey winds up his programme with the remark that unforeseen circumstances may necessitate the modification of some points.

Mulaj Hafid reached Rabat yesterday morning. On his arrival he was greeted by General Ditté, accompanied by his staff and the members of the Maghzen, while a salute of 21 guns was fired.

Madrid, June 14.

While there are no grounds for the wildly optimistic reports which circulate even inside the Chamber of Deputies here regarding an early settlement of the Franco-Spanish negotiations, it may be said that these negotiations are following a normal course. It is understood that the Wergha Valley question has been settled, and the delimitation of the Ifni enclave may soon be agreed upon. A sign that headway is being made is the fact that the status of Tangier is about to be the subject of special conversations between the French and British Ambassadors and the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Other important questions yet to be considered are the delimitation of the frontier along the river Lucus and the Customs in both zones.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, June 17.

M. Regnault, late French Minister at Tangier and special envoy to the Sultan at Fez, arrived with his family and the members of his mission at the Gare de Lyon this morning. He was welcomed by M. Daeschner, Minister Plenipotentiary and chef de cabinet of M. Poincaré, as representative of the Prime Minister. In the course of conversation with a representative of the Temps, M. Regnault said that the work of pacification had only been begun, but he thought that the worst was over and that the rebels would no longer offer serious resistance. Mulaj Hafid he described as a very nervous man who was alternately confident and dejected. M. Regnault's task had been rendered very difficult by these changing moods. The Sultan's state of mind, however, had improved the moment his departure from Fez had been decided upon. M. Regnault had left him half way to Rabat in the best of spirits.

The column under General Gouraud camped yesterday evening at Suk Tleta, about 19 miles from Fez to the north of the road from Taza. The Moors are reported to be concentrating about half-way between Fez and Taza. The transport Chaouia left Marseilles last night with 100 sappers for Casablanca. To other companies of sappers will shortly be despatched in order to accelerate the bridging of the river Muluya.

Tangier, June 18.

General Lyautey continues to gain the confidence of the native population. His policy is understood and appreciated, and though much uphill work necessarily remains a general feeling of optimism pervades public opinion. His policy of restoring the popular chiefs of great families in the south, such as Thami Glawi and Aissa Ben Omar, to their former positions of Governors of Marakesh and Abda, respectively, has made the best impression.

Last winter, on grounds of urgency, the representatives of the Powers reluctantly consented to dispense with the formalities of public tender for the proposed additions to the Casablanca harbour works. So many delays have, however, occurred that it will be impossible to complete these works which have not yet been begun, before the autumn, which is the bad weather season. Acting upon the advice of the European representatives, the Public Works Department has cancelled the informal arrangement and will put the additions which were proposed for this year, together with those of next year, to public tender in one lot. It is hoped that the plans will be ready early in the autumn, and that the tenders will be received by 1st January, so that the works can be begun at the commencement of the fine weather season about March and completed before the following autumn. Meanwhile ample sufficient funds have been placed in the hands of the Public Works Department to undertake the maintenance of such works as are already completed or in hand. Beyond an inner shelter for lighters no serious works will be undertaken before next year. Work at Casablanca, owing to its exposed situation, is only possible between practically the end of March and the end of September.

Paris, June 19.

The programme of operations outlined by General Lyautey is being acted upon, and General d'Albief left Fez yesterday to begin operations to the south of Mekinez with four battalions of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and three batteries of artillery. General d'Albief is faced with a similar task to that entrusted to General Gouraud, and will harass the rebel tribesmen and drive them back until they no longer menace Fez and Mekinez. The artillery has already cleared Sefru and its approaches of some scattered groups.

General Gouraud's camp between Fez and Taza was attacked on Monday by native cavalry and infantry. The enemy was driven back by artillery and suffered severely when followed up by the French cavalry. The French losses were eight killed and about a dozen wounded. Despatches from the Muluya state that a convoy coming from Beni Tafit was attacked by a party of the enemy. The French had five riflemen and three native soldiers wounded.

News of the Week.

M. Mornard, whose salary has been increased, will combine the functions of Treasurer-General and Administrator of Customs. He will probably receive a new contract as Treasurer-General for a period of five years.

Salar-ed-Dowlah appears to be still among the Kelhor tribe.

Mobarek Sutaneh, the newly appointed Governor-General of Shiraz, who will leave Teheran next week to take up his new duties, will make an extensive tour in Fars with a view to putting down raids in that country and will go into the question of punishing the assailants of Consul Smart.

The latest news received by the Persian Consul-General points to the fact that things are assuming normal condition in and around Shiraz.

A Bluebook on Persia concludes with a despatch from Sir Edward Grey to Sir George Barclay dated April 2nd, declaring that it is essential that men locally known to be guilty of the attack on Consul Smart be handed over to the Persian Government for punishment. If this is done, then the detachment at Bushire will be withdrawn, and if the tribal Chiefs are friendly and peaceable for at least two months and no more road outrages occur, the withdrawal of the cavalry from Shiraz and Ispahan will follow. Persia must however, understand that the continuance of this benevolent attitude will depend on the establishment of sufficient Swedish gendarmerie. Persia must therefore before the final withdrawal of troops undertake to support Swedish officers to the utmost.

In view of the improved situation Britain postpones making any proposal to Persia to utilize the tribal Chiefs.

The Collector of Karachi has recommended to the Municipality the buying up of land at once at Drigh Road Station, as this will probably be the terminus of the Trans-Persian Railway, and land can now be had at nominal rates before the boom starts. The object is to convert Drigh Road Station into a health suburb of Karachi with residential attractions superior to anything available in Karachi town.

Shiraz is suffering from long-continued depression in trade and there is no prospect of improvement. Roads are entirely in the hands of the tribes and it is difficult to believe any Persian force will ever be able to fight the tribes, and restore order.

News from Quetta state that the alleged infraction of the Persian frontier by the Afghans some weeks ago was of a most trifling kind and the rumour could be traceable to Russian agents at Meshed.

Constantinople June 5

THE question now pending about the Persian territory around Urmia, which Turkish troops have occupied despite the protests of Russia and, if I mistake not, of Great Britain, is now being discussed by the Commission here. But I may inform the readers of the Observer in advance that the Commission will separate without coming to any satisfactory settlement and the affair will be referred to the Hague Tribunal. There, unless I am greatly mistaken, Turkey's claim will appear in a wholly unexpected light, and will surprise the Foreign Office of St. Petersburg, if not that of London.

Teheran, June 11.

The Regent left for Europe to-day. Before his departure, at the instance of the British and Russian Legations, he confirmed M. Mornard in his appointment as Treasurer-General for a period conterminous with his existing contract as Director-General of Customs. The fact that the Regent's family accompany him causes a general belief that he does not intend ever to return to Persia. The moment of his departure is unfortunate, as a further reconstruction of the Cabinet can hardly be long delayed, and it therefore seems advisable that the State should have some head. Russia appears to desire the return of the Sipahdar to power as Premier.

Reuter's Teheran correspondent telegraphed:—The Regent, accompanied by his wife and daughter, left for Europe to-day. The Cabinet crisis has not yet been settled. Vusukh-ed-Dowleh, Minister for Foreign Affairs, is being pressed to withdraw his resignation.

M. Mornard has been confirmed in his post as Treasurer-General while remaining Director-General of Customs. His powers will be virtually the same as those the Mejliss granted to Mr. Shuster, and he will have a free hand regarding the control of the expenditure of the foreign loans, while nominally obliged to act in concert with the Cabinet in other fiscal matters. It is understood that his new control is for five years.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

It might be timely, in view of the latest development of the trans-Persian railway scheme, referred to elsewhere, to reprint from the Near East of February 1912 the opinion of Mr. Shuster as expressed in a special interview granted to this journal. Whatever our opinion of the Shuster incident, we must admit that the ex-Treasurer-General of Persia knew something more about the country and its conditions than many a political writer who has never left these isles. "The proposed trans-Persian railway," he said, "if forced upon Persia by the Russians, backed by a Persian guarantee, will absolutely cripple Persia financially for the next one hundred years. For by no means could such a railway be expected to pay expenses within a shorter period, and in the meantime the guarantee, or the interest on the bonds, would have to be paid. In addition to this, if we may judge by other similar cases, Russian railroad construction materials would be forced on the Persian Government at inflated prices, at least for the entire portion of the railway lying within the so-called Russian sphere. Therefore, even if the railway is only built as far as Ispahan, the advantage to Russian influence and selfish interests will be enormous, and, if built through to Bushire or to the Indian frontier, to the above would have to be added a most important strategical advantage for Russia. The railway would, most emphatically, not pay as an investment. Its raison d'être is purely political and strategical and favours Russian policy only."

Great Britain and the Trans-Persian Railway.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—During the past two years many soldiers have watched in silence but with increasing misgiving the project of a Trans-Persian railway to India, a project which has this in common with the Channel Tunnel scheme of old, namely, that it promises to be well underway before the British people are given an opportunity of deciding with knowledge whether it ought to be pursued at all.

On one side we have the Société d'Etudes, a cosmopolitan confraternity of financiers and engineers, which is about to begin work at Paris in almost official guise, as if the principle of the railway had already been accepted by the British Parliament, which, in fact, has never been consulted nor advised on the merits of the case. On the other, we have Sir Edward Grey's assurance, given in the House of Commons on 6th June, that there is little to be said about the negotiations because there is so little that is definite. A more thoroughly equivocal and unsatisfactory state of affairs from the public point of view it is difficult to imagine.

I should be obliged if you would afford me an opportunity of expressing my opinion that this scheme, if carried out, will gravely alter the conditions under which India must be defended; will enable external pressure to be applied to India and will therefore be politically unacceptable; will not materially benefit Persia nor British and Indian interests in Persia, except by affording a quicker route for mails; will divert mails and some passengers from the sea to the land route through Germany and will correspondingly injure our maritime carrying trade and industries; will reduce the profits which the public derives from the Suez Canal; will probably burden the finances of England or India, or both; and, while being of no conceivable military service to us in any circumstances that can be foreseen, may, in certain contingencies aggravate the military risks of India, increase the front which the Army in India has to defend with relatively weak forces, inflate expenditure upon defence, and render India more liable to foreign aggression by depriving her of the shield of her desert frontiers.

I do not consider that our military and commercial interests in this question are conflicting. I consider them identical. Persia needs railways, so far as she can afford them, but not the Trans-Persian line. From the Persian as from the British and the Indian point of view, the need of the time is a line from the head of the Gulf to Khoramabad, extended if practicable to Burujird and Hamadan in order to tap the richest part of Persia and to enable British and Indian goods to approach the choicest Persian markets by the best and cheapest route. The projected lines in the Russian sphere in North-West Persia are the natural complement of a Mohammerah-Hamadan line and deserve our support. There is nothing in these lines which presents serious military risks, since they leave us the deserts for our frontiers. But of our own free act to deprive ourselves of that strongest of all barriers, a desert frontier—we who evade the first duty of citizenship both in India and in England and are allowing our supremacy at sea to be questioned and assailed—is not the act of sane men.

It is not, however, so much for the purpose of expressing an opinion that I venture to address you, but rather in order to say that so far as I am aware, neither the Committee of Defence nor the General Staffs in India and England, nor the military authorities at the India Office, have ever been invited to give an opinion on the principle of a Trans-Persian railway to India. They may have advised which is the least harmful trace for a line, but that is another question. I do not claim that military opinion, whether favourable or the reverse, should be the sole consideration in a State problem of this magnitude. But it is surely a reasonable suggestion that Parliament and the public should be made fully aware of the views of their best military adviser, before it is decided to force upon a neighbouring country, whose independence is desirable, a costly and dangerous railway, and to play fast and loose with the security of the Indian Empire.

I attach a map, upon which the various railways projected are clearly shown, in order to enable your readers to draw their own conclusions.

I am, &c.,

YOUR MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.

The Importance of Persia.

MR. H. F. B. LYNCH addressed the members of the Persia Society at University College, London, yesterday on "The Importance of Persia." After asking "What is Persia? What place does she occupy on the continent of Asia; and what is she to us and we to her?" Mr. Lynch gave a geographical and historical account of the country, and remarked that if one lesson had been burnt into the minds of the Persians of the present day, that lesson was that their hopes of a survival as a nation lie in the recognition by England and Russia—and especially by England—that the continued existence of a neutral state on the tableland of Iran is essential to relations of smoothness and confidence between these two Powers. There was little occasion for fear, he added, lest a strong and independent Persian Government would lend itself to hostile designs against us. Less attention is, I think (Mr. Lynch proceeded), due to an opinion which one sometimes meets—the theory, I mean, which, while recognising the necessity of a buffer state between us and the Russian Empire, would counsel us to retard rather than to assist its economic development. According to this view, the buffer state is most useful to ourselves when no railways cross its territory and as few roads as possible; when it offers to an invading army the scantiest supplies, so that a difficult advance would be followed, if the scales turned against the invaders, by a positively disastrous retreat. This doctrine involves the adoption of a purely selfish and immoral policy, and in the long run policies of this description are doomed to failure. Moreover, a state which is incapable of defending itself constitutes at the same time a standing menace to the peace of its neighbours and a bone of contention between them. I pass on from this theory and ask you to consider to the next place the eventuality of the suppression of Persian independence, whether openly or in a veiled form. In either case the result would, of course, be much the same.

It is surely evident that if this process should be continued—I am sorry to say it has already begun—it can end in only one way so far as England and Russia are concerned—namely, in the drawing together, and ultimately in the coterminous alignment, of their respective frontiers in Asia. It is true that the commercial spheres which were delimited in Persia by the Anglo-

Russian Convention of 1907 display a considerable gap between the British and Russian spheres. This gap constitutes a so-called Neutral Sphere. I scarcely know what counsels of wisdom or despair underlay the adoption of this strange device. But I hardly think that any of the eminent authorities on Persia who may be present here this afternoon would be prepared to argue that it would be possible to set up an independent Persian buffer state within the limits of the neutral sphere. If we may take that for granted, then in the eventuality which we are considering, the neutral sphere must either become absorbed by England or by Russia or be partitioned between the two. Whichever hypothesis we adopt we are thus brought face to face with the actual meeting of the British and Russian frontiers in Persia. That, I submit, is a prodigious eventuality, yet it is in this direction that, I am sorry to say, we seem now to be drifting. Suppose, in the first place, that Russia obtains control and ultimately possession of the neutral sphere. Then our frontier will envelop the western confines of Afghanistan, proceeding through Kirman to Bundar Abbas at the entrance to the Persian Gulf. It will have a length of over 500 miles, or, including the unprotected portion of the Afghan frontier on the side of Persia, in the defence of which we should have to assist, of 700 miles. If on the other hand, the neutral sphere were partitioned with any regard for British interests, our frontier would march directly with the Russian frontier across Persia for about 1,000 miles. Of course, we might retire to our present frontier in Baluchistan. But this would expose the western flank of Afghanistan, including the important strategical position of Seistan, and would still leave us with a frontier coterminous with that of Russia for over 400 miles.

Now, you already know enough about the natural features of Persia to recognise that none of these possible frontiers coincide with any commanding natural obstacles. You have to contemplate a frontier drawn for considerable distances across elevated plains which may be likened to the surface of a billiard table. I do not say that it would be impossible for us to defend such a frontier; but I do assert that it would involve an immense expenditure of money and the conversion of this country into a military nation. Nor would the burden upon the Russian Empire be an easy one to bear. Common prudence should therefore restrain the diplomacy of both Powers from drifting into a situation of this kind. I recognise that within the limits of time at my disposal I have been unable to do more than indicate the outline of my subject. But I think you will agree with me that it is one of absorbing interest. Looking at the issues which it involves, I feel that none of us will be inclined to underrate the importance of Persia.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE speech of Mr. Lynch to the Persia Society last night put very clearly the political and military objections to our present Persian policy. The two parties to the old quarrel in English politics over Russian designs in Asia had this much in common, that they both recognised how serious a thing for England and for India a common Asiatic frontier with Russia in Asia would be. But whereas the one party proposed to ward off the danger by ourselves advancing to meet it, the other and the Liberal view was anxious above all things to create powerful and friendly buffer States between India and Asiatic Russia, and made it a first condition of our policy that we should ourselves do nothing to weaken their independence. In Afghanistan, this second policy has carried the day and secured the support of all parties. Not so in Persia. Yet, as Mr. Lynch showed, they are geographically the same country; and the same political and military principles must necessarily be applied in both. But in Persia we are deserting them. The idea has apparently captured the Foreign Office that we may as well write off the north of Persia for lost. Against that Mr. Lynch opposes his conviction that if the north goes, the centre, or neutral zone, must go too. "An independent Persian buffer State is impossible within the limits of the neutral sphere." And how grave the consequences of the disappearance of this neutral zone are Mr. Lynch shows by a few figures. We should have a common frontier with Russia of at least 500 and possibly of 700 miles. That would mean the conversion of this country into a military nation; it would destroy the rare advantages of our island position on which our political and maritime greatness has been built. That is the importance of Persia for this country. Let no one think that it is merely a question of Persian liberties; our own or some considerable part of them are involved too. We are glad to think that the tremendous political and military importance of Persia to this country is now more generally recognised in politics. The Economist of this week, for example, condemns the trans-Persian railway to India in most outspoken fashion; and others, no doubt, will follow in time. The mingled apathy and frivolity with which the press has for the most part treated this question has at times made one almost despair of the old English reputation for political sagacity.

Athens, June 18.

An assembly of delegates from the 12 Aegean islands occupied by Italy met on Sunday at the ancient monastery in the Island of Patmos and voted an address to the Italian Government declaring the desire of the islanders for union with Greece, but, in case this should be impossible, expressing the hope that Italy and the liberal European Powers will accord complete autonomy to all the islands in the Aegean. The assembly further devised a new flag for an Autonomous Aegean Confederation, and decided to issue special postage stamps. General Ameglio has invited the Domogerontes, or municipal authorities of the island, to confer with him at Rhodes on various local questions.

Rome, June 17.

Details are now given of the disembarkation of the Expeditionary Corps under the command of General Camerana at Bu Sceifa, some eight miles from Misurata, which is itself about 52 miles east of Homs. Immediately after occupying the shrine of Bu Sceifa the troops proceeded to the oasis behind Bu Sceifa and the neighbouring heights. Attempts made by scanty groups of Arabs to hinder this operation were met by a steady fire from the troops, and the enemy dispersed, leaving some dead on the ground. Later in the afternoon, however, the Arabs returned to the charge in larger numbers and made a determined attack upon the Italian right wing. Fighting continued till 6 in the evening, when the enemy retreated, leaving 50 of their dead on the ground and a considerable number of rifles with a quantity of ammunition. The Italian losses were two killed and nine wounded. Misurata is a rather important commercial centre with about 15,000 inhabitants, though its trade seems to have suffered a good deal on account of the war. It is about six miles inland, from the coast, from which it is divided in the north by a particularly dense oasis. The difficulty of penetrating this oasis is probably the reason for the choice of Bu Sceifa as the point of disembarkation. The exact strength of the expeditionary force is not stated, but it seems to include at least four battalions of infantry, one regiment of Bersaglieri, one company of Askaris, besides artillery and engineers. General Fara has also accompanied the force.

Rome, June 19.

The last despatches from General Camerana show that the expeditionary corps landed at Bu Sceifa is still occupied in strengthening its position at Cape Yorug and that no advance upon Misurata has been made. It is somewhat doubtful whether these tactics, which have on previous occasions permitted the gathering of larger forces of Arabs while the invading troops secure a basis of operations, are altogether wise. Any delay which fills the oasis round Misurata with the enemy must render the capture of that place a far more difficult and dangerous task.

The Italian Press is again filled with rumours of an international conference, taken for the most part from the least responsible organs of foreign opinion. The attitude of Italian journals in this matter is not very easy to determine. They repeat every suggestion that is made, however absurd its character and however untrustworthy its source, and while they resent most of the proposals that are made with regard to the Italian terms of peace, they now seem equally to resent the counter-assertion that no international conference is called for or can serve any good purpose.

Salonika, June 19.

The negotiations between the Albanians and representatives of the Government continue at Ipek, where the Ulema, Beys and notables from Prizrend, Djakova, Pristina and Ipek have been summoned to meet Fadil Pasha and Massar Bey, respectively, Commandant and Vali of Uskub. It would appear to be recognized by the authorities that the removal of the Mutessarif of Ipek has become the principal condition imposed both by the rebels under arms and by the inhabitants of the town. It is now difficult for the Government, however, to cede this point without an exhibition of what they consider to be weakness. The Ipek conference, therefore, is being held with a view to reconciling the Albanians with the distasteful Mutessarif. The only incident of interest to report occurred at Vuchitrn, where the rebels descended and burned the fortified residence of Husni Bey and disappeared before the arrival of the troops. This occurrence has considerably excited the inhabitants, who, fearing more serious raids, complain of the deplorable position in which they are placed between attacks by rebels and oppression by the Army. Further north the situation at present is quiet. Fadil Pasha has visited Istok and posted troops at all positions of strategic value.

According to news from Uskub, the existing calm is due to the Albanians' lack of provisions and ammunition, and it is suggested that action of a guerilla nature will be recommenced when the rebels have succeeded in replenishing their stores. The Greek reports of fighting in the Argyrokastro district are unfounded.

Rome, June 20.

An official despatch from Benghazi reports that a brigade yesterday morning, while making a reconnaissance for the sake of practice in the oasis of Suani Osman, came across the enemy occupying well-chosen positions, on a very extended front, from which they offered a determined resistance. The enemy were driven back and the Italian troops returned to Benghazi after remaining three hours in the oasis. The enemy's loss is supposed to be heavy. The Italian loss was one Askari and one native killed and 11 men wounded.

Constantinople, June 20.

The National Bank of Turkey and Sir John Jackson's representative received communications from the Minister of Public Works yesterday and to-day, announcing that the recent adjudication of the irrigation works in Mesopotamia had been cancelled. A new adjudication limited to the firms of Sir John Jackson and Messrs. Pearson and Son, the latter of whom were officially eliminated from the previous competition, will now be opened. Tenders must reach the Ministry of Public Works by 2 o'clock on the afternoon of the 27th instant and all offers exceeding a certain figure, which is not made public, will be rejected. Should the Minister then decide in favour of one of the competing firms the contract will almost immediately be submitted to the approval of the Chamber of Deputies.

Smyrna, June 13.

Great numbers of troops are being drafted into the Smyrna district by the Turkish authorities. There are 45,000 here already and 15,000 more are due to arrive in the next few days. Abdullah Pasha has come to take the supreme command.

There is no official confirmation of the rumour that the Italians have effected a landing at Mersina.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

Smyrna, June 8.

In Smyrna it is believed that the Italians have finally decided to occupy the islands of Chios and Mytilene simultaneously within the next few days and then make an attack on Smyrna. The Turks are making every possible preparation to repel any attack on the city. The French railway company have received instructions to arrange to have their line free to bring down 40 battalions from the Hermus Valley to Smyrna, and the British railway have received similar instructions as regards 13 battalions from the Meander Valley. The French railway company have sent a circular to all the principal merchants stating that they will not be responsible for delay in handling goods owing to their line being altogether occupied in bringing down troops.

After mounting big guns on all the mountains surrounding the Gulf of Smyrna, the military authorities have now begun mounting small mountain guns on all the hillocks commanding the shore, as if they anticipated having to deal with landing parties. The Turkish troops in this province are to be placed under General Mahmud Mukhtar Bey, who was Vali of the Aidin Vilayet before he became Minister of Marine, which post he resigned on the outbreak of the war. The camp has been fixed between two stations on the British railway line to Aidin; Kazamir, nine miles south of Smyrna, and Develi-köy, seven miles farther on. In a few days some 60 battalions will be camped in this treeless plain. The position has great strategic value, because should the Italians land on the Kara Burun peninsula, after occupying the adjoining island of Chios, the Turkish army would block their way to Smyrna; should they, on the other hand, land from Mytilene the Turkish army could be easily moved by the British railway first to Smyrna and then up the Hermus Valley on the French railway. Many of the troops in camp at Develi-köy have come from Salonika and have been in arms for the past two years and present a very fine appearance.

Constantinople, June 14.

The Sabah announces that the Government, in view of the cost of the war, have decided to lay proposals for an increase of the salt tax and the spirit duty before the Chamber. It does not appear, however, that a definite decision has been taken on this subject by the Council of Ministers.

Constantinople, June 17.

The negotiations between the Imperial Ottoman Bank and the acting Minister of Finance for an advance to the Turkish Government of £12,500,000 have ended, the Bank informing Djavid Bey that in the present condition of the money market it is unable to place more than £11,000,000 in Treasury bonds in Paris. Djavid Bey has requested the Bank to raise the amount to be advanced if possible to £11,250,000.

Tunis, June 18.

Captain Dixon-Johnson, accompanied by two doctors and an assistant and six male nurses, arrived here on Sunday with a second camp accommodating 60 patients. He is awaiting the arrival of his stores from England and hopes to leave for the frontier on Saturday. He is seeking a fully-qualified Arab doctor to accompany him and extra native servants, but is hampered by lack of funds.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Daily Chronicle correspondent, telegraphing from Pera yesterday, says:—The Tanin prints an article in which it states that after the revolution Turkey showed a great desire for British sympathy and demonstrated the greatest friendship for Great Britain. In this expression of feeling the Government and the Opposition were alike unanimous. The misunderstanding which came later was not difficult to correct and now it is possible to create an admirable feeling of reciprocity. Turkey has in Great Britain (the Tanin states) a solid friend, but in order to consolidate this feeling of friendship she must show that she is serious in her progressive effort and in her work of regeneration. Liberal acts are necessary if Turkey is to win over British public opinion. What is wanted is adherence to an intelligent national policy and the avoidance of exaggerated national pride.

Occupation of Rhodes.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, June 13.

THE news which reaches Italy directly from Rhodes is rather scanty, and it is only from Italian correspondents who have returned after a visit to the Aegean, to Athens and elsewhere, that a fuller description can be obtained of what is happening in the islands occupied by the Italian forces. The Messaggero to-day publishes a long despatch from its correspondent in Athens containing an account of a visit to Rhodes that is not without interest. The writer describes the island as tranquilly pursuing its ordinary life and occupations. The administration, the postal and custom services, the courts of justice, all perform their various functions without any hitch. The Italian military authorities are paying especial attention to the question of sanitation and are actively engaged in improving the water-supply of Rhodes itself; so bad was it, apparently, that many cases of typhus have already occurred among the Italian troops with 15 deaths. The finances of the island have been also taken in hand, the Turkish system of taxation being continued for the present unaltered with the exception of a reduction of from 12 to 10 per cent. on agricultural produce. The Turkish customs régime is also continued, with its tax of 11 per cent. ad valorem, on imported goods and 1 per cent. on exports. The revenue for the year is calculated roughly at about £60,000. To provide for local administration, General Ameglio has appointed 46 syndics and two mudirs and instituted 12 stations of carabinieri with three lieutenants. The syndics have been appointed according to the preponderance of nationality in the population; 42 of them are Greek and four Turks.

Beside the Italian tricolour the correspondent saw a number of Greek flags and not a few bearing a white cross on a blue ground, which represented the claim of Rhodes to be autonomous. The Greek and Jew quarters of the city were most animated. The Turkish quarter silent and almost deserted. In spite of all reassurances received from the Italian authority, the Turkish population holds aloof in sullen distrust. Five hundred Turkish women have already abandoned the island and gone to join their families on the mainland, while every day more permissions to embark are demanded. Of the men, 300 have been allowed to depart but a good many are still refused consent. It was said that as soon as the port was declared open the great majority of the Turks would immediately leave. The members of the Young Turk Committee, to the number of nearly 100, were all arrested and sent as prisoners to Italy in the first days of the Italian occupation, while another 400 Turco-Cretans considered dangerous to the public peace, were transported to Asia Minor. Meanwhile, at the end of last week, 7th June, some 20 Italian refugees from Messina in Asia Minor landed in Rhodes and were welcomed by the Italian authorities.

The correspondent remarks that owing to the lack of preconcerted plans and orders the treatment of the Turks in the various islands has differed greatly, each Italian commander, apparently, having made his own dispositions. While the Kaimakams and other officials of Syri and Cos are freely walking about the streets of Rhodes, all the authorities in other islands have been arrested and are in prison. In one island even the sanitary inspector, an orthodox Greek, had been arrested and deported elsewhere, his family remaining in ignorance of his destination. A similar confusion seems to have reigned with regard to the disarmament of the inhabitants. In some places it has been carried out thoroughly and in others not at all. It is evident, however, that the general rule prevailing in the Italian occupation is to interfere with the inhabitants of the islands as little as possible.

The correspondent gives an animated account of a visit paid to Kalymnos last Sunday, 9th June, by Admiral Viale. The admiral and his staff attended a Te Deum in the Metropolitan Church, and after the ceremony listened to an address which had been drawn up by the two chief island authorities. This address, after expressing gratification at the admiral's visit, continued, according to the Messaggero, in these words:—

"Our desire, cherished for long centuries past, has been to unite ourselves with our great mother, Greece. Gratitude towards our Italian brothers does not prevent us from revealing our sentiments and even prompts us to declare our wishes and hopes. We know that your mission aims only at the liberty and not at the conquest of these lands. If our desire for union with Greece should, for political reasons, not be capable of immediate realization, we none the less feel the liveliest satisfaction at finding ourselves under the protection of our Italian brothers. For this situation means at least for us the removal of the barbarous dominion which has made barren the fertile lands of Asia Minor, the fair Ionic shores, and the picturesque islands of the Aegean."

Admiral Viale seems to have answered appropriately, assuring the islanders of his sympathy and promising to make their wishes known in Rome. In spite of the diplomatic reticence of Italian admirals and even of Roman newspapers, it is evident enough that any idea of a restitution to Turkey at the end of the war of the islands now occupied will have to be abandoned. Not that Italy at all contemplates their permanent occupation. Though Italian newspapers find pleasure in recalling historical and legendary ties between their country and the South Aegean, there is no popular aspiration for dominion in those seas. On the other hand, the use of the islands for bartering purposes in the negotiation of terms of peace has in popular sentiment become impossible. At the most, Italy could bring herself to hand over her conquests to the other European Powers and only then because she will feel the assurance that those Powers will recognize the same impossibility of restoring them to Turkish rule.

Problems Of The War.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

Vienna, June 17.

MEETINGS between the German Emperor and the Tsar are never devoid of importance, but to judge by the manner in which their forthcoming rendezvous has been announced, it is desired in Berlin that the world should regard this year's meeting as particularly significant. This is, naturally, not a reason for accepting the German valuation, though the international situation that is being created by the Turco-Italian War doubtless lends unusual interest to the intercourse of two Sovereigns who are their own Ministers for Foreign Affairs. On the other hand, the German Emperor may have wished to forestall M. Poincaré and to make sure that Russia will remain true to the spirit of the Potsdam Agreement. The German Government is believed to be keenly alive to the possibility that the Turco-Italian War, both in its effects upon the Turkish Empire and in its influence upon the balance of power in the Mediterranean, may confront Germany with the necessity of modifying her policy in the Near East, and to be most anxious to ascertain at first hand the intentions of Russia.

The removal of Baron Von Marschall from Constantinople has always been regarded here as having been inspired primarily by the wish of Germany to have a freer hand in regard to Turkish questions than was possible while he remained there, and only secondarily by a desire to be represented in London by a statesman of the first rank. Germany is not a Mediterranean Power, and seems to feel that the settlement of the Turco-Italian conflict, whenever it comes and if it comes at all, may settle also the question whether the German ambition to become a Mediterranean Power is likely to be realized. This issue may, perhaps, be tentatively raised during the meeting in the Finnish waters.

With the Turkish Forces in Tripoli.

(FROM A "MORNING POST" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Zanzur, May 17.

I hurried here after the battle of Bukemesh, thinking that after that engagement the Italians would come out of Tripoli by way of Gargaresh and endeavour to occupy Zanzur. They have withdrawn most of their men from the Ain Zara side, and the neighbourhood of Gargaresh is full of their soldiers. They are building a wall from the sea, taking in the whole region outside Tripoli; the Turks sarcastically express the hope that they are not building it to take in the whole province. The Italian claim to have secured a victory at Bukemesh on 3rd May has created amazement here, as they were compelled to take refuge in their fortifications and only saved from complete destruction by the fire of their warships. In that engagement some Arabs got right into the Italian lines and brought away a sack of sugar and several cases of ammunition.

The Arabs are still making successful raids and returning continuously with all kinds of loot—railway, telegraph and telephone wire, Italian clothing which had been laid out to dry on the wire entanglements, tunics, helmets of the 6th Engineers and 40th Infantry, the green and red flags of railway officials and a railway guard's horn. I have seen these objects with my own eyes. It is believed here that the Italians are at their wits' end and have no idea what plan of campaign to adopt.

The Italian airmen have displayed great pluck and energy. The aeroplanes have not made their appearance since the arrival of the two airships. They are very active, visiting all the camps in turn and dropping innumerable bombs. The latter have done little harm, though several of the Arab women and children who throng the camps have been killed. The pilot of one of these airships sent a letter to the officer in command of the Turkish Artillery enclosing a bad photograph of a shrapnel shell which burst close to his airship. The commanding officer here has had a number of leaflets placed on the Italian barbed wire entanglements giving them news of their defeat (sic) at Rhodes with the loss of 200 men killed and 1,000 prisoners. This news was communicated to the Turks by special wire.

One of the leaflets recently dropped by the Italians referred to the alleged death of Enver Bey and ran as follows: "Enver Bey, on his way from Derna to Egypt (wishing to go back to Turkey) died at Mariot, gangrene having set into his wounds. During the last few days the Italian Fleet bombarded the Dardanelles and some towns and disembarked troops on the Island of Astrobia (Astropalia?). We have also vigorously repulsed the Arabs at Bukemesh five days after disembarking."

Another notice reads:—"On the 2nd April the Italian Army in its sortie at Khoms possessed itself of the ruins of Lybdié. On the 3rd April the Italian Army made a sortie at Bukemesh to capture a convoy, forced the enemy to retire, and inflicted severe losses, notwithstanding his pluck, which is well known. On the 4th May the Italian Army disembarked at the Isle of Rhodes."

"Arabs! The Turks give you bad provisions, which bring about sickness and cause great losses among you. What do you expect from them? Why don't you detach yourselves from the Turks? God, being the owner of all territories, has the right to take it from one and give it to another. He has given it to us."

French References to the War.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, June 16.

M. POINCARÉ's references in the French Chamber of Deputies to the Turco-Italian War seem to produce some irritation here. The Giornale d'Italia is not the only newspaper which classes them among things better left unsaid, or at least among those which should have been expressed differently. The French Minister, according to his Italian critics, alluded to the incidents of the Carthage and Manouba as if his action had overawed Italy and prevented any recurrence of such questions between the two countries; a presentation of the case which, in spite of the accompanying friendly protestations, these critics think was not calculated to conciliate Italian opinion. Nor was his insistence upon the duties of France as a great Mussalman Power any better received by a country which thinks that the French Government has already gone needlessly far in respecting Arab prejudices. Arab agitations, Turkish recruitments and organizations of contraband in Tunis, it is held, have been the natural result of the too great complaisance with one side rather than with the other, and hardly bear out the French assertion of strict neutrality.

The fact is that Italian susceptibilities are still a little ruffled, and M. Poincaré's somewhat blunt declarations have failed to soothe them.

The charges made against the Italian troops by the journals Sabah and Tanin, reported in your Constantinople telegram of 12th June have also been noticed in the Italian Press, where they have excited an indignant denial. As your Constantinople Correspondent remarks, neither date nor circumstances are mentioned in this list of alleged outrages. There can be little doubt, however, that this is a mere repetition of charges contradicted and disproved at the beginning of the Tripoli campaign.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, June 20.

Considerable astonishment is expressed in Paris at the offence which, as your Rome correspondent mentioned in Tuesday's issue, appears to have been taken by the Giornale d'Italia and some other Italian journals at M. Poincaré's recent declaration on foreign policy in the Chamber of Deputies.

M. Poincaré declared that, notwithstanding the continuance of the Italo-Turkish War, and the uncertainty of the prospects of peace, there seemed no reason to dread any extension of complications. France faithfully maintained an identical attitude towards the two combatants, an attitude of the most scrupulous neutrality. With Turkey she had relations of traditional friendship. France was a great Mussalman Power, and the Government desired to do nothing which could weaken the influence of France in Africa. To Italy France was attached by links which had not been weakened by recent incidents (a reference to the detention of French vessels and of the Turkish Red Crescent Mission). The matters to which he alluded had been referred to arbitration, and no more ships had been exposed to visits of inspection such as had given ground for French protests. The misunderstanding now dispelled, had made no change in the sentiments of the two peoples, which were united by many memories and many affinities.

It seemed most natural for M. Poincaré to remind the Chamber that France, like Britain, is a great Mussalman Power—a fact that furnishes the strongest of reasons why France, like Britain, has to maintain an attitude of great reserve during the present conflict. It is inexplicable that any section of Italian opinion should charge M. Poincaré with having asserted that in consequence of his diplomatic action there had since the Carthage and Manouba incidents been no further visitation of French ships by the Italian authorities. M. Poincaré, as may be seen from the report of his speech, did not say one word about his "action." He merely mentioned with satisfaction, and in most cordial terms, the fact that no more French ships had been visited and that the relations of the two countries had again become excellent.

There is likewise a feeling of surprise here at the language used by a section of the Rome Press regarding an alleged "organization of contraband traffic in Tunis," in view of the very strict measures which have been enforced by the French Resident-General, M. Alapetite, in accordance with instructions sent by the French Government. Moreover, the impressions of certain Italian journals would seem to be in absolute contradiction to the views of the Italian Government.

Not only have the correspondents of French journals in Rome been able to report the entire satisfaction of Signor Giolitti with M. Poincaré's declarations, but, if my information is correct, the French Ambassador, M. Barrère, has been officially requested to thank the French Minister for Foreign Affairs for his public declarations.

Intervention.

THE Rome correspondent of the Temps, making himself the mouthpiece of certain French diplomatic influences, declares that the proposal of a European conference to settle the Turco-Italian War was originally brought forward by France, and is still being advocated by her as a means of restoring normal conditions in the Mediterranean, of preventing troubles in the Near East, and of paying her debt to Italy incurred at Algeciras. The idea is supported by England partly for the first two of the reasons mentioned, and partly because of the repercussion which the events in Tripoli are causing in the Moslem world. Backing is given also by Russia, which is afraid of troubles in the Balkans. As against this, the correspondent asserts, the proposal is viewed with little favour in Germany and Austria. Germany does not like the idea of meeting at the same table her Turkish friend and her Italian ally, and of having to choose between them. She does not relish the fact that the initiative in the matter has come from the Entente Powers. She further prefers to wait until the Porte is exhausted so that she may become the mediator between the two belligerents; and, lastly, she would like to defer any decisive step in the matter until the time for the renewal of the Triple Alliance arrives. As for Austria, she does not want to help Italy at the present moment lest this help should be regarded as payment for Italy's consent to the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. She wishes to wait until she can obtain something else in the Balkans, when her consent to the annexation of Tripoli by Italy could be made conditional upon consent being given to her own new acquisition.

The Temps correspondent elaborates this thesis at great length, but in the end admits that Italy herself is for the present against a conference because she cannot disown her annexations, while no Power would take upon itself to compel an unwilling Turkey to recognise them. Hence, the writer says, the determination of Italy to continue the war and to strike a heavy blow at Turkey to compel her to yield.

Such a determination seems, however, to be difficult to carry out. Signor di Marini, an ex-Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, writing in the Resto del Carlino, alleges that in consequence of an exchange of views between Italy and her two allies, the Italian Government has decided to suspend its naval action in the Aegean. This accords with the information given a few days ago by the leader writer of the Temps, according to which Germany had requested Italy to abstain from attacking Mytilene. Signor di Marini adds that there is a special article in the treaty of the Triple Alliance referring to the Balkan Peninsula and the islands in the Aegean. Italy therein entered into certain engagements which have now been recalled to her by her allies.

Railway Activity in Asiatic Turkey.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Beyrout, May 31.

THE war seems now to stimulate, after having damped, the efforts of the Ottoman Government to construct railway lines. The Medina-Mecca extension, which had been almost begun and then interrupted, is to be immediately continued. The surplus material which has been lying at Caiffa—the sea transport having been negotiated before the war—has been sent inland by the Hedjaz Railway, and two battalions of soldiers are said to have been despatched thither for the preliminary works. Once this extension is made into the Yemen the periodical insurrectionary risings in Arabia may be dealt with more effectively. The growing audacity of the Mahdi of Assir must have been a primary factor in determining such prompt action on the part of a Government distracted by a slow and wearying war.

The same activity is displayed in the improvement of the existing line. An order of about 15,000 tons of sleepers is already offered for tender, and will probably be secured by German firms. These sleepers are destined to replace the wooden ones on the line between Maan and Medina. Recent arrivals also include one hundred wagons and ten locomotives. Apprehending the possibility of seizure by the Italians, the Hedjaz Railway Company had the locomotive parts sent on to Damascus, and mounted there. A further order of one hundred wagons and thirty vans has been closed, and as this rolling stock is chiefly destined for the pilgrim traffic, delivery is to be effected not later than the month of October next. The ten locomotives have been supplied by German firms, while six first-class carriages have to be supplied by a Franco-Belgian concern.

Railway activity is also being displayed by the Government in Palestine. The laying of rails on the Caiffa-Acre junction commenced a few weeks ago, and this small line is expected to be in working order in the autumn. The works will involve the construction of two metallic bridges to span the rivers Mukattah (Sisson) and Naanman. The line crosses the village of Beled El Sheikh, where the Government intends building a barrack, and Shefa Amr. The building of Acre station is in progress. The length of the Caiffa-Acre junction is estimated at about 18 kilometres.

The Hedjaz Railway Company was reported lately to have decided on the building of a branch line from Aloule, on the Caiffa-Damascus line, to Jerusalem. I learn now that the preliminary works have already been undertaken. This branch line will, it is estimated, be about 87 kilometres in length, and will cross Jeneen and Jebel Nablous (Samaria). Most of the material necessary is already at Caiffa. According to orders from Constantinople it is to be finished, at least as far as Jeneen, before the end of the financial year, viz., March 1913. As the new budget has not yet been voted, orders have been passed to draw the requisite amount from the old budget of the Hedjaz Railway so as to insure the realisation of the scheme by the required date.

Irrigation in the Near East.

(BY SIR WILLIAM WILLCOCKS, K.C.M.G.)

MR. WEBB of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce lately wrote an article in the Nineteenth Century on "The Coming Deluge." He meant a deluge of gold, which was being poured into the markets of the world at a rate of £100,000,000 per annum. To the fact that the profitable expenditure of this money did not keep pace with its production he attributed much of the present-day worries and troubles. It struck me, as I read the article, that one might go back to the oldest science in the world to enable us to spend some of this money profitably. There are many irrigation fields in the near East which might be profitably worked. Egypt could spend on:—

1. A thorough drainage scheme for the country ... £6,000,000
 2. A canalisation to irrigate all the lands to be reclaimed without injuring the higher lands ... 6,000,000
 3. Escapes into the deserts to insure the country against floods ... 6,500,000
 4. Reservoir and training works and power stations in the Sudd region of the White Nile ... 5,000,000
- £23,500,000
- The Cilician plain consisting of 1,000,000 acres might be thoroughly drained and canalised for £8,000,000
- The Babylonian plain of 5,000,000 acres of reclaimable land might be provided with irrigation and drainage and agricultural works for ... £50,000,000
- Escapes into the deserts for the two rivers ... 7,000,000
- £67,000,000

The Karun and Kerkha deltas, containing 1,500,000 acres of reclaimable land might be canalised and drained, and provided with agricultural works for ... £15,000,000

Here we have a total sum of £124,000,000 which might be spent, and, if judiciously managed, might prove itself as profitable as a gold mine and as permanent as water power depending on the melting snows of the Alps. Europe has thoroughly learned the value and permanency of water use as power; it has only just begun to grasp the value and permanency of water used for irrigation. In realising these truths England is far behind America and the rest of Europe. The Institution of Civil Engineers in Westminster classes irrigation as a sub-section of sewerage, while our Australian cousins go back to pre-Adamite times and conserve the waters of their rivers for navigation, instead of "wasting" it on irrigation, even in years of drought when there is scarcely a ton of stuff to transport by boat on its then God-forsaken and barren plains.

In the early days of the world (and we must remember it was a Near Eastern world) there were giants on the earth who diverted the deluges of water into the mighty irrigation works of Egypt and Babylonia. Our world of to-day is waiting for some financial giant to divert some of the deluges of gold into the same channels as the ancients did, and so bring back the prosperous days of 2,500 years ago in the four best known deltas of antiquity.—The Near East.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says :—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him.....Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

The Week.

Universities' Congress.

THE Indian delegates to the Universities' Congress have selected Sir Thomas Holland to represent India on the Central Bureau consisting of seven representatives of British and Irish and seven of Overseas Universities.

The Franchise Bill.

IN THE House of Commons on 12th July the Opposition amendment to the Franchise Bill was rejected by 290 votes to 218 and the Bill was read a second time. Mr. Asquith, replying to Mr. Balfour's criticism of the Government's attitude on female suffrage dismissed as altogether improbable the hypothesis that the House was likely to reverse its previous rejection of female suffrage.

Foreign Outlook.

SPEAKING at the Mansion House on 12th July Mr. Lloyd George said, he believed that the international situation had never been better. When he addressed a similar gathering in 1911, the outlook was anxious. He was glad that the disturbing element on foreign relations, the Morocco question, had been settled satisfactorily to all, leaving nothing to rankle. The era of goodwill, said Mr. Lloyd George, had begun. The situation was good and improving, and there was nothing in the foreign outlook to create uneasiness. There was a growing desire on the part of the nation to be on good terms which would promote that confidence and enterprise which was essential to commercial prosperity here and in every other land.

Mr. Lloyd George's speech was delivered at the Bankers' dinner. At the outset he dwelt on the unequalled prosperity of trade, based on sound healthy circumstances, which was therefore likely to endure. Experts informed him that the trade barometer was set fair here and abroad. The vitality and soundness of our trade was such that his anticipations of the injury of the coal strike were not realised. The temporary injury had already been overcome. He did not anticipate any further overpowering labour trouble.

Naval Expenditure.

THE Daily Chronicle of 16th July says that some perturbation has been caused in Liberal circles by the statement made by Mr. Massingham in an article published yesterday that there is danger of the Government losing the services of Mr. Lloyd George. "Happily" says the Chronicle, "there is no fear of such a disaster. It is incredible that he should contemplate quitting the Cabinet on the ground of naval expansion for which his speech at the Mansion House in July 1911 was largely responsible."

Mr. Harold Spender in the Daily News says, it is understood that the Cabinet yesterday discussed startling estimates submitted by the Admiralty for increasing the expenditure by four millions in 1913, largely on behalf of the Mediterranean.

MR. CHURCHILL will announce the supplementary naval estimates on the 18th instant. Reports in the newspapers indicate heavy outlay for the Mediterranean and for increasing the pay of seamen.

A Departmental Committee is being established to deal with the manning of the navy and increase in pay. Lord Fisher has been asked to preside.

The Times states that a Royal Commission with Lord Fisher as Chairman will be appointed to investigate the question of fuel in the Navy. It is also hoped that the Commission will be able to enquire into the rates of pay in the Navy, with a view to the removal of grievances. Nothing official has hitherto been made public with regard to the Naval Committees.

In the House of Commons on 17th July Mr. Churchill in reply to a question said there was no truth whatever that a Commission had been appointed to inquire into rates of pay in the Navy. Newspapers, however, persist that Lord Fisher will preside over a wide inquiry extending to ship-building policy, distribution of the fleet and fuel supply.

Afghanistan.

A FRONTIER CORRESPONDENT reports that Shahgassi Dost Mahomed Khan has been appointed Governor of Khost, in place of Mahomed Akbar Khan, degraded and dismissed.

There are still a number of Mangal refugees with their wives and families in the Kurram Valley. They are to be given the option of returning to the Khost Valley or of surrendering their arms. There seems no reason now why they should not move back into their own hills as such lenient terms are being granted by the Afghan authorities.

General Janbazz Khan has been sent to Khost Valley on a special mission, it is said, to coerce the Gabar section of Mangals who have not yet made their submission. They have retired to their hills and are sullenly waiting to be attacked. They will probably be leniently dealt with as orders from Kabul are apparently to pacify Khost and the adjoining hill tracts without resort to any stern measures.

A letter from Jellalabad states that the work of road making, in which the Amir takes such a strong personal interest, is proceeding steadily, mainly by forced labour. The Military road from Laghman into Kaffiristan is now open, a number of bridges having lately been finished. Similarly in the Asmar direction on the southern border of Chitral, the road has been greatly improved. It offers an alternative route into Kaffiristan. It is said to be the intention of the Amir to link the Military road through Kaffiristan with the trade route in Badakshan.

A frontier correspondent reports that negotiations between the Afghan authorities and the Mangal tribesmen in Khost were facilitated by some of the Amir's officers staying as hostages in the tribal villages. The Mangals were thus assured that no treacherous arrests would be made as on previous occasions.

Egypt.

Viscount Kitchener on 16th July paid a visit to Buckingham Palace. Later in the day he visited the Foreign Office, where he had a long conference with Sir Edward Grey and the officials.

China.

REUTER wires from Peking on 15th July.—It is officially stated that the President has accepted the resignation of four members of the Cabinet, also that of Hsiungshiling, Finance Minister, who will devote his whole time to the financial situation. The Premier, Hsiungshiling and Chowtschi, the ex-Acting Finance Minister, will constitute a committee to deal with the Foreign Loans.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg.—Official advices state that Chinese troops and villagers at Khotin in Turkestan surrounded and burned the house of a Russian subject, Said Effendi. A hundred of his compatriots were in the house at the time and many of them were killed.

Reuter wires from Peking.—The Russian Minister has demanded compensation and punishment of the authors of the outrage in Khotan.

Reuter wires from Hong Kong.—The Chinaman who made an attack upon Sir Francis May, Governor of Hong Kong, on the 4th instant, has been sentenced to penal servitude for life.

South Africa.

In the House of Lords on 17th July Lord Ampthill said that the question of Indians in South Africa was again causing anxiety, in the first place because the long-promised settlement had again been postponed and secondly, because the management of the settlement was now in the hands of Mr. Fischer who was less amicable to Indians than General Smuts. Meanwhile the spirit of settlement was being violated. His Lordship gave instances in this connection.

Lord Emmott replied that the Government had always considered every case and were ready to intervene if any useful purpose could be served thereby, but they were not going to be driven into a policy of constant "nagging." There was reason in some of Lord Ampthill's complaints, but said Lord Emmott, if he wanted all these individual cases affecting a self-governing Colony to be made the subject of representation then he must wait till the Unionists were in power.

Lord Ampthill (interrupting): "I only suggested representations of a general tendency with regard to the treatment of Indians."

Lord Emmott: "It is impossible to deal with a number of cases on general terms. We must deal with each on its merits."

His Majesty's Government considered the Immigration Bill generally satisfactory and keenly regretted that it had not been passed this session but they had positive proofs of the South African Ministers' anxiety to pass it. Ministers had expressed regret to Lord Gladstone and promised to introduce it at the earliest moment next session.

With regard to the change of portfolios between Mr. Fischer and General Smuts, Lord Emmott said they were members of the same Government and presumably their policy in the matter was the same. His Majesty's Government had for a long time been trying to obtain appeal on the question of domicile. Ministers had promised an amendment to the Immigration Bill giving appeal. Such an amendment, said Lord Emmott, would have been most valuable. The case quoted by Lord Ampthill did not afford ground for a general charge of departure from the spirit of the settlement.

The "Burma Critic."

In the Chief Court, on 16th July, Mr. Guy Rutledge, Government Advocate filed a plaint on behalf of Lieutenant A. M. C. L. Finne, District Superintendent of Police, claiming Rs. 15,000 damages for alleged libel against Mr. C. Arnold, Editor and Proprietor, W. T. Lidbetter, Manager and part proprietor, and P. H. Ripley, printer, respectively, of the Burma Critic.

Mr. Channing Arnold, Editor and part proprietor of the Burma Critic, appeared again on 16th July, before the District Magistrate in answer to the charge of having defamed Mr. G. P. Andrew, Deputy Commissioner of Mergui, in two articles of his paper entitled "A Mockery of British Justice." Mr. Rutledge informed His Worship before the hearing started that he had Lieutenant Finne present and intended to call him. His Worship proposed to stop altogether the proceedings and examined Mr. Arnold who said he took absolutely sole responsibility for the articles in question. Asked if he wished to say anything else, the accused said he did not wish to make his own protest and wished to be committed to the Sessions before His Worship heard evidence. His Worship charged the accused with defamation under Section 500, I. P. C., and committed him to stand his trial at the next Criminal Sessions of the Chief Court sitting on 13th August. His Worship said the case was too serious to be adjudicated by the Police Court.

Hedjaz Pilgrims.

WITH regard to the Muhammadan pilgrim traffic between Karachi and Red Sea ports, which will shortly be starting, the Sind Gazette hears officially that, with a view to facilitate sailings, the Italian Government has considerably suggested that shipping companies should, through the local Consular agents, keep the British Ambassador at Rome informed in sufficient time of the names and other indications of identity of vessels carrying pilgrims to and from the Red Sea. It is evident from this that the representation of the British Government have not been ineffective, and that the Italian Government is sincerely desirous not to cause unnecessary annoyance to bona-fide pilgrims from India.

About 12 to 15 steamers will probably leave Karachi with pilgrims for Hedjaz between August and November next. The Port Trust, at the request of the Commissioner in Sindh, will place three berths at the disposal of pilgrim steamers so as to facilitate the embarkation of pilgrims.

The Viceregal System.

The first number of the Edinburgh Review under the editorship of Mr. Harold Cox contains an article wherein it is declared that "the Viceregal system in India has broken down." "Excessive centralisation," it says, "must be qualified. India cannot be ruled from Home by the Secretary of State. The only way of meeting the governmental and sentimental needs of India is to make one of the Royal Princes the representative of the Sovereign with a high official as Dewan."

Public Service Commission.

It is expected that the constitution and terms of reference of the Commission on Public services in India will be announced during the Indian Budget debate in Parliament on the 30th instant.

Decentralisation.

The Secretary of State has been pleased to accept with certain modifications the proposals of the Government of India based on the recommendations of the Royal Commission on decentralisation for the delegation to provincial governments or Local Governments having quasi-permanent provincial settlement, of enhanced powers in respect of the creation of permanent and temporary appointments, deputations, the revision of establishment and the grant of fees and reward of honoraria. The Governor-General in Council is now pleased to direct that effect shall be given to the decisions arrived at in respect of these matters and to prescribe with the object. The new powers include authority to create permanent provincial service appointments up to Rs. 800 monthly, revision of the permanent establishment up to a total of Rs. 50,000 annually, revision of rates of pay of minor appointments up to a total of Rs. 25,000 annually in any one branch. The Local Government has been empowered to create temporary appointments up to Rs. 800 a month for any specified period.

Gold Reserve Fund.

The Secretary of State has accepted the recommendations made by the Government of India that profits on coinage, which are at present devoted to the building up of the gold standard reserve, shall not be diverted to any other purpose until the sterling branch of that reserve has reached the sum of twenty-five millions.

New Universities.

A Press communiqué issued by the Education Department states:—"It has been finally decided that the educational scope of a University at Aligarh or Benares should be limited to the locality in which it may be established."

The Statesman's Special Correspondent says that it is understood that the decision announced to confine the scope of the proposed Aligarh and Benares Universities to the localities named will have the effect of converting the institutions concerned into residential Universities, since it will render it necessary for candidates for degrees to reside in the neighbourhood, much as is the case at Oxford and Cambridge.

Lord Carmichael.

His Excellency the Governor arrived at Dacca on the 15th July at 11:15 A.M. Before entering the Durbar Hall, several leading official and non-official gentlemen were introduced to His Excellency. At the Durbar Hall addresses were presented by the Municipality, District Board, Landholders Association, Moslem League, People's Association and Saraswat Samaj. His Excellency gave a joint reply to the addresses which was thoroughly sympathetic. His Excellency assured them that the Government would spend a substantial part at Dacca each year. Amongst other things His Excellency declared that the punitive police will be withdrawn from Munshigunj and Madaripur. Referring to the Dacca University scheme, His Excellency said that on completion of the committee's work he would consult public bodies. Referring to the proposal of a college for zemindars' sons, His Excellency said he had referred the matter to Mr. Nathan for report. "To the members of the Moslem League I would like to say that I am glad to hear that you understood what I meant when I replied to the address of your parent league in Calcutta. I know that you recognise that in the main and in all things which are most essential, your interests are the same as those of your fellow Indians whatever be their creed, and I believe that you trust me to do all I can to forward those interests. But I can assure you that I recognise that there are certain matters in which owing to your history you just as others have special needs. It is my duty to try and find out those special needs and, wherever possible, to treat them sympathetically. Fair treatment is all that your community asks for. Fair treatment is what every community has a right to expect. Already during my present tour, some of your co-religionists have pointed out to me that the incompleteness of the voters list has, they believe, handicapped them hitherto in the matter of representation on local bodies. I do not know whether this is so or not, but it is only fair that those who are entitled to a vote should get it and I have already given orders to have the matter looked into. If things are as has been alleged, all communities must be affected and the fact that in some places it may not be the Moslems who are the losers should make all grateful to you for having been the first to bring the anomaly to my notice."

Intemperance.

AN influential deputation comprising Sir Herbert Roberts, Lord Kinnaird, Sir William Wedderburn, several members of the House of Commons, Mr. Gokhale and other Indian representatives waited upon Lord Crewe to-day to advocate reforms in Indian excise with a view to arresting the spread of intemperance. The proceedings were private.

The Delhi Council.

THE Times of 17th July says it is stated that Mr. Montagu has been invited by Lord Hardinge to attend the first meeting of the Legislative Council at Delhi and that it has been agreed that he shall be absent from the autumn sitting of Parliament in order to fulfil the engagement.

Calcutta Moslems.

THE following resolutions were passed at a mass meeting of the Mussalmans of Calcutta held on the evening of the 14th instant:--

I. This meeting strongly urges upon the Indian Mussalmans to take practical steps for serving and helping their brethren in trouble who stand in need of their assistance. This meeting, therefore, in pursuance of this object, considers it necessary that both the Anjuman-i-Moin-ul-Islam and the Red Crescent Society of Calcutta should co-operate with a view to send a Medical Mission of Indian doctors and compounders to Tripoli.

II. It has been established by experience that the true and real representatives of the Mussalmans failed to secure election last time for the Council. The Moslem voters should, therefore, bear in mind that their vote should be exercised in favour of a candidate who is a true servant of Islam and fully in sympathy with the ideas of the Mussalmans and who would not sacrifice public opinion to personal policy.

III. Separate electorates for the Councils have been found in practice to be the most satisfactory method of securing adequate representation of various interests. In the opinion of this meeting the method should continue intact. But the number of Moslem representatives in the Provincial Council should be increased in proportion to their numerical strength and historical importance.

IV. Experience of many years has proved beyond doubt that the Moslem representation on District and Municipal Boards would be utterly inadequate and their interests remain unprotected so long as they are not given the right of separate representation on these bodies. This meeting, therefore, strongly and respectfully urges on the Government to grant the Mussalmans the right of separate representation on the Corporation of Calcutta and the Municipalities and District Boards of the Mofussil. No other arrangement can be at all satisfactory in the eyes of the Mussalmans.

TETE À TETE

WE HAVE elsewhere given the text of the reply of His Excellency the Governor of Bengal to the address of the Moslem League at Dacca. We note with the utmost satisfaction that Lord Carmichael has definitely recognised "certain matters in which owing to their history, the Moslems have special needs" and holds out a promise "to try to find out these special needs and treat them sympathetically." We only hope that in the attainment of this highly commendable object His Excellency will steer clear of the obstacles that some of the most aggressive vested interests in Calcutta or elsewhere will, in their own inimitable way, oppose to His Excellency's endeavour. We perfectly agree with the Governor of Bengal in thinking that "fair treatment is all the Moslem community wants, and has a right to expect." In fact, nothing would be more disastrous or humiliating to the Mussalmans of Bengal, if they ever fell into the demoralising habit of being fed by the spoon of official favouritism. But, perhaps, it is hardly necessary to remind a wide-awake ruler like His Excellency that "fair treatment" depends on an absolute equality of conditions. What a section of the Bengalee Press calls "unity," "identity of interests" and "brotherhood" is, in essence, the facile rhetoric of the monopolist who wants to hide the glaring inequality of racial conditions under democratic phraseology. The Mussalmans are determined to break through the bondage that the vested interests around them want to perpetuate. Lord Carmichael will earn Moslem gratitude if he helps, in some measure, in restoring to them the equality of opportunity which alone they need. We are sure His Excellency is aware that "fair treatment" does not always mean the maintenance of the Status quo.

THE Italians have perhaps thought it a psychological time to make another raid on the Dardanelles when there is a Cabinet crisis in Turkey. They attacked Kum Kaleh, a fort on the Asiatic extremity of the Strait, with six torpedo boats; but the raid has ended in disaster. Two boats have been sunk and all the others damaged. The Porte has ordered the closing of the Dardanelles. It is as yet difficult to say whether the latest move is a part of some deeper scheme that Italians might have elaborated with an eye to create another diplomatic situation, or only a stray episode in their naval hooliganism in the Aegean. The closing of the Strait is bound to lead to much excitement in the commercial circles, and it may be that Russia has once more schemed to bring it about for the development of her own designs. Turkey is, of course, within her unquestioned rights to defend herself, and this right of closing the passage in self-defence was clearly recognised by the Powers on the previous occasion, though Russia had growled audibly and tried to create mischief. If the Dardanelles is to be kept open to commerce, obviously the demand should be made in Rome. The talk about the Italians having been forced to give a guarantee has turned out to be baseless after all. Whatever may be the Italian objective in the present attack, they may be sure that no change of Ministry in Constantinople can diminish one jot the Ottoman national determination to defend the Empire. The news comes this morning that Tewfik Pasha, Ottoman Ambassador in London, has accepted the post of Grand Vizier. This appointment is full of significance, and it is possible the new Ministry may initiate an altogether new foreign policy. We will discuss this weighty question in detail when the new Cabinet has been formed. We may, however, rest assured that no Ministry under Tewfik Pasha will try to modify the present attitude of Turkey in regard to the war.

A THOROUGH enquiry into the whole question of Indian Public Service has been a long felt want, and the announcement that a commission is shortly to be appointed to consider and report on the existing defects and possible reforms in the working of the system comes none too soon.

The Public Service Commission.

Mr. Montagu is expected to make an announcement in regard to the personnel of the commission and its terms of reference on the occasion of his forthcoming statement on the Indian Budget in Parliament. Leaving aside, for the present, the questions that should come up for a thorough enquiry before the Commission, about which we shall have to say a good deal when the nature and scope of the inquiry has been definitely announced, we would like to say a word about its personnel. The commission will, we presume, include some Indians of capacity to make its labours really thorough and fruitful. We trust that a Mussalman gentleman of approved ability will be one of the Indian members of the Committee. The absence of a Mussalman member on the Decentralisation Commission was only too painfully apparent in some of the results of its inquiry. The question of the Public Service is, in every one of its aspects, much more vitally important, and it is necessary that the standpoint of the Moslem community should be represented on the committee that may be constituted to deal with it. There is no lack of competent Mussalmans to serve on any such committee with distinction. The Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali, or the Hon. Mr. Justice Hassan Imam—to name only two Moslems—would be an acquisition to the Commission. We strongly hope, the omission that was made in the case of the Decentralisation Commission will not be repeated this time. We are not at all surprised to see that our Hindu contemporaries, which have been suggesting all possible names with their usual fertility of imagination, have not considered a single Mussalman worthy of their recommendations. We hope, however, the Government knows better or—ought to know better.

AFTER seeing the first number of Al-Hilal, issued on the 13th July, Al-Hilal.

we can well understand the enormous labour and expense that Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, its talented Editor, must have gone through before the launching of this weekly journal. It strikes a new line in Urdu Journalism by including pictorial illustrations as a permanent feature in its columns. The adoption of the Turkish type, though not exactly an innovation, is a welcome departure from the obsolete methods which, in spite of their clumsiness and tedium, still retain a paralyzing hold on the Urdu Press of the country. The change may in the beginning cause some inconvenience to the readers, but it has got to come if Urdu Journalism is to become up-to-date as far as neat, accurate and expeditious printing goes. The first number of Al-Hilal has been excellently turned out, equally as regards printing, illustrations and general get up and does credit to its publishers. The contents of this number, in addition to some interesting columns devoted to the usual editorial débüt and the aims and aspirations underlying the venture, deal in the main with the personalities and events of the war in Tripoli in a very lucid and learned style. But, as announced by the Editor, the scope of the journal is to be much wider than that. It will, henceforth, regularly set apart a certain number of its columns for the consideration of almost every subject of deep and abiding interest to the Mussalmans. Literary and scientific discussions and Moslem educational affairs will have a permanent space assigned to them, besides the regular presentment of the state of affairs in Turkey, Persia, Morocco and the Islamic world in general. Literary criticism and correspondence will also be a permanent feature of the journal. Al-Hilal has entered on its career with great aims and a fine promise of their fulfilment. We trust it will speedily earn a distinct position among its contemporaries by its many attractive features and by the spirit of high endeavour that evidently inspires its Editor. We hope it has a long career of usefulness before it.

HINTS from time to time have always been thrown out by correspondents, even in such responsible English papers as the Times, of the grave dangers which would await the English Government from the possible victory of the Turks in Tripoli, as it would engender a bloated sense of their military prowess in the minds of the Moslem populations in the British Empire. We had fondly believed that the mind of the English people was not yet so wholly imbecile as to entertain such utterly irrational views, and that it was not worth our while to waste time in refuting this baseless theory. But when we find such a responsible organ of the Tories as the Saturday Review, which presumably represents the views of a considerable section of Conservative Englishmen, voicing such silly sentiments, we think it is high time that we warned the Government of India and the English public of the grave risks they would be running by lending a willing ear to such mischievous and sly hints. The Saturday Review says in one of its leading articles:—"The war is now more dangerous to the Powers in general than it was, and most unfortunately it coincides with grave French difficulties in Morocco. No Power which holds territory in Northern Africa or rules like ourselves over a large number of Muhammedan subjects could see with equanimity the victory of the Turks, or even any very notable successes on their side." This is plain enough. And we are inclined to believe that this even more than "the Italian seizure of the Aegean islands", to which the Review refers, is an attempt "to put pressure on the neutral Powers to induce them to force Turkey to peace." We would ask the British public to remember that the political consciousness of the Moslems all over India is sufficiently developed to enable them to grasp the significance of it all. Nothing is further from our mind than to suggest that the British Government actively countenances such perverse views. We would fain believe that it is yet time to remedy the evil created by these counsels, and trust the Government will not be carried away by sentiment, but will take a broad and statesmanlike view of the whole situation. Even if we were to suppose that the victory of the Turks would produce a feeling of mischievous elation among the Moslem subjects, we contend that the dangers that would be entailed by adopting the only remedy suggested by our far-seeing contemporaries are far more serious than any that it conceives of. It is a matter of common knowledge that all the stages of the war are being most closely followed in every home in Moslem India. The least suspicion that the British Government after its declaration of neutrality was siding with Italy, when there seemed to be no chance of an Italian triumph, would spread like wild-fire among the Moslem community, and may lead to most serious consequences. Once this happens no Muhammedan leader, however popular, could undertake to be responsible for the conduct of his community. Ignorance is always more inflammable than knowledge. This being so, we solemnly warn the Government that the Indian Mussalmans would strongly resent a breach of British neutrality in favour of Italy. There is another aspect of this war. The Italians have captured the Aegean Islands, and the Greeks are alleged to have welcomed them with acclamation. In other words, a subject race is ready to throw off the yoke of its rightful sovereign the moment a Christian Power comes by to protect it. And yet, not only are the Powers "able to see" this reprehensible action "with perfect equanimity," but the Saturday Review even seems to hint that it would be unchristian "to hand over the Greeks to the tender mercies of Turkey." We ask our contemporary if such models of political perversity are the safest to be held up to the admiration of the Moslem subjects of His Majesty the King Emperor. What are the alleged dangers arising from the elation of Indian Mussalmans at the success of their co-religionists abroad compared to those arising from suspicion of British hostility to Moslem States, in spite of declarations of neutrality, or the danger of Moslem treason against a Christian Government when responsible British journals openly admire Christian treason against a Moslem Government!

A CORRESPONDENT—himself a South African born Indian of the Moslem faith—has sent to us a letter on the question of a new development in the notoriously shabby treatment of Indians by the South African legislature. "It now appears," says the letter, "that the Johannesburg magistrate has laid it down as a rule, which will certainly have currency throughout the Union, that no Indian Mussalman marriage whatever is recognised in the Transvaal, even though it be a sole one, on the ground that it is contracted under a law permitting polygamy." While we recognise the utter futility of discussing the ethics of the case with an administration that is frankly organised to promote race ascendancy and produce wealth by driving native labour, we might still hope that they are not yet so absolutely deaf to all counsels of sanity as not to recognise the practical side of the question and the magnitude of the difficulties they are so wantonly creating for themselves. For it goes without saying that, if no wife of a Muhammedan Indian is to be permitted to enter the province, this precious piece of legislation would, as our correspondent says, "disturb the most intimate and sacred family ties by putting a premium on marital infidelity." And if these wives—legally constituted concubines—and their children—legally branded bastards—are to be excluded from the Transvaal holy of holies, we gravely warn the South African Lawgivers that man is a man for all their legislative vagaries, and that these Immigration laws will give a powerful impetus to crimes of the most outrageous sort, which no executive brutality or mob lynching can check. We confess we absolutely fail to see the political sagacity of the State's Legislature itself courting these outbreaks of the worst human passions. Besides, the frame of mind in which the Indian Moslems must constantly live under such anomalous laws is by no means conducive to peaceful subservience to State vagaries. For, to quote our correspondent, "this law means that the mothers of the Indian Moslems are branded as living unchaste lives. Their children are told that they have no legal or moral right upon their fathers, nor may they succeed to their estates should they die intestate." This virtual expulsion of Indian Moslems does not possess even the saving grace of being based upon a mistaken, but at least well-meaning, conception of morality. For, as our correspondent points out, polygamous marriages among the Cape Malays Moslem immigrants and even among the natives of South Africa have always been recognised by custom, and no objection has hitherto been raised to these customary usages by the high priests of the legislative order. This state of affairs is in the highest degree reprehensible, and we cannot condemn it in too strong a language. We would like to remind the South African Government that there is always a limit to what human flesh will bear and a line "unto which they may go but no further." We hope the Union States will still take time by the forelock and discontinue their present suicidal policy of blind persistence in creating for themselves a situation, scarcely much better than that of a desperado perched upon a barrel of well-dried gunpowder during a great thunderstorm.

RESOLUTIONS and proceedings of public bodies in India—they they congresses, leagues or conferences—are sometimes treated with scant attention by local Governments. As an instance, we would point out the manner in which the Moslem Education in Madras.

Bombay Government has almost consistently disregarded the views of the Mussalmans, particularly on their educational requirements. Sir George Clarke and his advisers cannot do better than compare their own attitude towards Moslem opinion with that recently shown by the Madras Government in its treatment of the question of Moslem Education in Southern India. The Muhammadan Educational Conference of the province had made certain strong representations, calling for reform in several matters connected with Moslem education. Though all the demands of the conference have not been granted, we are glad to find that a great step forward has been taken by the Government in recognising some of the most pressing needs of the community. The Director of Public Instruction has been asked to permit the teaching of the Koran out of the regular school hours to all Moslem students who may bring the written permission of their guardians. Other matters satisfactorily dealt with in the Madras Government Order on the basis of the recommendations of the Muhammadan conference are the enhancement of the teaching grant for Moslem schools, the appointment of special Sub-Assistant Inspectors for the supervision of these schools and the provision for an adequate representation of Moslem interests on the committees appointed from time to time for the revision of the Educational rules and the Grant-in-aid Code. The need for the special treatment of the Moslem educational questions in other directions has also been recognised. The Government has ordered the payment of half fees by Muhammadan boys in aided schools, the other half being borne by the State. Hindustani classes are to be opened in the schools containing any considerable number of Moslem boys; while the request that Hindustani be recognised as a distinct vernacular has also been favourably received. We are glad the Madras Government has freely and sympathetically considered Moslem views on education and we trust that it will not be long before we will have the satisfaction of noticing the growth of such attitude in certain other quarters which have so far been conspicuous only for stiff-neckedness.

SOME TIME back we had occasion to notice in our columns the self-denying sacrifices of the Aligarh students in order to be able to contribute to the Turkish Relief Fund. On that occasion we had noted their resolve to give up their weekly piece de resistance of pilau zurda, and firnee till the end of the Turko-Italian war. We are glad now to report that by this means the Aligarh boys have already sent no less than Rs. 6,500 to the Relief Fund. We also note with the greatest satisfaction the fresh resolve they have made "of contributing to the Relief Fund," as a correspondent informs us, "the sums of money which the successful candidates of the recent examinations would under normal circumstances have spent in giving dinners and parties to their friends and, also, the sums which will be saved by travelling in the Third Class instead of Intermediate or Second when they return to their homes for the long vacation." This truly Islamic example of mutual helpfulness does not require any comment from us. The latter sacrifice, particularly, is really heroic, and can only be properly appreciated by those who have personally experienced the tortures of Third Class railway travelling in India. Acts like these are a great moral asset of the community. There is every hope of better days for a people whose younger generation has learnt to exercise self-discipline and unselfish

WE ARE in receipt of a copy of the appeal which the authorities of the Muhammadan Orphanage at Calcutta are circulating broadcast for contributions towards the sum of a lakh of rupees, of which the Orphanage stands in dire need.

The Muhammadan Orphans.

After carefully scrutinising the records of the institution we are thoroughly convinced of the urgency of the call made upon the public on behalf of the poor Moslem orphans. We understand that this is the only institution of its kind in Bengal, Behar, Assam and Burma. It is a circumstance of the deepest regret, therefore, that, barring a few local grandees, the Moslem community is utterly indifferent to its needs and requirements. In particular, the attitude of the so-called cultured section of the local Muhammadans in this matter is reprehensible in the extreme. We cannot say that we are exactly lost in admiration for a culture which makes the local "children of new light" (or is it a new darkness?) fall away from that feeling of tender solicitude towards the orphans which has always been an outstanding trait of a true Moslem. Nor is the indifference of Mofussil public less deserving of blame. They fail to realise that only a microscopic minority of the orphans taken in are born in Calcutta, far the greater number of them being destitute children from the Mofussil who cannot find a living in the metropolis. The work done by the institution with the limited means, and the still more limited powers of organisation (for the educated Moslems keep studiously aloof) at its command, deserves the greatest encouragement. Provision is made for about 300 boys. And recently a girls' section has been opened which has now 15 girls as permanent inmates. But this provision can hardly be called adequate in view of the fact that this solitary institution has to serve the needs of the four big provinces. Additional provision of board and lodging for at least 200 more boys and 30 girls is an immediate and crying need. This is one of the items pointed out in the appeal and requires at least Rs. 25,000 for its fulfilment. But improvements are sadly needed in various other departments too. The school—a Middle English one—is anything but adequately financed and is capable of almost unlimited improvement. There are various classes for teaching printing, mechanical engineering, type-writing, motor-driving, tailoring, carpentry, etc., etc. But most of the implements are old and the machinery dilapidated. It badly requires a thorough overhauling. There is no compound or recreation ground attached to the institution. And those who know what life in the heart of Calcutta is, will painfully realise the urgency of acquiring land for this purpose. At least Rs. 35,000 must be forthcoming for this object. The girls' section has no house of its own. It is also in contemplation to open a public school for girls in connection with the girls' section of the Orphanage. At least Rs. 25,000 must, however, be collected before anything can be done. Altogether at the very lowest computation a lakh of rupees is most urgently wanted for the immediate needs of the institution. But besides this the whole financial arrangement of the orphanage requires to be placed on a sounder basis. For instance, last year there was a deficit of no less than Rs. 3,000 in the budget, in spite of the fact that there had been a windfall of Rs. 15,000 from very fluctuating and unreliable sources of income. As the institution now stands there is an urgent need of an addition of Rs. 18,000 to its permanent annual income. The Government grant has also remained stationary. We would strongly recommend its immediate enhancement. We earnestly appeal to the public—Moslem and non-Moslem—(and several Hindu benefactors are already contributing munificently)—to bestir itself and make ample amends for its past neglect of this institution. It does not redound very much to our credit that foreign missionaries should find an easy field of recruitment among our neglected orphans. It is high time that the public woke up to a sense of its responsibility to these helpless orphans.

The Comrade.

The Situation in Turkey.

I.

THE resignation of the Turkish Cabinet brings to a head the internal crisis in the affairs of the Empire which includes in it some elements of unmistakable gravity. The retirement of Mahmoud Shevket Pasha was in itself a shock which only a strong Ministry could have survived even in normal conditions. But certain recent developments have rendered the internal situation far from normal. They manifestly led to a serious cleavage of opinion amongst the Ministers, and the Cabinet has fallen as a result of divided counsels. Those who know something of his high sense of duty and strength of character must naturally conclude that only some fundamental difference of policy or principle could have driven the War Minister to the extreme step of resigning office. The gossip of the certain Viennese circles, about the insurrectionary movement in Albania being irresistible, about depleted war-chest and about the methods of the Committee of Union and Progress—which the Times correspondent weekly retails with a strange access of prophetic emotion, must be dismissed as so much frantic twaddle. These factors, even if they were as formidable as they are declared to be, could only have the effect of inducing a Minister of the stamp of Mahmoud Shevket to hold on to his post of danger with all the greater courage and tenacity of purpose. The ministerial crisis is, in fact, due to far deeper causes, which the untoward events like the Monastir mutiny and Albanian disturbances have undoubtedly helped to accentuate. In order to disengage the real factors of the situation from the tangle of prejudice, facile prophecies and newspaper sensationalism, it would be necessary to subject it to a detailed analysis. That the situation is grave and complex will be readily conceded by those who have closely watched the course of affairs in the Ottoman Empire. The war in Tripoli, though not in itself a formidable military issue, may at any moment, in view of the recent Italian moves in the Aegean and the diplomatic manoeuvring that is still going on behind the scenes, become a purely diplomatic tug-of-war and present Turkey with the coup de main of a European conference. The disturbances in Albania, the unrest in Macedonia, and the recent mutiny of a number of Albanian troops at Monastir, especially when international forces are silently moving to new and menacing combinations, may indirectly lead to grave results. Face to face with this situation a Turkish Government was naturally expected to be strong, united and resolutely engaged in the task of pulling the Empire safely out of internal shocks and the dangers that surround it. The resignation of the Cabinet at this critical stage of the Ottoman affairs cannot, therefore, be regarded without some anxiety and concern.

Without going into details, we may briefly refer to some of the causes that make the situation so grave and have incidentally led to the Ministerial crisis. It has been suggested in some quarters that the drain of the war has been heavier than is generally supposed, that the Government has been resorting to strange financial shifts and that Neil Bey, late Finance Minister, had to resign because he was not successful in his loan transactions with the Paris Bourse. There can be no doubt that the expenditure of the War Office has considerably mounted up owing to the necessity of keeping several Army Corps on a footing of war. But surely, such expenditure—at the highest a mere fraction of the ordinary military budget—cannot disorganise the finances of the Empire. The trade of the country has been, in spite of the Italian blockade, in a flourishing condition. The exports have been steadily expanding and the receipts of the last few months show a substantial increase over the budget estimate. But the most significant fact in this connection is the determined patriotism of the nation to cheerfully bear any extra burden that may be thrown upon it on account of the war. The measure sanctioning the imposition of a war tax, which was recently introduced in the Chamber of Deputies, has met with warm approval throughout the country. Voluntary contributions to the national war-chest have been flowing from every class of the people. It is, therefore, a perfect fatuity to talk of financial embarrassments paralysing the Ottoman Empire and leading to its disintegration. The war with Italy may drag on for years without seriously impairing the financial stability of Turkey; and we may safely assume, as a necessary corollary of the fact, that the hope for peace based on the hypothesis of the financial breakdown of Turkey is a pure moonshine. If the issue in Tripoli were merely a question of the comparative staying powers of the belligerents, the Turkish statesmen might well leave its solution to time. But it is exactly the fast-growing exhaustion of Italy and her desperate efforts to secure a favourable settlement through European intervention that is converting a military issue into a battle-ground for international diplomacy. And this constitutes a danger which the Turkish Government could not ignore and which has perhaps in some measure effected its stability.

To understand how great this danger really is, we must take into account the forces that Italy has set in motion and the manner in which she has been playing her diplomatic cards. The dream of Empire that drove her into brigandage was soon shattered on the coasts of Tripoli. The spectre of Adowa rose, gaunt and grim, before the vision of her statesmen who, flushed with insolence and the heady wine of jingo nationalism, had set out on an ambitious scheme of conquest quite beyond the strength and the resources of their country. The blunder was to be retrieved somehow if Signor Giolitti was not to go howling into the depths, amidst the derisive laughter of the world. The best chance of Italy lay in stirring up European rivalries and inciting the dangerous elements in the Balkans to revolutionary activity. Her tentative approaches to Russia met with a warm reception, and the Muscovite hailed the opportunity to work for a free passage through the Dardanelles. The naval demonstration at the Strait was tacitly designed, with the approval of Russia, to test the strength of British and French feeling on the subject. The heated discussions to which the Italian coup gave rise in the European Press crystallised into one definite view of the situation—that the hostilities should be ended in the interest of the European peace. This much was a clear gain for Italy, for she knew well enough that any concerted action on the part of the Powers would be distinctly to her advantage. Whatever form the joint action might take, it would be nothing worse than an insistence on a compromise, and a compromise would mean for Turkey a definite renunciation of at least a substantial part of her rights over Tripoli. Immediately after, Italy began occupying a number of the small Turkish islands in the Aegean. Originally her intention was probably to hold them up for the final bargain, but evidently her intentions have been undergoing a change. It appears now that she would like to retain an island for a permanent naval base, while she has incited the Greek population of the Aegean to denounce Turkish rule and demand complete autonomy. An organisation of the islanders has already come into existence with a full programme for the creation of an autonomous "Aegean State." The nature and scope of this agitation for autonomy will be apparent from the following account furnished by the Athens correspondent of the Manchester Guardian—

The Congress of Delegates from the Aegean Islands, which assembled at Patmos last week, elected a committee which will proceed to Rome for the purpose of expressing their gratitude to Italy for the liberation of the Islands and invoking her aid in regard to the question of their political future. The resolutions passed by the Congress are published here to-day. They announce the firm determination of the islanders never to fall back under the Turkish yoke, and after expressing a wish for union with Greece, proclaim the complete autonomy of the islands based on verbal and written declarations by General Ameglio and other Italian officers as well as on the autonomous privileges acquired in past centuries and on the doctrine that no Christian people, once rescued, shall be allowed to relapse under Turkish domination. The Confederation of autonomous islands receives the name "The Aegean State." A decision in regard to the mode of election of the head of the State and of the legislative body is postponed. The flag of the Confederation will be blue with a white cross, and its emblem the sun god Apollo. The proclamation is dated 4th June and is signed by the representatives of 12 islands.

But even more remarkable than the inspired activities of the islanders is the rumour that credits British diplomacy with the desire to settle the future of the islands in consultation with the Powers. The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph in his despatch dated 21st June throws some light on the attitude of the European Chancelleries in regard to this question. He says:—

A telegram from Rome to the Echo de Paris states that England has opened negotiations with the Powers regarding the Aegean Islands now occupied by Italy. It is said that these negotiations were undertaken by Downing Street at the request of the Greek Premier, M. Venizelos. It now seems certain, according to this despatch, that the twelve islands now held by the Italians will never again revert to Turkey, although the Sultan may be allowed to maintain a nominal sovereignty over them. It is proposed, on the other hand, that these islands, together with Crete and Samos, shall form an autonomous confederation. While the Triple Entente and Triple Alliance Powers are discussing the matter Italy will refrain from any further action in the Aegean Sea, and it is believed that the negotiation now proceeding may be the prelude to the calling of a general conference for the purpose of discussing the termination of the war.

We need not say anything about the wisdom or justice of the suggested arrangements or the calculated Phariseism of the "doctrine that no Christian people, once rescued, shall be allowed to relapse under Turkish domination." We would simply point them out as an aspect of the danger that the Italian failure in Tripoli has helped to create by reacting on European diplomacy. The probable consequences of these developments could not have failed to affect the position of the Turkish Government.

The grave questions arising out of the Italian occupation of the Aegean Islands are, however, only a side-issue of the general problem that Italy has endeavoured to create for Turkey and the European Powers. Thanks to the ambitions and rivalries of some of the great Powers, the Balkans have always been the storm-centre of Europe. Bulgaria, Servia and Montenegro are so many puppets whose strings are pulled from Vienna or St. Petersburg. The European provinces of the Turkish Empire may not possess an ideal Government, but their chronic state of unrest is directly and obviously due to the ambitions of which they are the open objectives. The Serbs and the Bulgars of Macedonia and the Christians of Albania revolt to order and are revolutionary by design. No methods of government have yet been known to history that could succeed in a hot bed of anarchy promoted by foreign money and foreign intrigue. Let the Tsar of all the Russias withhold his approving nod from "the Tsar of the Bulgarians" and let Austria cease scheming for her "road to Salonica" but for once, and the Turk will know how to bring the brigands on his frontiers to their senses and keep order in his European possessions. But the shallow sentimentalists enthuse about "liberty" and gush over the tales of murders and bomb outrages perpetrated by the pet savages of Europe, as if they were heroic sacrifices at the altar of freedom. Kaiser Wilhelm threatened to deprive Alsace-Lorraine of their self-governing institutions in consequence of a petty difference about a railway official. Europe threatens to deprive Turkey of her rightful sovereignty because she deals drastically with a race of murderers and brigands. The moral indignation of pacifists of the armchair and the drawing-room is roused to white-heat just where the powers of retaliation are the weakest. Turkey had enough problems on hand before the race of Machiavellis started on the war-path. Since then the welter of intrigue in the Balkans has been eddying round Italian hopes and fears. Italian agents with large supplies of money, arms and ammunition have been scouring Albania or organising insurrectionary movements from across the frontiers of Montenegro, Serbia and Bulgaria. The Macedonian Revolutionary Committee has been financed into fresh activity. Some of the Albanian notables have been bought over to stir people to revolt. In Bulgaria, public meetings have been organised by the Italian agents in sympathy with Macedonian revolutionaries. The whole Press of Europe has been flooded from Sofia and Belgrade with tales of Turkish atrocities and of internal anarchy and chaos. The Kings of Bulgaria, Montenegro and Serbia have been manoeuvred through Russian help to move portentously about and pay dramatic visits to Vienna and Berlin. What these visits may portend is not easy to conjecture. According to a Vienna correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, the following explanation meets with general credence:—

There is a secret understanding between Russia, Germany, Austria (and Italy as well) concerning the Balkans. In the first place all the three Emperors and the King of Italy will strive honestly to keep up the present status quo in the Balkans, combined with the preponderating economic and political influence of Russia in Bulgaria, of Austria in Serbia and Kosovo Vilayet (including the Novi Bazar Sandjak), and of the co-operating influence of Austria and Italy in Albania. In the second place, or I may say in the second article of the secret convention, the eventuality is foreseen that in the long run the preservation of the status quo may prove impossible. In such a case all the contracting Powers have bound themselves in advance to an absolute territorial "désintéressement," neither Russia, nor Austria, nor Italy would get a foot of Balkan territory for herself. But Russia's protégé, Bulgaria, would get Macedonia, Serbia and Montenegro would divide between them the Sandjak and the Kosovo Vilayet, Albania would get her autonomy under the joint protectorate of Austria and Italy. Turkey in Europe would probably be reduced to Thracia and Constantinople, with free passage for the Russian men-of-war through the Dardanelles, which would practically mean the placing of the European remnant of Turkey under the protectorate of Russia.

The secret understanding may or may not exist; but the correspondent has made an admirable forecast of what may actually happen in certain eventualities, even if there existed no understanding on paper. The knowledge of these speculations, that have never ceased to be vocal in the clash of rival interests, must be an ever-present calculation in the efforts of Turkish statesmen. The situation created by Italy has turned these speculations into a problem full of considerable menace to the security of European Turkey. The danger of new developments in the Balkans and the necessity of preparing to meet that danger must have seriously engaged the consideration of the Turkish Government. We cannot speak with certainty about the attitude of the individual members of the late Cabinet, but it is not difficult to imagine the existence of serious differences of opinions among them in regard to the methods of solving so vast a problem.

The Albanian question, not very acute in itself, has nevertheless been bulking largely in the European press. And it is because Europe will not be satisfied unless every petty incident in Albania is brought under a microscope, that matters remain where they are. The ordinary troubles that every civilised government has to face while trying to impose orderly administration over half-nomadic and turbulent tribes have, in the case of Albania, become the pet exercises of every constitutional faddist in Europe. The problem has lost its true proportions in the infinity of the minds brought to its measure. The faddist, the visionary, the "liberty" fanatic, the aggressive democrat at large, the imperialist of Austria, of Russia, of Italy, the financier, the trade-agent, the peddler in fancy-goods, have killed the Albanians and peopled the land with the monsters of their frenzied imaginations. The Turk who could rule over more turbulent races with perfect composure of mind, seems to be getting nervous after all when he hears from every side shouts of disaster. The thing was always to him very simple,—it is thinking that has made it complex. One can hardly repress laughter when the good generous souls in Europe begin to apply the standards of Western democracy to the conditions of pastoral tribes. The Committee of Union and Progress is held up to indignation and scorn because it recommends the treatment of the Albanian question on lines which even the British did not disdain to adopt in India. The tribes are unruly and given to rioting and plunder. They must consequently be disarmed. A much more civilised and peaceful people were disarmed because the Empire-builders of England could not devise any other method of ensuring peace and order. Yet the Young Turks are accused of Chauvinism because they, too, have tried to enforce this elementary measure of good government. To talk of autonomy for a people who are still in a semi-civilised state, who are absolutely state-blind, whose political sense has not yet developed beyond the conception of brute force and whose ideas of freedom consist of confused mental pictures of the opportunities they have had to rob and kill and may have again, is surely the height of fatuity. It is said that the Committee of Union and Progress has forfeited the sympathies of Europe. That may be true, but, is it not because, in spite of its mistakes, it is the only power in the Ottoman Empire that means to keep the Empire free from future aggressions? As to what it has already achieved, the testimony of impartial observers is worth quoting. Sir Edwin Pears, after discussing the many sins of omission and commission that are laid at the door of the Committee of Union and Progress, says in a recent article in the Contemporary Review:—

They have kept the machine of government running. Destroy it and the country would be in anarchy. They have made several notable improvements, and have announced their intention to make more. They have allowed the country to develop itself. They have greatly strengthened the army, and have brought order into the financial administration. With a full recognition of all the faults of the Committee, the people of the country generally are agreed, so far as I can learn, that its condition has improved since the revolution. If the opinion of all the Europeans and Americans in the country could be taken, I believe that while disappointment would be generally expressed at the failure of the hopes aroused by the makers of the revolution, its voice would be unanimous, or nearly so, in declaring that the condition of the country is better than it was four years ago.

However, it appears that the outcry in the European press about the Albanian affairs has affected the nerves of the Turkish Government. The recent disturbances owe their origin, not so much to genuine grievances as, to the supposed sense of wrong that the Albanians have been encouraged to cherish about the withdrawal of the privileges they enjoyed under the Hamidian régime. The discontent has been kept alive by mischievous political wirepullers and by disappointed ex-deputies who have been freely receiving Italian money for their mean and cowardly treason to their Sovereign and Empire. The recent outbreak amongst Albanian troops is the work of these poltroons who have been preaching against the Committee for their own selfish ends and have sowed seeds of disaffection in the army. These serious developments seem to have given rise to some apprehensions amongst the Ministers who perhaps differed violently about the policy that the Government should pursue for the pacification of Albania. The retirement of Mahmoud Shekret Pasha, whose attitude towards this question as well as to the question of peace is well known, was a strong indication of the fact that the Cabinet as a whole was becoming a prey to timorous counsels. We cannot as yet give any opinion as to what will be the ultimate policy of the new Cabinet until we know more about its composition and personnel. The question of peace may have become a matter of concern to some Turkish statesmen in view of the situation in Albania and the nature of the Monastir mutiny. We think, however, Turkish character is still strong and virile enough to tide over difficulties of this kind. Any undue desire for peace in terror of the internal situation will severely damage the Ottoman prestige which the gallant defenders of Tripoli have strengthened with their valour and their blood. The dangers that some of the Ottoman politicians may be seeking to avoid by concluding peace will become actual perils of fearful dimensions by the surrender of Ottoman rights. Peace at any price has never yet been bought in history. Those alone can enjoy quiet who know how to defend themselves. What should be the attitude of the new Government towards the many questions of internal peace and development and foreign relations will be discussed in our next.

The Moslem University.

WHATEVER hopes the promoters of the Moslem University project may have entertained of converting Aligarh into an instrument for the development and organisation of the right type of communal education, they have been for the time being shattered by the fiat of the Education Department. The official communiqué issued a few days ago on the subject runs as follows:—"It has been finally decided that the educational scope of a University at Aligarh or Benares should be limited to the locality in which it may be established." We cannot presume to be aware of the reasons that have led to this amazing "decision," but we are absolutely certain that it will cause a deep and widespread disappointment throughout the country. Both the Hindus and the Mussalmans, who alone can realise the crippling effect of this arbitrary limitation, may be pardoned if they fail to accept its "finality." We cannot say with absolute certainty what the Hindu opinion may be in the matter, though the Hindu Press has, without exception, regarded the power of affiliation as necessary for the success of the University. But the Moslem view of the question has been, from the very outset, clear and unmistakable. For reasons which it would be unnecessary to repeat, they have always looked upon their scheme for a university as a practical and most important step towards the solution of their educational problem. They have made costly experiments in the field of education and they have, after enormous sacrifices and labour, evolved Aligarh which fixes for them the type of the institution they need. It is, however, a physical impossibility that Aligarh should suffice for the requirements of the whole community. The only way out of the difficulty would seem to be that new institutions should be reared wherever necessary with Aligarh as their model, and they should be linked to a common centre in order to maintain a high standard of efficiency and uniformity of type. The cant about the educational facilities provided by the State institutions, in which many "friends of India" indulge, is in this respect a sheer irrelevance. If it is inevitable that mankind should differentiate on racial, religious and political lines, if social groups are at all various in aim, in outlook, in modes of life, the needs of individual communities will continue to be different and as variously treated. We are at a loss, therefore, to understand why the Government of India have lightly ignored this vitally important aspect of the whole question of communal Universities. The decision they have announced through their Education Department robs the schemes at a stroke of much of their value and interest.

Perhaps the Government of India have been influenced far less by considerations of educational efficiency than by that occult sense which shapes the "reasons of State." It is incredible to think that our rulers, who have done so much for the spread of knowledge throughout the land, could ever feel the Russian horror of allowing education to thrive in a free atmosphere. To us it is unthinkable. The novelty of the experiment, it may be, has unnerved some of our educational "experts," and they have thought it "safe" to limit its scope and bring it well within the ken of the bureaucracy. Nothing could be more regrettable than that the new experiment in Indian education, which has its only justification in being a deliberate and studied departure from the existing ideals and methods, should be short of all its "novelty" and reduced to the common type as a concession to bureaucratic timidity and lack of imagination. The Moslem and the Hindu University Schemes are, it is sometimes strangely forgotten, a protest against existing educational systems, and their only value consists in their being something organically different from the common type. Yet the Schemes have been criticised because they differ in their essential features from the State Universities. We are afraid the Government, too, is beginning to show signs of the intellectual immobility that afflicts the newspaper critics of the Schemes. Is the experiment, stipped of its bold initiative, freedom and "novelty," at all worth trying?

We have so often dealt with the question of affiliation being a part of the Moslem University Scheme, that we do not propose to embark on a fresh discussion. The broad fact remains that the Mussalmans want to evolve a certain type of education suited to their need and genius, and they want an All India organisation for the purpose. The proposed Moslem University was primarily designed to furnish that organisation. But if the University is to be deprived of the power of guiding Moslem education throughout India by a well planned system of affiliation, the main object underlying the Moslem University movement falls to the ground. It may be and, in fact, has been contended that such vast powers may, by an injudicious exercise, lead to inefficiency and lower the standard of education. None would deplore such a calamity more than the Mussalmans themselves, and they would welcome any reasonable limitation of the right of affiliation. Let the conditions for affiliation be as strict as official ingenuity can make them. As long as there would be a chance for several Aligarhs, so to speak, springing up in different centres of Moslem activity in the country, the Mussalmans would have no occasion to complain. But by an absolute denial of the right to the University, the Government has virtually barred the way to the growth of Aligarhs. This is bound to cause a bitter and genuine disappointment to the Mussalmans, for it knocks the bottom out of the educational programme which they have been maturing with steadfast hope and devotion for upwards of 30 years.

Now, the most practical question is: What should be the attitude of the Mussalmans to the maimed and dwarfed scheme for a Moslem University which the Education Department is dangling before their eyes? Responsible Moslem opinion on the question of the University is divided into three groups. There are those—and they form a microscopic minority—who will have nothing to do with a University that is not under the independent and absolute control of the Mussalmans. However laudable their ideals may be, they are obviously impracticable under the present conditions. There are, again, others, equally few in number, who would have a University under any circumstances and with as many limitations as the Government might think fit to impose. But the bulk of the Mussalmans, whose voice is decisive in the counsels of the community, are willing to give all reasonable powers of supervision to the Government, but regard the freedom of affiliation to the University as the most vital part of the whole undertaking. It is they whose opinion will finally determine the issue. The Government communiqué has thrown their ideas into the melting-pot; and we are afraid they may come to decide to have no University at all under such conditions. We, on our part, frankly confess that the University Scheme will lose much of its utility by the recent decision of the Government. Still, however, we are equally of opinion that it is better to have a University with the hope of eventually emancipating it from the shackles that the Education Department has imposed, than not to have any University at all. But, at the same time, the Government should be requested to reconsider the decision recently announced. We cannot be expected to believe that the decision is "final" and if only the Mussalmans show the necessary energy and determination to bring home their point of view to the Government, the question may yet be settled in accordance with their wishes. For, their viewpoint is eminently reasonable and no Government interested in the spread and development of Moslem education can afford to ignore it lightly.

The McCormick Case.

Mr. Hamlyn, continuing to read: "In the neighbourhood within a mile or two of the parents' village (this, as will be subsequently seen, is a somewhat important point in the case) lived a planter, a certain Captain McCormick. In stating the case we desire to avoid all personalities as far as possible, but the personality of McCormick is a most material factor in the matter. We have been at pains to get the opinions of several disinterested persons who have met him and who are in no way connected with the case under review, and they corroborate the information given us, that McCormick is just that type of man that any country—especially an Oriental one—is better without. An overbearing, violent-tempered man, intemperate in his habits, a loose liver, a boastful bully who has assaulted even Europeans, has thrashed the natives, has gone about armed with a revolver (this is a detail of some importance, as will be seen later,) and, in short, has terrorised the neighbourhood. As we say, we are most averse to any personalities; but it is essential to a right understanding of the case that our readers should know what manner of man McCormick is, as it is through that knowledge that much which would otherwise be obscure, will become plain." That is true: this first paragraph is true?

Yes.

Do you agree, Mr. Andrew, that McCormick is that type of man that any country, especially an Oriental one, is better without? Do you agree or do you disagree with this statement?

I disagree with it.

Do you agree that McCormick "is an overbearing violent-tempered man, intemperate in his habits, a loose liver, a boastful bully, who has assaulted even Europeans, has thrashed the natives, has gone about armed with a revolver and, in short, has terrorised the neighbourhood." Is the whole of that false?

I think this is a very unkind description of the man. I do not agree that it is true.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, you know something about his temperament and disposition. You have lived in his house?

I have visited him in his house.

And he has visited you in your house? He has lived in your house and you have lived in his house?

I lived in his house since August. I will not say that it was before the case. Up to the time of the case I had only seen McCormick once in Mergui.

Mr. Hamlyn: Victoria Point is, I believe, one hundred miles from Mergui?

Two hundred miles.

Mr. Hamlyn: McCormick was a concession hunter originally?

Witness: What do you mean by concession hunter?

Mr. Hamlyn: The term is surely plain enough; a man after land or mining rights.

Witness: He had no mining rights, but he did rubber planting.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was after rubber lands?

Yes.

And when you went to Mergui he had some rubber land, about 2,000 acres?

Not when I went to Mergui. He has now got about 2,000 acres.

When you went to Mergui, how much did he have?

About 600 acres, not his own. He is an agent for a Syndicate. I have seen his agreements in the course of business. What his share is I don't know.

And he is part proprietor? And how many grants have you given him?

I daresay three. I would not say for certain.

He has applied for a great many.

Yes.

And you told us that when you went to Mergui he had about 600 acres and now he has about 2,000.

Now it is about 2,000.

Witness: Where?

Will you swear it is not over 3,500? I have not seen the estate, Mr. Andrew. The land which he has been granted, what is it?

I think it is somewhere near 2,000 acres.

Not more?

No.

He gave a lot of trouble about the land?

How do you mean?

Did he not fence in land to which he was not entitled?

Yes.

Then he did give trouble?

Witness: In this way that he came too close to the road and telegraph lines.

Mr. Hamlyn: He fenced in a Government road?

Witness: He came too close to the road, I understand. You are supposed to leave 50 feet.

And you had trouble about it?

I think he was told to remove the fence and he did so. I don't think I passed a single order in that dispute. I simply remember the fact that there was trouble.

Did you get no intimation at all that Government land had had been enclosed by him?

I don't remember. (After a little hesitation). I remember the bare fact that there was some trouble with the telegraph people and himself. As far as I know, the Sub-divisional Officer dealt with that.

Did you not receive complaints from the Land Records Department about him?

I don't remember.

Mr. Buchanan, the Sub-Divisional Officer, was constantly complaining about Mr. McCormick's acts?

Yes. . . . No, I don't know whether it was that exactly. He used to write demi-official letters.

And Mr. Buchanan would not recommend him for any more land?

Mr. Buchanan, I think, wrote a letter to a third party that he would not recommend him. I do not think he ever wrote to me that he would not recommend McCormick for any more land.

On one occasion McCormick fenced in 40 acres of Government land?

I could not tell you. I don't remember anything beyond the fact that there was some trouble over the telegraph lines.

Did you not receive a communication from Mr. Buchanan on the 20th June 1911, complaining of these acts of McCormick's?

The witness: Have you got a copy?

Counsel: No, I have not.

Well, I don't remember.

You will acknowledge that McCormick gave some trouble?

Yes, but no trouble that could not be got over with a little tact.

Captain McCormick had a large number of fire arms in his house?

Yes.

He used invariably to go about with a revolver in his pocket?

I know nothing about that.

Persia.

News of the Week.

Britain's Policy in Persia.

During the debate on the Foreign Office vote in the House of Commons on the 10th July, Earl Ronaldshay said that though Sir Edward Grey had been at pains to show the sincerity of our good will to the other "Entente Powers," the latter had failed to reciprocate. France, he said, had insisted on her rights in Muscat, thus obstructing the suppression of gun running in the Gulf of Persia; and Russia had not shown her readiness to appreciate our position in Persia. She had shown that she was in no way as desirous of seeing an independent Persia as we were, though since the return of M. Sazonoff to the Russian Foreign Office, the Russian policy in Persia had seemed considerably modified. He invited Sir Edward Grey to define his Persian policy, as recently it did not seem to have been thought out and pre-determined. He pointed out that though the Government of India in December had submitted to Lord Crewe proposals for dealing with the situation, the Bluebook showed no answer from Sir Edward Grey. Earl Ronaldshay congratulated Sir Edward on the monetary advance in Persia but asked:—"Was his policy for protecting British interests in Persia confined to financing the Persian Government?" He urged that Sir Edward Grey should refuse to facilitate the prolongation of the Baghdad Railway to the Gulf. Earl Ronaldshay suggested that the Koweit Section be neither the Russian nor the Indian Gauge but the Standard Gauge.

Mr. Ponsonby regarded the Trans-Persian Railway with a deal of misgiving. He said it would deprive Persia of the last shred of independence.

Mr. Dillon charged Sir Edward Grey with weakly consenting to Russia's policy of obstructing and paralyzing the Persian Government with a view to its destruction.

Sir Edward Grey, replying to Earl Ronaldshay, said that Earl Ronaldshay's complaint that the Anglo-Russian Agreement was being worked mainly in Russia's interests was a counterpart to the criticism which the Russian Government had to meet in Russia, where it was argued that Russia had surrendered much and received extremely little. In judging the Anglo-Russian Agreement one must consider not whether it had led to a perfect state of things but whether it had resulted in a better or worse state than would have existed without it. Before the Agreement Russian influence in North Persia was supreme. But for the Agreement Russia might have practically annexed North Persia and pursued from there her policy of railways, etc., towards the Indian frontier. From that point of view, the Agreement had been a self-denying ordinance. Take the Afghan part of the Agreement. Sir Edward said that that part was not to come into force until the Amir had signed it, but Russia had waived that condition and loyally observed it. Unsatisfactory as the state of things in Persia was to-day, it was nothing compared to the suspicions and complications which would have arisen without the Anglo-Russian Agreement. Sir Edward reiterated that his policy was to avoid any intervention likely to be permanent. With regard to the question of a large loan, he said: "With things as they are, it is difficult to see how a large loan can be made on attractive terms." With regard to the Government of India's suggestions, Sir Edward thought the great difficulty of dealing with the tribes, as the Government of India suggested, was that it would add to the complications if dealt with except through the Persian Government. A blockade of the coast was another of the Government of India's suggestions. That was possible; but unless such a blockade were undertaken in support of measures taken internally it would not be likely to be hopeful. Dealing with the Trans-Persian Railway, Sir Edward said, that strategically it was not undesirable to have no railways in Persia; but the railways were bound to come if Persia was to become a developed and ordered State. They might be later than people supposed under the present conditions; but the moment an overland railway from Europe to Asia were possible, it would be constructed. To say we would always oppose it, would be neither a wise nor a practicable policy; but we were absolutely uncommitted. He had told the "Societe d'Etudes" that while we should under proper conditions favour the principle of railways we reserved freedom of action with regard to actual construction, management, alignment, board of representation, British interests, and rates and especially the break of gauge. Also he had said that there must first come an agreement with Russia with regard to branch lines, the control of lines in the British sphere, and an equality of treatments. Directly the "Societe d'Etudes" reported the practicability of the scheme, the House would be informed. The question was one of such great importance that though its leading aspects had been most carefully considered the authorities in India and the House should hear the conditions on which the Government was prepared to support any definite scheme before the country was committed thereto. With regard to the internationalisation of the Mohammedan Line he has always contemplated that the Southern portion would be conceded to a British Company. He would examine closely any internationalisation to be applied to the Southern portion. Germany was aware that negotiations were in progress between Turkey and ourselves with regard to the railway below Baghdad. Directly German interests were affected we were ready to discuss the matter with Germany. "The great object we wish to secure," said Sir Edward, "is an Anglo-Turkish understanding, making it clear that we are not going to infringe Turkey's rights in the Gulf region, and that our special position in the Gulf will not be interfered with." Sir Edward Grey referred to the situation in the Mediterranean. He pointed out the necessity of having a sufficient margin of strength in Home waters without relying on Great Britain's foreign policy alone to protect the United Kingdom. The Japanese Alliance had been a great factor in the interests of peace and had prevented the disturbances in China from resulting in international complications. Sir Edward said it was not necessary for us to keep a force in the Mediterranean, able to hold our own at any moment against all other powers. Though there was no prospect of any quarrel in the Mediterranean, yet if we abandoned it altogether there might be a tendency for us to slip out of account and the diplomatic situation might become strained. We ought to keep a sufficient naval force in the Mediterranean available for use at any moment to enable us to be counted as one of the Mediterranean naval Powers. In view of the coming debate on the subject, however, he would not say any more. Our foreign policy remained unchanged. The starting point of any new development of our foreign policy in Europe was the maintenance of our friendship with France and Russia. He welcomed the meeting of the Tsar and the Kaiser recently.

Our relations with Germany were excellent. They were perfectly frank with each other on all questions of mutual interest. He believed that when questions came up for discussion, for instance, questions of our respective interests in Africa, or in the Baghdad Railway, both Germany and Great Britain would be convinced that their mutual interests could easily be reconciled. Sir Edward Grey emphasised that Great Britain's naval superiority to any possible combination in the Home waters must be maintained whatever their foreign policy was. But when we got further afield it was a different matter. For instance the relation of the Japanese Alliance to naval strategy in the Far East was most intimate. It was worth while considering that with all the instability in China and the difficult questions that arose there had been hitherto no international complications. The good working of the Alliance in recent years had been a great factor in this respect. The Alliance had not brought Great Britain or Japan worse relations with any other Power; on the contrary, the relations between Japan and Russia were exceedingly good. He believed that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance was more than ever in the mutual interests of the two countries. They had worked it with great restraint and perfect loyalty to each other. It had been a great beneficent factor in keeping the peace in the Far East.

Continuing the debate in the House of Commons, Mr. Bonar Law criticised Sir Edward Grey's attitude towards the position in the Mediterranean where our naval force should be strong enough to overcome any probable combination.

Sir Edward Grey's speech in the House of Commons on the 10th instant, has produced an entirely favourable impression in Berlin. It is pointed out in official circles that the assurance that there is not a single question between the two countries and that their relations are excellent coincides with the German view which fully recognises that the friendship of Great Britain with France and Russia is the starting point of British policy. It is stated, further, that there is no disposition in Germany to object to Basra as the terminus for the railway.

Reuter wires from Teheran:—Persia has agreed to increase the Persian Cossack force at Tabriz to 700 with two additional Russian officers, upon the understanding that the Cossacks remain subordinate to the Ministry of War. The notification of Persia's assent expresses the hope that Russia will now withdraw her occupying force from Tabriz.

Reuter wires from Teheran:—Sardar Jeng has been appointed Governor of Behbahan with full authority over the Bakhtiari country.

The Imperial Bank of Persia has advanced him £7,000 to enable him to maintain order.

The Burma Chamber of Commerce in reply to a letter from the Karachi Chamber, on the subject of the early construction of the Indo-European Trans-Persian Railway, are in full sympathy with the views of the Karachi Chamber and support the project.

The military correspondent of the Times in a long article on 14th July emphasises the military objections to the Trans-Persian Railway. He roundly declares that the Indian Army owing to the absence of power of expansion is unfit to bear the strain such a railway would impose upon it. Unfortunately, says the writer, Lord Kitchener's reforms have been postponed or abandoned owing to Lord Hardinge's craze that the Anglo-Russian Convention and the millennium are convertible terms. Moreover in view of an extension of navies, it will be impossible to reinforce the Indian Army from Home at any definite time. The construction of the line would mean the end of our political independence. The correspondent calls attention to the Russian achievement in transporting troops to Manchuria and expresses the opinion that Great Britain will ultimately be obliged to follow Japan's example. The correspondent scouts the idea that the railway is inevitable. He is convinced that the sea will always remain the trade route to India. He urges the impartial investigation of the question by competent Britishers instead of international financiers.

The Shiah of Gaya at a special meeting of their Anjuman Imamia have passed a resolution of sorrow and indignation at the news of the bombardment of the mosque and the holy shrine at Meshed by the Russian soldiery. They submit that so far as the Moslems of India are concerned even the occupation of Teheran by the Russians would not have been so shocking to them as the destruction of their Imam's holy sepulchre. The Anjuman is anxiously waiting the result of Sir Edward Grey's assurance that His Majesty's Government have taken notice of the sacrilege and demands that the damaged mosque should be repaired and the looted treasured and sacred relics restored.

In the House of Lords on the 15th July Lord Curzon raised the subject of the Trans-Persian Railway. He declared that the Railway would alter the whole future position of our rule in India, and would necessitate the revision of India's defence. The Government had gone so far in supporting the scheme that it would be difficult for them to retreat. His Lordship emphasised that the strategical consequences might involve the sending of troops to Persia, the advancing of the Indian frontier and other complications. He demanded the publication of the views of the military experts.

Lord Morley replied on behalf of the Government. He said that after Sir Edward Grey's recent statement, it was difficult to understand Lord Curzon's attitude. The Government had in no way encouraged the "Société d'Etudes" beyond the negative encouragement of refusing to prohibit operations so far as could be done. Nothing had been said or done which could prevent us with diplomatic decency and consistency from withstanding the report of the "Société d'Etudes." Lord Morley in general repeated Sir Edward Grey's arguments and assurances especially with reference to the effect of the railways in promoting the tranquility of commerce. He concluded: "In retaining the option or asking for railway concessions, when the time comes, we have no design to exclude foreign enterprise. To do so would be disadvantageous to Persia, with no great advantage to ourselves."

Lord Morley continued: "We have no desire to make the railways at present ourselves, but we wish to guard against the possibility of suddenly finding that the Persians have placed concessions damaging to our political interest and strategically menacing to our frontier. We desire, therefore, the option of making such railways ourselves, but the Government hope that Lord Curzon will remember the strictly conditional situation in which the Government stand with respect to these proposals."

Lord Lamington said the scheme was full of danger and presented no advantages.

Lord Inchcape said he hoped no Indian money would be squandered upon the project. It was all wanted for railway development at home.

Lord Crewe said he was entirely in accord with Lord Inchcape. He had no desire to spend a single rupee of Indian money on such a project.

Lord Curzon, he said, had blamed the Government under a wrong impression with regard to their attitude.

The matter then dropped.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, June 10.

The discomfiture of the Salar-ed-Dowleh for the moment appears to be complete. The advantage gained by the Government forces at Shurijeh was wisely followed up. This is the first recorded instance during the Royalist rebellions that the enemy has, after being defeated, been kept on the run. A series of minor engagements, concluding with a final action at Bisutum, twenty miles to the east of Kermanshah, has resulted in the dispersal of the rebel forces and the re-occupation of the Kurdistan capital. The Salar-ed-Dowleh, who has never once led his troops into action, has retired to a safe distance in the direction of the Turkish frontier and is now reported to be at Maidasht on the Baghdad road. This move was carried out almost immediately after the fight at Shurijeh. No one seems to have any notion of what the plans of the Prince are, but he is said to be in constant touch with Russian agents. The Firman Firma has now arrived in Kermanshah and is acting in the capacity of Governor of Kurdistan and Luristan, though his hold on the latter province can be but slight. He is receiving the submission of the Kurdish chiefs, many of whom have taken part in the recent rebellion.

The Government troops are now resting, but are expected to move out of Kermanshah again in the course of a few days with the object of securing the person of the rebel Prince. It is, however, too much to hope that they will be able to do more than control the direction of his flight.

The new Cabinet has now been formed and has settled down to work. Its constitution can, however, give little cause for satisfaction. It practically amounts to a redistribution of portfolios with the introduction of one new member. The Kawam-es-Sultaneh, who did really good work in the last Cabinet as Minister of the Interior, is not included in the present Ministry. He is too energetic; moreover, one somehow suspects that his dismissal is the price paid for the return of the Amir Muffakham. It will be remembered that the feud between the Kawam-es-Sultaneh and the Amir Muffakham originated in the discovery and subsequent arrest of the Amir's brother-in-law at a royalist secret meeting. The Amir at once demanded the release of his relative, and, on this being refused, the Kawam was seized and conveyed to the Bakhtiari chief's house, where he suffered considerable indignity. The forces of law and order, such as they are in this country, were set to work, and the Kawam was released. The Amir, fearing the consequences of his action, then hurriedly left the capital and retired to his lands at Kamarij near to Burujird. Whilst there he entered into negotiation with the Salar-ed-Dowleh and became a rebel and in this capacity he occupied Sultanabad. This was about a month ago, when the Salar's chances of ever reaching Teheran were rapidly diminishing. The Amir evidently decided that the game was up; for he was easily prevailed upon by his brother chiefs to return to the capital, where all would be forgiven. It is said that he stipulated for the dismissal of the Kawam-es-Sultaneh from the Ministry of the Interior, but whether this condition has anything to do with the fact that the latter is no longer in the Cabinet it is quite impossible to say definitely.

St. Petersburg, June 17.

A Tabriz telegram announces that a second German joint-stock company with a capital of 38,000 tomans in 1,000 toman shares, will shortly be formed. Of the 38 shares issued 23 has been taken up by Persians.

The Nation in its current number joins in the protest against the Indo Russian railway. Criticising the policy followed by the Foreign Office, the journal says:—

"In secret, unobserved by the country and unchecked by information in Parliament, the reversal of a great traditional policy is allowed to proceed. The question is whether it is to be allowed to continue until protest will be too late. This is not a matter of details.

Teheran, June 21.

The centre of unrest in the South has shifted from Kerman to Yazd, which is now threatened by Arab tribes.

Teheran, June 24.

The Cabinet and the Diplomatic Corps were present to-day at an inspection of the gendarmerie under their Swedish officers. The gendarmerie school was only opened two months ago and great progress has been made in this short time.

M. Pokhitonoff, the Russian Consul-General, has been transferred to Ezorum. His successor, M. Lytken, has arrived.

Mr. Acland (Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs) in reply to Mr. W. Mitchell-Thomson (U., North Down), said he had received no recent reports indicating any improvement in the state of the roads of Southern Persia, but a detachment of the newly organised gendarmerie under Swedish officers had now reached Shiraz and it might be hoped that the good effect of their presence would be felt immediately.

The Trans-Persian Railway Scheme.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—Many of the arguments used by the opponents of the proposed Trans-Persian Railway are, I am told, held to resemble, though I think very superficially, those which I myself used about ten years ago in a series of articles published in the Times and subsequently in my "Middle Eastern Question," when Russia was believed to be aiming at the establishment of a naval base on the Persian Gulf connected with her trans-Caspian possessions by a railway running south through Khorassan and Seistan in close proximity to the Afghan border. I shall therefore be glad if you will allow me to state briefly the reasons which induce me to-day to regard the arguments which I then used as for the most part inapplicable to the present case, and to hope that the very different scheme now under discussion will receive careful and not unfriendly consideration in this country.

I need hardly point out the essential difference between a railway of a purely strategical character, such as Russia was then believed to contemplate, which would have been a distinct menace to Afghanistan, and would have placed the Russians in command of the immense potential resources of Seistan at a time when Russia's policy throughout Asia bore a distinctly adventurous, if not aggressive, complexion, and a railway designed to provide, primarily at least, for pacific purposes, a rapid and easy means of communication between Europe and India and constructed ex hypothesi by the friendly co-operation of the two European Powers that have the greatest interests in Asia. Moreover, the whole situation in Asia has changed so enormously in the course of the last ten years that considerations which then carried great weight have ceased to do so in anything like the same measure. It would, no doubt, be unwise to assume that our political relations with Russia must necessarily and for all time remain as cordial as they now happily are, but I am convinced that the momentous trend of events in Asia which led Russia to approach, six years ago, in an entirely new spirit the problem of an Anglo-Russian agreement in regard to Asiatic questions has exercised an enduring influence upon Russian policy, and that, unless we ourselves go out of our way to revive the old antagonism, no responsible Russian statesman is likely ever again to encourage dreams of a Russian conquest of India.

If, on the other hand, it be contended that we have nothing to gain by lessening the isolation of the Indian peninsula, which is in itself a valuable guarantee of security, the question arises whether, with the growth of railway communications all over the world and not least in Asia itself during the last decade, it is possible for this country to maintain indefinitely an attitude of mere negation in regard to railway communication between India and Europe. In India itself things have changed very much of recent years, and if as we proceed to give our Indian fellow subjects a large voice in our councils, we wish to bring home to them also a larger appreciation of their responsibilities as an integral part of the Empire is it desirable to perpetuate the idea that India can go on living in a water-tight compartment shut off from the rest of the world? If once it be admitted, as I believe it must, that railway communication between India and Europe cannot be indefinitely postponed, is it not wiser to take the question in hand when we have an opportunity of exercising by friendly means a decisive influence upon the solution of the problem?

It is urged in some quarters that, in view of the opposition which British co-operation with the Baghdad Railway has encountered in this country, it would be absolutely illogical for us to co-operate in the Trans-Persian Railway. This objection appears to me more specious than real. There are many fundamental differences between the Baghdad and the Trans-Persian schemes upon which space does not allow me to dwell, but the chief weakness of the above argument is that neither in 1903 nor at any subsequent period did the British Government, as far as I know, decline in principle co-operation with Germany in regard to the Baghdad Railway, but solely because the terms formulated by Germany for British co-operation were deemed, and I think rightly deemed, inadequate. The German Government has always professed to regard the Baghdad Railway as a business proposition, and any one who cares to look up the statements made by British Ministers in Parliament can satisfy himself that they also dealt with it merely as a business proposition when they declined to encourage British capital to take part in it. Indeed, if there were any substantial justification for talking of British opposition, in a wider sense, to the Baghdad Railway, I might well use the undeniable fact that Germany has shown herself clearly able to carry out the scheme without our co-operation as an argument to show that British opposition to the Trans-Persian scheme would not necessarily avail to defeat its execution, at any rate up to a point at which it would already produce some of the consequences which its critics affect to dread. Great Britain, for instance, would not be in a position to prevent the construction of a railway from Russia to the southern limits of the Russian sphere in Persia, and, both from a commercial and political point of view, we could hardly contemplate with satisfaction the purposes for which that railway, controlled in a hostile spirit, might be used.

It appears to me to be quite premature to discuss at present the details of the proposed scheme. The data for such a discussion are not yet available. All the estimates hitherto put forward as to the cost of construction and the commercial possibilities of the line are purely speculative, and there are various alternative traces, as to the relative merits of which much has yet to be learnt. It is to provide the necessary data that the Société d'Etudes has been formed, and I see no reason why we should not welcome its formation without committing ourselves definitely to any ultimate course of action.

Eventually one of the most difficult corners to turn will be the equitable distribution of powers for the management and control of an "international" line. But this point can only arise at a much later stage. For the present I will only express the hope that our unfortunate experiences in China will at least teach us to avoid the pitfalls into which we have floundered there.

There is one other aspect of the question upon which I should like to add a word. It is quite unintelligible to me that the Trans-Persian Railway should meet with so much uncompromising opposition from those who constitute themselves the special champions of Persian interests. What Persia suffers from most at the present time is the weakness, however caused, of the central Government, which has aggravated the anarchical conditions that have been always apt to prevail in the outlying, and especially in the southern and eastern provinces of the kingdom. The construction of a great line of railway from the north-west to the extreme south-east of Persia must clearly serve both to strengthen the central authority and to pacify, by its civilizing influence, the turbulent regions through which it will pass. From the British point of view the restoration of orderly conditions in southern and south-eastern Persia is a very vital question, for it can alone permanently remove the danger of our being forced into measures of active intervention which are on all grounds to be deprecated. This is, indeed, perhaps the one consideration that might justify us in assuming any financial obligations in connexion with a Trans-Persian Railway, i.e., as an insurance against the far more costly alternative of military expeditions. The construction of the Trans-Persian Railway would also, it must be remembered, bring a large amount of foreign capital into Persia, and thereby help to restore economic prosperity to the country. It would not, I believe, in any way preclude, but rather promote, railway enterprise in other parts of Persia; for I assume that one of the conditions of any British support to be ultimately given to the Trans-Persian Railway would be that the construction of the railway from the head of the Persian Gulf northwards through western Persia, for which the British Government have already applied for a concession at Teheran, should meet with no obstruction.

All I now plead for is that public opinion in this country should not be induced to pre-judge the case against the proposed Trans-Persian Railway. The case in favour of it has, I admit, yet to be made out, but I hold very strongly that no prima facie case against it can yet be established. In conclusion, whilst I can understand that some soldiers, approaching the question from a purely professional point of view, should be vehemently opposed to any railway connecting India with the outside world, it seems to me passing strange that the military arguments against this scheme should be suddenly endorsed with such unexpected fervour by extreme Radicals who only a few years ago, when the relations between Great Britain and Russia were none too friendly, denounced and derided the expression of any apprehension as to the consequences of the Russian advance in Central Asia as an altogether foolish and timorous form of Russophobia unworthy of Englishmen.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

VALENTINE CHIROL

The "Times."

SIR EDWARD GREY had very little to tell the House of Commons yesterday about the projected Trans-Persian line, but his statement of policy was clear. In principle, he considers, we neither can, nor should, oppose; in practice, our acceptance must depend on terms. The project is no longer in the clouds. The Société d'Etudes, which is to arrange for the final surveys, has been formed from representatives of three nationalities—Great Britain, Russia and France; and it was stated in our columns more than a fortnight ago that, after some preliminary difficulties, an arrangement is now accepted by all sides which will provide for absolute equality of control between the British, Russian and French promoters of the scheme. The president of the Société is M. Raimbre, a French diplomatist of standing; and there are two vice-presidents, Sir William Garstin and M. Horvickoff, the ex-President of the Russian Duma. Mr. Ackland has already told us that the representation upon the Société of the three Powers interested has been accepted as satisfactory by the British Government; and the announcement that the Société has been formally constituted may be expected any day. It will proceed to work at once, and it cannot be many months before the preliminary investigations and negotiations entrusted to it are complete. Till that time comes the project will remain, of course, too vague for adequate criticism except in very general terms, but it is passing rapidly from the academic stage into one of practical and pressing interest, and British opinion of all sorts, political, military and commercial, should follow its development from now onwards with a careful eye to all its probable effects.

Eighteen months ago, when this scheme was first outlined, we stated that, on general grounds, a project for linking India and Europe by a trans-Persian line would have our support. We maintain that view to-day. Railways are perhaps the most effective of all the civilizing influences which can be brought to bear on backward portions of the globe, and they have a power quite unparalleled by ships of bringing different civilizations and distant peoples into touch with each other and the world. The history of India has hitherto been an isolated history, broken only by periodical waves of invasion across the inhospitable passes of the north, or, in later days, by the thin but constant stream of soldiers, administrators, and merchants from the "dark waters" of the sea. Deeply as we, like other conquerors, have set our mark on India, we have as yet done little more than they to break down the isolation which, from the beginnings of her history and for all her wealth of races and types, has given India a special character and life of her own. As one of the world's progressive Powers, we cannot but support in principle the weaving of such links between peoples and lands as great trunk railways forge. Still more strongly are we bound, as the Power responsible for India, to wish a project well which must rouse in her awakening mind a clearer consciousness of her position amongst other Powers and peoples—a position whose only security within calculable time must be allegiance to the British Raj. Persia, moreover, has always been the country through which India, so far as she was conscious of other lands at all, looked forth on the outer world. The integrity of Persia is of great importance to our hold on India, and it presents at this moment a problem of a peculiarly difficult kind. How are we to further the pacification and development of the provinces which immediately concern ourselves without undermining the authority, such as it is, of the existing Government, prejudicing its chances in the north as well as the south, and making it for ever impossible to re-establish and consolidate its control? A railway is, we believe, the only practical means in view. We can point from recent experience on the North-West Frontier to the strangely potent influence exerted by the double line of rails upon warlike and intractable tribes. Is it not reasonable to hope, in Southern Persia, for similar results? The arguments from strategy, whether it be the strategy of peace or the strategy of war, are not, of course, all on one side. Our Military Correspondent called attention to this aspect of the question in the letter which we recently published, and we may say at once that the public will insist upon the fullest consultation of military opinion, in India as well as here, before committing itself to support of the line. Sir Edward Grey's answer in the House of Commons yesterday to a question on this point was far too vague to be satisfactory, and some more ample and definite statement will certainly be called for before long. But, pending fuller information, we are strongly inclined to agree with the broad argument advanced by Sir Valentine Chirol in our columns to-day that, since railway communication between Europe and India cannot be indefinitely postponed, we shall do well to take the question in hand at once, when we can solve it, by friendly agreement, in the manner best suited to our military needs.

The general principles which we have stated dictate, in our opinion, a friendly, though not uncritical, attitude towards the scheme: but general principles will not build the line and a final decision upon its merits must obviously depend upon many questions which the Société d'Etudes has yet to elucidate. We shall want much fuller information than is yet available upon its probable cost, its prospects in the matter of freight, and the return which it may reasonably be expected to give on the total capital charge. The prospects of local freight in Southern Persia will certainly be small for many years to come. Is it reasonable to hope that they will ever materially improve? If they will not, is there an adequate promise of through freight sufficiently light in bulk to enable the railway to compete with the sea route to Europe and to the head of the Gulf? And even if such freight may be expected, will it be possible, given the probable cost of construction, to carry it at rates which the sea route will not put out of court? These, and many similar questions, will have to be answered before any final opinion is formed upon the scheme. One thing may, in our opinion, be regarded as certain—that the line will not prove feasible without Government guarantees, and that in the southern sections a guarantee will be asked from the Indian Government. The materials for a decision on this point do not at present exist; but, when they have been furnished by the Société d'Etudes, we shall hope to see them examined by the Indian Government with an eye to future profit and influence as well as to immediate expense. The prospect may prove shadowy or substantial—we do not anticipate. We only hope that when the moment comes for sifting them, they will be judged with greater foresight than was shown by British Governments in the case of the Suez Canal; fortune may not again enable us to redeem the folly of narrow views. One other consideration, of great importance, remains. It is manifest that the Trans-Persian must not stand in the way of other railway projects in Persia which have better immediate prospects of success. Chief of these from the British point of view is, of course, the projected line from Khor Musa, at the head of the Gulf, to Khoramabad. That railway has long been a subject of interest to British Governments, and the reasons for pressing it have only increased with time. Our claim to the concession is unassailable, since the Russian concession for a line between Baghdad and Khanikin brings into force the Receipt, issued by the Shah Nasr-ed-Din and confirmed by his successors under which, when other Powers are permitted to build railways in the north of Persia, Great Britain is conceded a similar right in the south. Lord Morley stated in the House of Lords last year that the British Government regarded this Receipt as "a very important deliverance," and it must obviously play a leading part in any agreement regarding Persian railways between Russia and ourselves. It is impossible, moreover, to discuss the general question of railway concessions in Persia without raising some other frontier issues in which the Indian Government is closely concerned; and we consider that a general agreement on the whole subject will be an essential preliminary to any special arrangement regarding an international Trans-Persian line.

The "Manchester Guardian."

We make no apology for returning to the Indian railway project, for the defence of India is our greatest interest abroad, and the official policy of silence is, we believe, dangerous to the country. Yesterday the silence was broken, for Sir Valentine Chirol, the foreign editor of the Times, who is sometimes in touch with the Foreign Office, made in the columns of the Times the first defence that we have seen of it. Able as the writer is, it is an apology rather than a defence. The whole case against the Foreign Office for neglecting to take responsible military advice on the policy of the line and for evading the rights of Parliament is left untouched. He pleads for an open mind. He agrees that no case has yet been made out for the line and is content to urge some reasons for thinking that neither has there been made out a case against the line. Two reasons which he gives are that we are no longer at enmity with Russia, but friends, and that it is not good for India to think that she can go on living in a watertight compartment for ever shut off from the rest of the world. But England is not yet in railway communication with the rest of the world, and why this watertightness should be a fault in India and a boast in England we cannot imagine. Every argument that Sir Valentine Chirol uses for the railway would be an argument for filling up the North Sea between Grimsby and Hamburg. Our friendship with Russia is even less an argument for destroying India's natural frontiers than our friendship with France would be for the Channel Tunnel. For you may make a tunnel and still have the sea frontier, but a railway destroys the barriers of a desert. The "open mind" for which Sir Valentine Chirol pleads is a mind divested of a proper preference for a strong to a weak frontier. Nor when an international company is studying possible routes for a railway with the encouragement of the British Government can we pretend that the question is an open one. Agree to discuss this railway as though no more were involved than the choice between this gauge or that, between an inland route and a seacoast route, and the lines of defence against the project are hopelessly turned. Other arguments of Sir Valentine Chirol need closer examination. He makes much of the good that the railway would do to Persia, especially in helping the central government to put down disorders. That is neither the motive of the line nor would it be the result, or Russia would not be interested in it. When a military Power like Turkey builds railways, we know that she is adding to her strength; but to a weak country like Persia a railway constructed by three Powers who have yet to prove their friendship might easily destroy such liberties as she had left. Afghanistan was tough and formidable by comparison with Persia, yet her late Ameer described the railway from Quetta to New Chaman—only a little way over the frontier—as a dagger thrust in his vitals. Let the Powers propose to drive a railway from Russia to India across Afghanistan if they want to hear what Persia would say about this new scheme for her regeneration if only she dared. But even if we believed in this new zeal of Russia for Persian liberties, it would be no reason for extending the railway beyond the Persian frontier across the British protectorate of Baluchistan to India; and one might concede everything that is said about the advantages of the railway to Persia without having a single objection removed to through communication with India. But the truth is that if the object were to benefit Persia, or even to develop her trade, this idea of a through railway to India across Persia is the very last that would have occurred to anyone. Sir Valentine Chirol, in order to develop his idea, that a through railway would do good to Persia, has to argue that its construction would not prevent the construction of branch lines from the head of the Gulf. Is it not clear that if it was Persia's development that we were thinking of these lines would be the first to be built? That they should be mentioned as an afterthought shows that the whole idea of benefiting Persia is an afterthought and has no relevancy to the project of through communication with India. So much for the argument that in opposing this railway to India we are inconsistent with our policy of trying to help Persia. Sir Valentine Chirol is no more successful in another charge of inconsistency that he brings against Liberals who oppose the railway. "It seems to me passing strange," he writes, "that the military arguments should be suddenly endorsed with such unexpected fervour by extreme Radicals who only a few years ago, when the relations between Great Britain and Russia were none too friendly, denounced and derided the expression of any apprehension as to the consequences of the Russian advance in Central Asia as an altogether foolish and timorous form of Russophobia unworthy of Englishmen." The policy of good Liberals has been consistent throughout, and their zeal for the sound principles of Indian defence is not an affair of weeks but of nearly half a century. Their aim has been to avoid a continuous frontier with Russia in Asia. With that object the Marquis of Hartington, as he then was, evacuated Kandahar, and two generations of Liberals have persistently combated the so-called forward policy on the Indian frontier. A generation ago Liberals had to resist the policy of rushing forward to meet Russia across Afghanistan and to confine Indian defence within its natural frontiers. Now it is one more proposed to meet Russia by crossing the deserts of Baluchistan. The Liberal policy is still the same—to resist these forward rushes whether they are made in an unreasoning war-panic or secretly arranged at a board table.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Paris, June 17.

A telegram from Fez of yesterday's date states that General Dalbiez was attacked on Friday night at the camp of Sidi Abd-es-Salam by a body of disaffected Beni M'Tir tribesmen, supported by men of the Ait Youssi and Tregrushen tribes. General Dalbiez made a brilliant sortie, driving back the enemy, who left several dead on the field. The French had four killed and 6 wounded.

An official message from Fez dated yesterday states that General Gouraud left camp on Saturday morning, crossed to the opposite bank of the Irawen, and dispersed strong parties of the Hayana tribe after sharp skirmishes in which the French lost two killed and thirteen wounded, including two officers.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, June 21.

The column under General Gouraud, which is operating between Fez and Taza, has been engaged in desultory fighting on the banks of the Inaouen. The rebel tribesmen are careful to avoid a pitched battle, and content themselves with harrassing the French troops. A small body of men who were taking horses down to water about half a mile from the camp were attacked by rebel cavalry. Major Rivière came up with reinforcements, and after an engagement lasting three hours succeeded in beating back the enemy with severe loss. The French losses were 12 killed, including one lieutenant and two French non-commissioned officers, and ten wounded. General Gouraud has ordered the villages and crops to be burned as the only way of bringing the refractory tribesmen to their senses. The prevalent sirocco is an additional source of discomfort to the French Troops.

The column under General Dalbiez, which is conducting a campaign similar to that of General Gouraud to the south of Mekinez, encamped at El Hedjeb.

Paris, June 23.

The column under General Gouraud, which is operating between Fez and Taza, forced an engagement with a party of malcontent tribesmen near Azib Mulai Ismail on 19th June. The fighting lasted about three hours and resulted in the complete route of the enemy. The French losses were 3 killed and 11 wounded. Two days later General Gouraud sent a strong detachment of the Foreign Legion under Major Geralt to prevent the defeated tribesmen from rallying in the vicinity of the camp. Major Geralt's troops, with the assistance of artillery, inflicted heavy losses on the enemy and drove them back in disorder.

The column commanded by General Dalbiez, which has been engaged in clearing the country south of Fez, came into contact with a number of rebel Beni M'Tirs on 19th and 20th June, and drove them back with heavy loss. The French losses were 5 killed, including Captain Desfrères, commanding the 7th Company of the 1st Tirailleurs, and 16 wounded.

Tangier, June 24.

It is doubtful if the real importance of the question of the internationalization of Tangier is fully realized in England. Tangier is destined to become a great port. Its climate, its geographical position, the facilities with which the port can be constructed, and its excellent situation as a winter resort, guarantee its future. It seems clear, also, that the coaling trade at Gibraltar will migrate here as soon as facilities are arranged, and already many great lines of steamers, including the principal lines between America and the Mediterranean, intend to make it a port of call. Not only on commercial grounds must the neutrality of Tangier be guaranteed, but also because of its political and strategic position at the very doors of the Mediterranean. For Great Britain the neutrality of Tangier is a vital question, and it is her bounden duty to see that this neutrality is securely and permanently guaranteed.

The local Press publishes to-day the demands of the Spanish Government on the question of Tangier and its international sphere. These demands, obviously, are extremely exaggerated. There is no doubt that it is the British Government programme of internationalization which will eventually be adopted, for England desires neutrality in the largest sense of the word, seeks no advantages for herself, and must allow none to others. Such interests as she has in Tangier she is prepared to share and share alike with other nations, and, not unnaturally, expects the same terms of equity and courtesy from others.

As to the limits of the international zones there is only one practical solution—namely the limits of the Fahs Tribeland region, slightly in excess of the 15 kilometres proposed. The Fahs Territory is bounded by excellent natural limits, and its adoption would avoid the splitting up of one tribe into the two zones—always a most undesirable thing and one which, wherever possible, has been avoided in all negotiations in Morocco in the past.

Paris, June 24.

The rebel tribesmen, on the night of 21st June, made an attack on General Dalbiez's column, which was encamped at Ifran Sidi Abd-es-Salam, to the south of Fez. The French troops made a sortie from the camp and routed the enemy with heavy loss. The French losses were 4 killed and 6 wounded.

The latest despatches from General Gouraud announce that he advanced on 22nd June against a harka intrenched in the hills on the right bank of the River Innawen. After a stubborn engagement the French troops succeeded in dislodging and routing the rebels. The French losses were 2 killed and 13 wounded, including two officers.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Reuter's Agency is informed that the main points in the prolonged negotiations between France and Spain with regard to Morocco may be regarded as settled. This does not, however, necessarily mean that a complete arrangement is imminent. From the first many technical and legal difficulties have been encountered, and details of this nature, though of secondary importance, are still outstanding. A week or two ago the outlook was less promising, but thanks to the invaluable assistance given by the British Ambassador in Madrid, obstacles have been overcome, and there is no anxiety as to the eventual issue. The British, French and Spanish negotiations at Madrid are now occupied with the momentous matter of the internationalization of Tangier. It is a question beset with difficulty, but the doubt is entertained in diplomatic quarters of an eventual settlement. The negotiations have in view the creation of a municipal constitution in which representatives of the various Powers on the one side and of the community of Tangier on the other will be represented. Legal stumbling-blocks are many. On the whole considerable progress is to be recorded and a satisfactory, if not an immediate, solution of the whole question is to be hoped for.

News of the Week.

The Italians have captured the position of Sidi Ali, situated midway between Tripoli and the Tunisian frontier. The enemy on arrival of reinforcement, thereupon, delivered a fierce assault but were repulsed with enormous losses, the fighting lasting six hours.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—Nazim Pasha, former Governor of Baghdad, has declined the portfolio of War except on sweeping conditions, including the abolition of martial law and the dissolution of the Chamber. The Government has rejected these conditions. The Cabinet is tottering and its resignation is possible.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—The Chamber has passed a vote of confidence in the Government by 194 to 4. Speeches were made by the Grand Vizier and the Foreign Minister dwelling on the relations of Turkey with the Powers, which, it was stated with emphasis, were generally good. The speeches expressed especial gratification at the renewal of Great Britain's warm friendship, which was a guarantee for the future.

It is reported that Mahmud Mukhtar has accepted the portfolio of War.

Reuter wires from Rome:—It is officially stated that the Italians lost sixteen killed and seventy-three wounded at the battle of Sidi Ali recently. It is further stated that several hundred bodies of Turks were found after the fight.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—The situation here is regarded as serious owing to the strong opposition against the Union Committee which is struggling against heavy odds. The most serious element in the opposition is a sort of military league which is rapidly growing. It has already become impossible to enforce a Bill penalising officers for taking part in politics in many provincial centres.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on July 18.—The Cabinet has resigned.—The resignation of the Cabinet is largely due to the insistence of Mahmud Mukhtar, who was recently reported to have accepted the portfolio of War, on the withdrawal of the troops from Albania and the adoption of a policy of trust in the Albanians as a condition of his assumption of the portfolio of War.

Tewfik Pasha, Turkish Ambassador in London, has been appointed Grand Vizier, and it is expected that Nazim Pasha will be Minister for War.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—The Cabinet has decided to despatch a peace mission to Albania, composed of three prominent Albanian Senators. Four battalions of Turkish troops were surrounded near Diakovo last week. Three hundred men were disarmed and carried off by the Albanians. The remainder succeeded in retreating to Diakovo.

The situation in Turkey is complex and confused. It is hoped that Tewfik Pasha will form a neutral Cabinet excluding the members of the Committee of Union and Progress with a view to conciliating Albania and Macedonia but then no attempt will be made to repress the Committees the organisation of which is still very strong.

Athens, June 19.

The unexpected revival of trouble in the Mirdite district is apparently due to the circumstance that large supplies of arms have lately found their way into the hands of the mountaineers. At the beginning of this year the Mirdites had about 2,000 rifles, but it is stated that they are now in possession of 10,000. Some mystery still exists with regard to the provenance of these weapons. According to the Vienna Press they have been brought from Italy, but the statement cannot be accepted without reserve.

The proposed application of the new Turkish Military Law requiring service in the army of all men under 45 years has given a great impulse to emigration in Macedonia and hundreds of young men are daily escaping over the frontiers into the neighbouring States. Two hundred and fifty are stated to have arrived yesterday in Thessaly. The movement is peculiarly unfortunate in view of the approach of the harvest, which, this year, will be reaped in many districts by women and old men. Desertions of Albanian, Greek and Bulgarian soldiers from the army are also frequent. On Sunday 15 Moslem Albanian deserters arrived in Corfu.

The Smyrna Chamber of Commerce has, according to the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung, submitted to all the Consuls General there, for transmission to their respective Governments, a memorandum pointing out that the flourishing commerce of Smyrna and the province is almost entirely in European hands, that the next three months will see the chief export of local produce, consisting of dry fruit, wine, figs and grapes, to the value of £2,000,000, as well as oil, corn, opium, minerals and carpets to a similar amount, and that all this business will stop and the whole district will be ruined if the Italian navy attacks the port. The memorandum asks for measures warding off this danger and is signed by the secretary of the Chamber and a committee of merchants. The correspondent adds that out of twelve signatures six are British.

According to the Morning Post, Germany has just sold two flying machines to the Ottoman Government, and two German pilots have placed themselves at the disposal of the military authorities, one of them, Herr Leutnant Jahnow (a Prussian of the Imperial type) joining the Turkish Army as an officer. It is stated, moreover, that several German firms are at present negotiating with the Turkish Government for the sale of flying machines.

Constantinople, June 20.

Within a few days the modification of Article 35 of the Turkish Constitution will be discussed by the Chamber of Deputies. It will be remembered that the failure of Said Pasha's last Cabinet to obtain a sufficient majority for the modification brought about the dissolution of Parliament and a General Election from which the Committee majority emerged victorious. The Cabinet recently submitted a further amendment of the article in question to the leaders of the Committee Parliamentary Party, by which the Government, after dissolving Parliament in consequence of a difference of opinion, was entitled to order a fresh dissolution should the new Parliament adopt the same attitude as its predecessor over the question at issue. The Commission for the reform of the Constitution and a great majority of the Committee Party supported the original modification of the article, which obliged the Government to accept the decision of the new Parliament. After considerable discussion, which appears to have become decidedly heated at times, the Government gave way.

On 11th June the Committee Party decided to support the Government's proposals for the modification of Articles 7 and 43 of the Constitution, as follows:—

"Article 7 (Original text).—The Sultan has the power . . . to open or close Parliamentary sessions, to convoke the National Assembly in special circumstances as an extraordinary measure, to dissolve the Chamber of Deputies with the assent of the Senate in conformity with Article 35 on condition that new general elections be held and a new Parliament convoked within three months' time. (Modified text).—The Sultan has the power . . . to dissolve the Chamber of Deputies in conformity with Article 35 and to suspend or adjourn its session, on condition that the said suspension or adjournment should not exceed in duration one half of the duration of the annual session and that the said session should be completed within the (official) year.

"Article 43 (Original text).—The two Chambers forming the National Assembly meet without being convoked on 1st November (O.S.) of each year. The session shall be opened by Imperial Iradeh. The closure on the following 1st May (O.S.) shall also be decreed by the Imperial Iradeh. Neither of the two Chambers shall meet when the other is not in session. (Modified text).—The two Parliamentary Assemblies shall meet annually on 1st November (O.S.), and should the session have been adjourned shall meet, without being convoked at the termination of the period of adjournment by Imperial Iradeh. The session shall be of six months' duration, after the expiration of which time it shall be closed by Imperial decree and neither of the two Assemblies shall sit without the other. Should the Chamber of Deputies be dissolved, the session of the new Chamber, which shall meet four months after the dissolution, shall be an extraordinary session of two months' duration which may be prolonged, but may not be adjourned. The four years during which the Legislature shall sit, according to Article 69, shall be reckoned from the following 1st November (O.S.)."

Constantinople, June 24.

The Tanin to-day publishes an important declaration made by Hadji Adil Bey to one of its representatives concerning the employment of foreign specialists in the Ministry of the Interior. After expressing the conviction that the internal administration could not follow a normal course without effective inspection and control, the Minister of the Interior remarked that there was a great difference between the ideas which he formerly evolved at an office desk in a Government Department and those with which he returned from his journey in Albania and Macedonia after a first-hand study of local conditions. He was convinced that the country would benefit by the assistance of foreign specialists in the proposed form of an inspectorate under the direction of a foreign inspector-general. Independent civil inspectors corresponding directly with headquarters would eventually be appointed for every province.

The knowledge of the excellent work done by the corps of inspectors attached to the Ministry of Finance under the control of the French Inspector-General, M. Joly, confirmed his belief that the Ministry of the Interior required the services of a similar body of officials. He proposed to offer the post of Inspector-General to a British official possessing an extensive knowledge of the Turkish Empire. The friendly sentiments of the British people towards Turkey were well known and he admired the continuity and methods which marked British administrative policy. He intended to submit his proposals to the Chamber of Deputies during the debate on the Budget of his Ministry.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 20.

The Tanin to-day gives special prominence to a discussion of the question of Anglo-Turkish friendship. It publishes translations of a letter from the Secretary of the Oriental Questions Committee and an article in the Review of Reviews in which warm approval is expressed of the idea of inviting foreign advisers to aid Turkish administrative reform.

In a leading article Hussein Jahid Bey discusses the possibility of the renewal of the close friendship between Turkey and England. After remarking that all Turks gratefully remember the part played by England in the Crimean War and in the revision of the Treaty of San Stefano, Jahid Bey points out that English sympathies for Turkey cooled owing to the maladministration prevailing in the Ottoman Empire. The only way to win back English sympathy, he adds, is to engage earnestly in the work of reform, and the most effective proof of Turkish earnestness would be an invitation to foreign specialists to assist in this work.

Constantinople, June 23.

After a short and uninteresting debate the Chamber yesterday voted by 210 to 15 a modification of Article 35 of the Constitution authorizing the Sultan to dissolve the Chamber without consulting the Senate or to declare the Chamber suspended for a period not exceeding three months.—Reuter.

According to this evening's news, a serious pan-Turkish or pan-Islamic propaganda has been discovered among the young Tartar population of South-Eastern Russia, in consequence of which special investigators are being sent to the provinces of Viatka, Kazan and Astrakhan, while in the latter region all the private Muhammadan schools have just been closed by administrative order.

Constantinople, June 21.

Something—no one seems to know what—has happened to the Turkish Naval Staff. As far as one can judge from the multitudes of contradictory reports now current, the publication of a rather derisive article concerning the inaction of the fleet by the Hakk, an extremist journal, caused a movement among the officers of the squadron now at the Dardanelles. Some of them were for going out with at least the torpedo craft and coming to a glorious end. Others, more cautious, threatened to resign the commissions if the Government gave any such orders. Quarrels ensued, and finally there was something very like mutiny. The Commodore, Tahir Bey, so it is averred, was obliged to quiet some of the more ardent spirits among the junior officers by felling them with a chair. However this may be, it is certain that there were scenes of a character not conducive to naval discipline. The Minister of Marine paid a visit to the Fleet, and ordered a court-martial to try certain officers. The court-martial presently resigned, and was replaced by another court presided over by a military officer. Rassim Pasha replaced Tahir Bey, and a Lieutenant-Colonel was appointed Chief of the Staff of the Fleet. As for the sentences passed by the court-martial rumour has it that they were very severe.

Constantinople, June 27.

The time limit of a week for the submission of new tenders by the firms of Messrs. Pearson and Sir John Jackson for irrigation works in Mesopotamia expired to-day, when the representatives of the competing firms informed the Minister of Public Works that they were unable to tender for the proposed works on account of the onerous nature of the conditions which the Government sought to impose upon them.

Athens, June 21.

According to a telegram to the journal Hestia, a long conference took place to-day at Cana between the British Consul and M. Koundouros, a member of the proposed Cretan Directorate. It appears that one or more of the Powers have raised a difficulty with regard to the admission into the new Government of General Limbritis, who is a Greek subject and was formerly Greek Minister of War. M. Koundouros expressed the hope that the objection would be withdrawn, otherwise the remaining members of the Government would resign and anarchy would follow.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

According to the Sabah, the great Powers have not taken into consideration the memoirs presented by the Hellenic colonies in Egypt and other countries demanding an autonomy for the Aegean islands. Our contemporary adds that a communication to that effect has been made to the Ottoman Ambassadors accredited to the Powers.

The same journal learns from Athens that the leaders of political parties have asked the Greek Government to take steps with the Powers in view of the annexation of the islands to Greece. The Government is said to have replied that the annexation of the islands is impossible and to have pointed out that even Crete of which the population has made every sacrifice in view of annexation to Greece has not been annexed.

The London correspondent of the Jeune Turc telegraphs that he learns from a diplomatic source that the British Government has approached the other Powers on the subject of a proposal it is preparing for the solution of the Italo-Turkish conflict. The correspondent learns that the principal points of the proposal are as follows:—

1. Tripoli to be annexed to Italy with the maintenance of the Religious Sovereignty of the Sultan.
2. Cyrenaica to remain an Ottoman province and Italy to evacuate the ports she has occupied there.
3. Evacuation by the Italians of the islands they have occupied against an indemnity to be paid by Turkey and to be equivalent to the cost of the Italian operations in the Aegean.
4. Payment of an indemnity by Italy to Turkey for the Wakis and State domains in Tripoli.

News from Turkish Sources.

(SPECIALLY TRANSLATED FOR THE COMRADE.)

THE first presidents of the Central Red Crescent Society of Egypt, Dr. Ahmed Bey-Hilmi and Dr. Izzat Bey, returned safely from Tripoli to Cairo on the 24th June with two of the members of the Society, Dr. Monier Bey and Dr. Mohammed Effendi Joudat. The whole of the Turkish and Arab officers have been acknowledging in their despatches the signal services rendered by this Society. And particular mention is made of Dr. Izzat Bey, who was not only industrious in medical attendance on the wounded, but also fought with great courage in several battles.

Almoayyed received the following telegram on 20th June:—Italian forces have been landed at Samas—which is a port in Egypt midway between Rirsi Ratrooh and Sidi Brani—to take water. The inhabitants are greatly disturbed and are asking for reinforcements to oppose the Italians.

The Nile (Cairo) correspondent wires from Derna:—On the night of 19th June a battalion of 100 Turkish soldiers marched out of the Turkish Camp at Benghazi towards the west. At dawn five Italian aeroplanes made their appearance, which fired off five rockets on spying the enemy, to warn the Italian Camps. Thereupon two companies of Italians at once marched out fully armed and a brisk fight ensued. The Turks had sent for reinforcements; but before the reinforcements arrived the Italians fled in utter disorder, leaving behind one hundred dead and many implements of war on the field. The Turks also secured a most valuable charger of an Italian Officer. The Turks had three wounded.

Almoayyed (Cairo) has received a wire from the field of battle at Tripoli, dated Benghazi, 24th June:—Nine regiments of Italians landed on the coast of Rissat and tried to attack the Kast-i-Ahmed. But the Arab inhabitants opposed and routed them with severe loss and pursued them to the coast.

The Italians bombarded Sosa—a small village inhabited by refugees from Crete—from the river, but not one man even was injured. They returned disappointed after damaging a water-mill. Rustafi Kamal Bey, commander of Derna, has gone to Sosa to remove the inhabitants to some distance from the shore.

Some men from Benghazi have joined our camp. They inform us that 2,000 Italian soldiers have openly mutinied and refuse to obey their officers. This mutiny is in addition to that already reported. When the officers tried to pass orders the soldiers retired into the churches and laid down their arms. The General in command is greatly perturbed and is anxious to send them back to Italy as soon as possible.

News has just reached us that three Italian officers have suddenly gone mad and nine have committed suicide. The officers are trying to encourage their soldiers by spreading all sorts of false reports, but it is of no avail.

The Jews of Benghazi, who had so long been using hats out of fear of being massacred by Italians, have again resumed Turkish caps.

The Albanian Mutiny.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 24.

A BODY of Albanian troops at Monastir has mutinied, it is believed as a protest against the action of the authorities in the recent elections, and has taken to the mountains, accompanied by several officers. According to the latest news, the mutineers are making for the Kolonia district, on the eastern flank of the Pindus range.

Various estimates, many of which are evidently exaggerated, are given of their strength, but it would seem that the number of those who actually revolted does not exceed five officers and 50 men. It is not known whether they have received any reinforcements.

Unless the mutiny should prove to be but a prelude to a widespread military movement, of which no sign is discerned here, or should obtain strong local support, there is no reason to anticipate that the authorities will have much difficulty in crushing it. At the same time, the recollection of the fact that the revolution of 1908 began in the same district and in similar fashion has naturally caused a certain amount of anxiety in official circles.

LATER.

An official communiqué announces that only 50 soldiers, all Albanian, from the Dibra, Monastir, and Prilip districts, and several officers, among whom are the captain and nine lieutenants, have "joined the insurgents." Two officers and two men are reported to have been captured by detachments sent in pursuit.

Salonica, June 25.

History bids fair to repeat itself in Monastir, where, within a month of the fourth anniversary of the raising of the standard of revolt against the absolutism of Abdul Hamid by a handful of Ottoman troops, a battalion of the 49th Regiment, including the officers, has mutinied against constitutional authority, and, having appropriated all the arms, ammunition, and money on which it could lay hands, has fallen back on Kolonia, in the Grammos mountains, south of Koritza. For some little time past there have been indications that all was not well with the Monastir Army Corps. Discontent has been openly expressed, and a condition bordering on complete disorganization has been set up. The suggested causes of this discontent are twofold. The time-expired men in the ranks have been chafing against their retention with the colours, and at the same time there was another movement, affecting the officers more than the men, born of animosity against the Committee and all its works. The mutiny may therefore, have been organized by anti-Committee officers supported by time-expired soldiers. A further possibility lies in the suggestion that the revolted troops are Albanians who desire to assist their brethren in the present revolution. Both explanations receive support from the fact that the mutineers are said to have demanded the dismissal of Talaat and Djavid Beys and fresh elections to the Chamber of deputies, threatening, in the event of a refusal, to proclaim a general insurrection.

Meanwhile, the authorities are faced by another serious outbreak in Western Albania, where the Malissori have taken up arms. After what seems to have been heavy fighting at Alessio, the rebels, who are said to be massed in great force and to have sent their families and herds into Mirditia, have cut the telegraphic communications with Skutari and are threatening the depot of arms. Reinforcements have been hurried from Dibra and Ellassona.

Constantinople, June 25.

There is reason to believe that the Monastir mutineers are not all Albanians. While the official report states that their leaders accuse the Government of reactionary tendencies, letters recently received from Macedonia and Albania reveal the extensive existence of considerably hostile feelings towards Talaat Bey among certain officers of Albanian Particularist or "Union and Liberty" sympathies, who complain of that Minister's interference in the elections. Yet there is no evidence that the bulk of the officers of the Army are at all affected by such considerations.

The Agence Ottomane publishes the following communiqué from the War Office:—"On the night of the 22nd instant 12 officers and 71 Albanian soldiers deserted with their arms from the garrisons of Monastir, Prilip and Dibra. Detachments were sent in pursuit. Two officers and two soldiers have been captured and 19 soldiers have surrendered. The pursuit continues and is being pushed with the utmost activity."

At a meeting of Ministers held to-day to discuss the Albanian situation it was decided to strengthen the posts on the Montenegrin frontier in order to prevent the smuggling of arms and the passage of sympathizers with the bands in Kossovo province.

Vienna, June 25.

The reports that a battalion of Turkish soldiers have mutinied at Monastir with their officers and joined the Albanian insurgents with arms and baggage are regarded here as a reminder that the situation in the Ottoman Empire ought seriously to engage European attention. A further report that the Mutessarif of Ipek, who recently defended the town against the insurgents, has likewise gone over to them with 150 men is not yet confirmed, but is not dismissed as incredible. The importance of the Monastir mutiny seems to lie for the moment rather in its political than in its military aspect. The mutineers are alleged to demand the dissolution of the Chamber and an honest general election, the dismissal of Djavid Bey and Talaat Bey from office, and the removal of Eyub Sabri from the Young Turkish Central Committee. Such demands would point to a revolt of part of the Army against the Committee, or at least against its most characteristic members. If this be the case the effect of such a revolt upon the Balkan situation and upon the Powers most immediately interested in the Near East might be incalculable.

Vienna, June 26.

A number of messages tending to minimize the importance of the Monastir mutiny have been received here in the course of the day. One such message says that the occurrences at Monastir are severely condemned in military circles at Salonika, where they are regarded as an impudent manifestation against the Government. The latest message from Constantinople bears yesterday's date and is less satisfactory. It admits that more than 200 Albanian soldiers deserted. The senior of the deserted officers is Captain Tajar Bey, also an Albanian. He left behind him a letter addressed to the military commander of Monastir stating that the movement was not directed against the Empire but against the Committee. The deserters, who are alleged to have a number of Maxims, are reported to be in the hills near Demir Hissar, about 20 miles north of Resna (near the headquarters of Major Niazi at the beginning of the Young Turkish revolution). Further desertions were expected last night. Two battalions have been despatched to keep the deserters under observation.

Salonica, June 26.

The Monastir mutineers would appear to be meeting with abundant passive if, for the present, no active support from their fellows of the Monastir Army Corps. Exactly how many men have deserted is unknown, but the number certainly includes Tajar Bey, the ringleader, and seven other officers. The men, mostly Albanians, have been reinforced by some Anatolian Mussalmans.

The situation in Monastir is stationary. The mutineers have shown no sign of further activity and the military authorities have made no attempt at pursuit. Delay would seem to favour an extension of the trouble, as the officers of the garrison are greatly excited.

In a Monastir café yesterday a captain shot dead a lieutenant who had expressed approval of the desertion of Tajar Bey and his troops. Discontent is rife also at Prilip, whence two officers and nine soldiers fully armed have deserted and joined the mutineers at Resna. Reports from Argyrocastro describe the situation there as very threatening.

Eyub Sabri, Secretary-General of the Committee, whose resignation is demanded by the deserters, has since his arrival here yesterday been holding a series of conferences with the object of getting together a mission of officers and influential persons to go to Monastir and reason with the mutineers. I have every reason to believe that the dismissal of Talaat and Djavid Beys from the cabinet will at any rate be promised if the mutinous troops consent to return to barracks.

The position of the Government has been rendered increasingly serious by the inability of the military authorities to rely upon the loyalty of the Salonika and Uskub Army Corps. Discontent with the Committee and the Government has been growing apace at Salonika, where conservative estimates put the number of anti-Committee officers at 300 out of an approximate effective of 800. It is understood that an open demonstration of disaffection was to be made here on the anniversary of the Constitution, but events at Monastir may serve to bring the movement to a head immediately. In any case it may be accepted that the outbreak will meet with lively sympathy from both the neighbouring army corps.

Constantinople, June 27.

The censorship of all news from the Monastir district continues to be strictly applied. Ministers and army leaders are silent and the capital has had no further information bearing on the mutiny for the last 36 hours.

The mutineers are believed in well-informed circles to have demanded:—

- (1) The impeachment of Hakki Pasha and certain members of the Cabinet.
- (2) The resignation of Said Pasha and several of his colleagues.
- (3) The recognition of the individual responsibility of Ministers.
- (4) The cessation of all Committee interference with the Executive.
- (5) The holding of new elections.
- (6) A general amnesty.

Vienna, June 27.

"Grave anxiety prevails in Government circles concerning events at Monastir," runs an official telegram from Constantinople to-day. A later private telegram explains the anxiety by reporting that at Monastir 12 battalions have already mutinied and that four of them have joined the deserters in the mountains. The Vali and the commandant of Monastir are stated to have been taken prisoners. The mutiny is extending also around its other centres, Prilip and Dibra.

One message suggests that the Vali of Salonika, Hussein Kiazim, is the soul of the movement. If so, the movement has a gifted and a determined leader—in fact, the only man in Turkey who has of late had the courage publicly to censure the Committee and its works. Another sign that the mutiny is not a local outburst may be found in an open letter addressed on Wednesday through an Italian journal to the Turkish Government and to the Committee by a Turkish officer, formerly a friend of Said Pasha and of Mahmud Shevket Pasha, declaring the re-awakening of the Ottoman people and the hour of its revenge upon the Committee to be at hand.

Said Pasha, the Grand Vizier, is said to have informed the members of his Cabinet that he would resign as soon as proof was forthcoming that the country was dissatisfied with the Government. Hadji Adil Bey, Minister of the Interior, thereupon accused him of being ready to make common cause with the revolution. The Cabinet then met without the Grand Vizier and sat for seven hours to discuss the evil tidings of the military revolt.

In official quarters here the situation is considered very disquieting. The semi-official Politische Correspondenz confirms the statement that no action has been or could be taken against the mutineers, and that the army inspector, Zekki Pasha, is now convinced that any attempt at reprisals would lead to deplorable complications.

The Politische Correspondenz reports further that the ammunition and arms which were being sent under escort from Dibra to Alessio have been captured by the Albanian insurgents. The escort lost a major, a lieutenant, ten soldiers and a gendarme killed. Fahi Pasha now urges the proclamation of an amnesty extending even to Hussan Bey and Isa Boletinat.

Balkan Dangers.

(FROM THE "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, June 8.

THE diplomatic conditions are not favourable to any combined Italian and Balkan raid. The Austrian Government is here more Conservative than ever. The Berlin Foreign Office is solid with it; and in addition is just now in an extremely bad temper with Italy. A week ago the official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung published a declaration against an Italian occupation of Mytilene. For Germany, with her practice of issuing non-committal Communiqués, this declaration was very precise. Yesterday the same official newspaper appeared with a sharp rebuke to the Roman Government for not officially denying the charge that the German Consul at Smyrna had invoked Turkish police to expel from his office troublesome Italians. Nearly every Berlin newspaper comments upon the emphasis of this rebuke. German sentiment remains strongly anti-Italian; and the change of Foreign Office sentiment—supposed to be the result of negotiations with Austria—is welcomed. A factor here is that from the first England and France have been suspected of being behind Italy—and some Germans seriously believe that in not more actively helping the Turks the Empire is unconsciously playing an Anglo-French game.

The attitude of the Russian Government towards a Balkan outbreak is not so plain. Officially St. Petersburg has every reason for peace; but Russian diplomacy is not homogeneous; and the main stream of diplomatic action is always being crossed by dangerous currents from insubordinate juniors, influential amateurs, and—in Balkan affairs—Slavonic idealists. Well-informed Russians give the very best accounts of M. Sazonoff, the present Foreign Minister, and praise him for real knowledge of affairs and an instinct for realities; but he is criticised for leaving details too confidently to underlings, who have not his qualifications. Moreover, the whole St. Petersburg executive is likely soon to be shifted. M. Kokovtseff wants to come to Berlin. It was his ambition to become President of the Council of Ministers after M. Stolypin, but he is entirely out of sympathy with the violent Nationalism which he took over and has been obliged to continue. The Minister of the Interior, M. Makaroff, will also probably go. The cause is the dissatisfaction of governors and other high officials, who are used to the Russian tradition of a Minister of the Interior who is a personality, and who impresses a definite policy on the whole internal machinery. A possible successor of M. Kokovtseff, as Premier is M. Schtcheglovitoff at present Minister of Justice. M. Schtcheglovitoff has increased his reputation at Court by the emphasis with which he lately defended his Department against Duma criticism; and he has no hampering doubts about Nationalism or anything else.

(FROM A "PALL MALL GAZETTE" CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, June 10.

The visits of the King of Bulgaria to Vienna and Berlin, of the King of Montenegro to Vienna and the announced visit of King Peter of Serbia to Vienna and Berlin in September next exercise the curiosity of the Continental Press and even the curiosity of certain diplomatic circles. Have those visits a political character, and, if so, what do they really mean?

It is not surprising that in Vienna, Berlin, Sofia, Cettinje and Belgrade, the official commentators characterise them as simply visits of courtesy. But it is at once evident that this unusual Balkanic courtesy to Austria and Germany is a glaring discourtesy to Turkey in her present circumstances, and that, therefore, it is very political indeed. It is well known that all three Kings have patriotic intentions about Turkish territories.

The cordial reception of "the Tsar of the Bulgarians" in Vienna and Berlin will undoubtedly encourage the national aspirations of the Bulgarians to see Macedonia at least autonomous, if not annexed to Bulgaria. And the not less cordial reception of King Nicholas of Montenegro in Vienna will encourage, at least indirectly if not directly, his aspirations to re-establish the entire kingdom of Zetta under his own sceptre.

Even in his toast to the Emperor he significantly mentioned the renewal of the Royal dignity to Montenegro. That country never had the Royal dignity for itself, but it was a part of the kingdom of Zetta, which in the twelfth century (so far back!) comprised, besides the present Montenegro, North Albania and a part of Herzegovina. It is that kingdom which King Nicholas aspires to renew and unite under his own sceptre. And his cordial reception in Vienna will be interpreted by his people, and by the turbulent Albanians their neighbours, as an encouragement on the part of Austria to King Nicholas's aspirations.

Only the three Emperors—the Russian, German and Austrian—and their most intimate advisers know what the visits of three Balkan Kings to Vienna and Berlin really mean. Ordinary Ambassadors and Ministers are left to their own conjectures.

The explanation, which finds more acceptance than any other, is the following:—

There is a secret understanding between Russia, Germany, Austria (and Italy as well) concerning the Balkans. In the first place all the three Emperors and the King of Italy will strive honestly to keep up the present status quo in the Balkans, combined with the preponderating economic and political influence of Russia in Bulgaria, of Austria in Serbia and Kossovo Vilayet (including the Novi Bazar Sandjak), and of the co-operating influence of Austria and Italy in Albania.

In the second place, or I may say in the second article of the secret convention, the eventuality is foreseen that in the long run the preservation of the status quo may prove impossible.

In such a case all the contracting Powers have bound themselves in advance to an absolute territorial "désintéressement"; neither Russia, nor Austria, nor Italy would get a foot of Balkan territory for herself. But Russia's protégée, Bulgaria, would get Macedonia, Serbia and Montenegro would divide between them the Sandjak and the Kossovo Vilayet, Albania would get her autonomy under the joint protectorate of Austria and Italy.

Turkey in Europe would probably be reduced to Thracia and Constantinople, with free passage for the Russian men-of-war through the Dardanelles, which would practically mean the placing of the European remnant of Turkey under the Protectorate of Russia.

One thing is certain: Austria is highly unpopular among the Balkan Slavs. And another fact is not less certain: Bulgaria, Serbia and Montenegro are at present under the exclusive influence of the Russian Foreign Office. Neither "the Tsar of the Bulgarians" nor the Kings of Montenegro and Serbia are making their pilgrimage to Vienna and Berlin from their own free initiative independently of what Russia may think of it.

I have reason to believe that what precedes is the real explanation of the visits of the Balkanic Kings to the Emperors of Austria and Germany. The immediate future will confirm the truth of the statement. With the prospect of receiving satisfaction of their claims in a not too distant future, the Balkan Kings will for the present help to keep up the status quo in the Balkans.

The Ægean Islands.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, June 21.

A TELEGRAM from Rome to the Écho de Paris states that England has opened negotiations with the Powers regarding the Ægean Islands now occupied by Italy. It is said that these negotiations were undertaken by Downing Street at the request of the Greek Premier, M. Venizelos.

It now seems certain, according to this despatch, that the twelve islands now held by the Italians will never again revert to Turkey although the Sultan may be allowed to maintain a nominal sovereignty over them. It is proposed, on the other hand, that these islands, together with Crete and Samos, shall form an autonomous confederation. While the Triple Entente and Triple Alliance Powers are discussing the matter Italy will refrain from any further action in the Aegean Sea, and it is believed that the negotiation now proceeding may be the prelude to the calling of a general conference for the purpose of discussing the termination of the war.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Chios, June 21.

The Italian Fleet is still believed to be in Chian waters, but has not shown itself again by day. In pursuance of the proclamation of martial law search has been made for concealed firearms in the villages and a few houses in Chios Town. The Turkish soldiers quartered in the interior continue to behave with self-restraint.

Reports from Kalymnos and other Southern Aegean Islands show that the Italians after occupation have withdrawn all troops except small detachments for police purposes. No Italian flag is shown, and the inhabitants are ignorant to whom they own allegiance.

Athens, June 23.

The Committee of Aegean Islanders yesterday presented a memorandum to the Italian Legation here. The document, after alluding to the desire of the islanders for union with Greece, expresses the hope that if this desire cannot be realized the autonomy of the islands may be assured. The memorial so far has not been presented to the other Legations.

Whatever may be the view which diplomacy may take of this question, it is certain that the islanders will be entirely within their rights in demanding the restoration of the ancient privileges accorded to them by successive Sultans and enjoyed for several centuries and only suppressed within recent years.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Athens, June 23.

The Congress of Delegates from the Aegean Islands which assembled at Patmos last week elected a committee which will proceed to Rome for the purpose of expressing their gratitude to Italy for the liberation of the islands and invoking her aid in regard to the question of their political future. The resolutions passed by the Congress are published here to-day. They announce the firm determination of the islanders never to fall back under the Turkish yoke, and, after expressing a pious wish for union with Greece, proclaim the complete autonomy of the islands, based on verbal and written declarations by General Ameglio and other Italian officers as well as on the autonomous privileges acquired in past centuries and on the doctrine that no Christian people, once rescued, shall be allowed to relapse under Turkish domination. The Confederation of autonomous islands receives the name "The Aegean State." A decision in regard to the mode of election of the head of the State and of the legislative body is postponed. The flag of the Confederation will be blue with a white cross, and its emblem the sun god Apollo.

The proclamation is dated 4th June and is signed by the representatives of 12 islands.

M. Ralli, ex-Premier, has been elected to the Greek Chamber as Deputy for Arcadia. The seat was vacated in his favour by a member of his party.

Affairs in Tripoli.

THE Berliner Tageszeitung publishes from its Tripoli correspondent some interesting information concerning recent military operations and the situation in the town of Tripoli. With regard to the engagement at Zanzur, the correspondent confirms the report that the repeated counter-attacks by the Turks were each time successfully repelled with the bayonet and by the "murderous bombardment of the three warships lying in the vicinity." He adds, however: "Nevertheless Zanzur was not captured by the Italians and the Italians did not take a single prisoner. The losses on each side were comparatively great, especially among the Turks and Arabs. The Italians, according to official estimate, have lost 30 killed and 200 wounded, including 10 Askari killed and 60 Askari wounded. These losses of the two Askari battalions merit attention, for the Askari draw upon themselves the special hatred of the Arabs, who regard them as traitors. Officially the losses of the enemy (the Turks) is put down at over 1,000. It was difficult, however, to make an exact count. The 20,000 Italians had against them not more than 4,000 Turks and Arabs. Moreover, while the former had at their disposal the most up-to-date machinery of war, the latter had neither sufficient artillery nor sufficient cavalry. The more astonishing for these facts is the persistence with which the Arabs attacked again and again."

Still more interesting is the correspondent's description of the state of affairs in the town of Tripoli itself. He writes: "The inhabitants of Tripoli continue to lead a light-hearted—one is almost tempted to say light-minded—life. People are dining, souping, dancing, fêting, while the enemy is only a few kilometres away. Stores, restaurants, fashionable shops are opening one after the other. As the trade of the interior has completely stopped and there is no production whatsoever all articles of consumption have to be imported. The consumers are almost exclusively Italians, or those who live by them. The profits, however, flow mainly into the pockets of the native Jewish and Arab or the Maltese and Greek traders who have immigrated. The soldiers are spending their money right and left. The trade in ostrich feathers is especially flourishing, but the feathers no longer come from the British Cape Colony. According to the official figures of the Customs administration, the imports during the first three months of the present year amounted to 4,835,204 francs. . . . So long as troops and their camp followers are here business will continue to flourish. But after? To the Turks their Tripoli possession only cost 2,000,000 francs per year and Tripoli remained a small neglected port whose charm to foreigners consisted in its Oriental character and cheap living. The Italians are transforming Tripoli into a more modern city, which will make upon its inhabitants claims of a totally different kind. The sacrifices which the Italians are making are enormous. In the interests of civilisation this side of the Italian enterprise deserves the highest appreciation of the educated world. But is the land really worth these sacrifices?"

Turkey and Europe.

L'Opinion of the 15th instant contains an article, "La Vraie Question d'Orient," from the pen of M. Georges Gaulis. The writer thinks that the summoning of a conference with a view to settling the differences between Turkey and Italy would be attended by considerable risk; it would probably lead to an opening up of the entire Eastern Question; and Turkey and her friends know that the era of annexation begins, not at the hour of fighting, but with the meeting of congresses and conferences. The events of the past eight months are not calculated to inspire hope or confidence in any conference of the Powers. Perhaps the most interesting part of the article is that in which the writer defends Turkey against the charges brought against her of failing to put her house in order, and declares that such failure is due to the action of Europe, the jealousy of the Powers, rather than to the lack of endeavour on the part of the Turks themselves:—

Avez-vous bien considéré ce qui se passe en Turquie? Faites-le à loisir de peur d'être dupé par la grande intrigue qui règne sur l'Europe depuis 1908 et qui, depuis 1908, prépare le congrès où nous irons demain peut-être où l'on tentera de disséquer l'empire ottoman. L'intrigue a célébré la révolution à pleins poumons et le paradis de civilisation qui allait s'ouvrir sous la lumière du Croissant. Elle vous a préparé au miracle et comme le miracle ne s'est pas produit vous tenez que la Jeune-Turquie n'a rien fait de ses dix doigts. Prenez du loisir, je vous le répète, et allez-y voir. Vous mesurerez l'effort et vous verrez dans quel chaos de contradictions il s'est accompli. Ce chaos c'est l'Europe tutélaire et tyrannique qui l'a savamment créé en Turquie.

Turkey has been blamed (he continues) for her heavy expenditure on her army, but she has been forced into it by Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria, by her Cretan manoeuvres, by Montenegrin and Italian machinations in Albania, by Russian agitation amongst the Kurds. She withdrew her troops from Tripoli and Cyrenaica, coveted by Italy, in order to cope with the situation forced upon her by Europe. Germany advised her to this action, thus furnishing her with a kind of guarantee against a coup de main on the part of Italy. . . . Turkey has not defended her islands. To defend them a naval force was necessary, and when Turkey wished to increase her navy all Europe was profoundly displeased: it would be a useless extravagance; for who would attack Turkey by sea? And behold Italy mistress of the Turkish Archipelago!

One cannot help feeling that M. Gaulis is justified in his observations.

Powers and Turkey.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris.

I TELEGRAPHED the other day the official French statement that there was "less than ever any question of European mediation or of a European Conference." That remains true to this moment; but only for the present moment. It is more certain than ever, on the contrary, that at a future date the Powers will be irresistibly led to call a Conference. Whether that future is near or distant none can tell. What essential, dangerous, and vital questions the Conference, when it comes, may not stir up is just as uncertain, and every diplomatist is torn between two conflicting arguments.

A European Conference on the one hand seems inevitable. But, on the other, may it not be better to bear "the ills we have?" Your contributor, "A Diplomatist," foreshadows to-day, if not the ills, at least the problems "that we know not of." I may say at once that French official diplomacy refuses for the time being to look so far ahead. In particular the question bluntly put, "The possibility or impossibility of reconciling a friendly understanding with Germany in Asia with a friendly understanding with France in Europe," is one to which France can give no answer. She asks for no alliance and it was not she who thought of proposing one to us, as M. Poincaré plainly said to anyone who read between the lines of his speech; but France and her government adhere loyally to the entente with England.

Were England to conclude that, it was impossible to agree with Germany in Asia and with France in Europe simultaneously and to choose the former course, the disappointment and the resentment felt in this country would be deep and lasting. Our diplomacy must always bear in mind that the nucleus of a party, chiefly a financial party, still exists in this country, which would openly prefer a Franco-German Alliance against us to an Anglo-French Alliance against Germany, as being a far more formidable, perhaps an irresistible, coalition.

Opinion upon the immediate results of a European Conference among unofficial but competent French judges is divided into two widely divergent currents. I find Baron Denys Cochin advocating some such Tripoli Entente policy as the following: "With the help of the Powers Italy must retain several of the Aegean Isles, the others to form a Hellenic group under the guarantee of those Powers. Latin hegemony in the Mediterranean will serve the Triple Entente better than any other command of that sea," and the Echo de Paris expressly disclaims responsibility for its contributors' opinions. On the other hand, M. Georges Goulis, one of the Frenchmen and Europeans who know the Near East best, is vehement in the opposite sense: "If we go to a Conference, let us pray it will be after a strict understanding, binding all concerned to a disinterested resolve to baulk any attempt at partition. It is imperatively necessary to place Turkey under the aegis of some such guarantee as Gambetta eloquently evoked for us after our disasters of 1870, and woe to Europe if, at the beginning of the twentieth century, she offends immanent justice!" (L'Opinion.)

I am afraid the fear of imminent justice will not prevent Turkey from coming shorn out of a Conference. The above two diametrically opposed views represent competent French opinion equally well, and opinion outside this country is no more united. Hence the nerves of diplomacy.

Vienna, June 23.

A report emanating from Athens that, in the event of further Italian action in the Aegean Sea, England intends to adopt measures in Turkish interests has aroused keen attention in diplomatic and political circles here. The Wiener Journal, a paper which is always in active opposition to the Foreign Office, seizes the opportunity sharply to attack the Foreign Minister, Count Berchtold. It observes that Count Berchtold ought not to be blind to the example presented by England and France, which notwithstanding their traditional warm relations to Italy, act as self-conscious States, whose first task must be to defend their own interests, and not to conceal their grave displeasure against the Italian action. The attitude of the Austrian Foreign Minister is that of quiet but very significant sympathy for Italy and the Minister sacrifices all sympathy for Turkey to the phantom of the Triple Alliance. The paper concludes by declaring that the "proceedings of England not only put Austria to shame, but may have very serious consequences for the Monarchy, as the Balkan peoples would not forget that if they obtained possible autonomy it would be England to whom their thanks would be due."

Britain and Turkey.

IN AN interesting message to his journal, the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung states that England is regaining her political authority in Turkey in a most remarkable way indeed; and "one must go back to the time of Sir William White's Embassy to find a similar state of things." Every word coming from London is "regarded as a revelation, and the Turkish statesmen and their journals simply hang on Sir Edward Grey's lips." The latter's recent statements in the House of Commons on the subject of the status quo in Asiatic Turkey and on the pilgrimage to Mecca have been received at Constantinople with the utmost satisfaction; and to judge from the quiet tone with which the Italian occupation of the Sporadis is being discussed in the semi-official Turkish journals one is justified in surmising that the Porte has received reassuring promises from the British Foreign Office. The correspondent, however, is careful to warn his readers against too hasty interpretations of this latest mood of the Young Turks. "More than once," he says, "in the course of recent years German diplomacy took occasion to point out to Turkish statesmen the necessity of maintaining good relations with England. One may add without committing an indiscretion that on the occasion of the visit to Berlin, nearly two years ago, of the former Grand Vizier Hussein Hilmi Pasha no other than the Kaiser himself, in the course of an audience granted to the Turkish statesman, strongly emphasised the importance of good relations between Turkey and England. Hilmi Pasha on returning home reported this in detail to the Council of Ministers. These facts," the writer adds, "are only mentioned with a view to disposing in advance of the erroneous inference that a rapprochement between Turkey and England must necessarily be accompanied by an estrangement between Turkey and Germany."

Position in the Near East.

IN AN article devoted to the consideration of the present phase of the Italo-Turkish war the Journal des Débats welcomes the tendency towards a calmer mood which is noticeable in the diplomatic world, where the only disturbance is the anxiety of Russia and England on the subject of the Dardanelles. "Turkey, however," it says, "need not fear the two Powers so long as she persists in her wise decision not to close the Straits. On the other hand, Italy cannot lose sight of the fact that if complete liberty of action is guaranteed to her in Tripoli and the adjoining waters her agreements with the other Governments do not at all extend to the Eastern basin of the Mediterranean, and that she must in consequence take full account of the European interests in that portion of the theatre of war. It is true that a state of the war exists between Italy and Turkey and that it justifies all acts of war. At the same time this war, in view of the condition in which it broke out without the least provocation on the part of Turkey, cannot be allowed to have for its effect the ruin of the interests of the other Powers outside Tripoli, or the displacement of the equilibrium in the Aegean Sea. The Rome Cabinet ought to recognise by now that it would have been infinitely wiser on its part to have confined its action to Tripoli, to have concentrated there all its efforts, and to have installed itself there as best it could without seeking to obtain from the Porte an impossible capitulation."

As for France, the journal adds, she would be ever prepared to act in a conciliatory manner as between the two belligerents, but for that "it is necessary that she should not be called upon to do anything incompatible with her traditional warm friendship with Turkey. At this moment less than ever could France enter any combination which is directed against the Ottoman Empire. It is only too obvious what she would lose by such a policy. One would seek in vain to find what she could gain by it."

Unemployment in Italy.

AMID the paeans of victory with which the operations at Zannu has been hailed by the Chauvinist press of Italy,—operations which have resulted simply in the reoccupation of a position already held by the Italian troops as far back as December last—an appeal published in the Secolo emphasises what war means to those on whom the chief burden falls. The Italian Government, having to find money for the war in Tripoli, is applying the screw in every direction, and has so haggled over the prices to be paid for certain repairs to the rolling stock of the State railways that a large firm of Government contractors in Milan (the Officine Elettro-Ferrovie) has been compelled to discharge a further batch of workmen, 400 of whom have signed an appeal for help to the leading Radical organ of Italy.

The signatories declare that their grievous case is common to other industries in Milan, and that of 1,500 men normally employed at the Officine there only 600 now remain at work; they raise a solemn protest in the name of the hunger that awaits them against these discharges of workmen en masse, and ask if money exists in Italy only for the War Office.

Arabic Influence in Turkey.

DURING the last few days it has been rumoured in some quarters that the situation created by the Turco-Italian war was about to undergo an important development, that the Powers of the Triple Entente would take steps to bring about a solution of the crisis, and that Turkey, anxious to recover the Islands in the Aegean, would give way in Tripoli. After inquiries conducted in well-informed quarters, I have failed to obtain confirmation of this news.

Of course, exchanges of views have taken place, and are still taking place, between London, Paris, and St. Petersburg, but so far no result likely to advance the cause of peace has been obtained.

and no definite concerted action in Oriental affairs has been arranged for.

As to the Turkish Government, its point of view has not been altered in consequence of the seizure of the islands. It may seem surprising to many that the recovery of the African vilayets being beyond hope, the Porte does not display any anxiety to retain at least its Aegean possessions.

Such is the explanation of the situation as given to me from an authoritative source. It makes clear at the same time the present position of affairs—a very serious one indeed.

The Arab-speaking populations in the Ottoman Empire are numerically predominant, and the day when they will be politically predominant in the Parliament is not so remote as some imagine, so that the Turkish Cabinet is bound not to make light of the Arabic feelings and wishes. They are decidedly in favour of pushing forward the energetic campaign now carried on in Tripoli—essentially an Arabian land. Among the Arabs, any recognition by Turkey of the Treaty of Annexation voted in the Italian Parliament, would be considered as an act of treason, and would not be obeyed by the combatants themselves.

In short, the day where the peace would be signed by Turkey at the price of Tripoli would see the beginning of a general secession from Constantinople of all Arabic elements. It would spell the disruption of the Turkish Empire.

As a matter of fact, important as the Aegean Islands may be to Turkey, they are of little value compared to what the retention of Arab loyalty means for the statesmen on the Bosphorus.

In one circumstance only will the Turkish Ministers agree even to consider the abandonment of Tripoli to its fate—if, through the action of Italy, or of any other Power, a situation likely to lead directly to the break up of the Empire occurred.—The Pall Mall Gazette.

Austrian Advice to Italy.

UNDER the title of "Die Aktien Italiens," Danzers Armee Zeitung, in its issue of 20th June, discusses the military situation at some length:—

Nearly nine months (observes its contributor, F. L.) have passed since those days of suspense in September last when Italy translated into military action that lust for expansion which has been hers since the eighties. And yet, in spite of creditable performances on the part of her troops, she has not got much further as to these African provinces than she was at the beginning of the war. Turkey has once again proved herself most surprisingly tough—in fact, there is no blinking the fact that an appeal from the Caliph to war still carries with it its wonted and irresistible power, and Italy is forced again and again to acknowledge that Tripoli and Cyrenaica must continue to exact their toll of life and money as long as the defensive is maintained or until organised Turkey and the Caliph are forced to bow to Italy's will. The munitions of war flow in an uninterrupted stream through Tunis and Egypt into the debated country. Nor is Italy in a position to avert this; and it is becoming always more evident that what was said in the early days of this campaign as to the advantages to the enemy in that these African territories lie afar off and would therefore be more easily detached from the main Government, has not proved to be the case. Turkey, in fact, has not received any mortal blow, while, on the other hand, strength may be said to flow to her unhindered from the Muhammadan lands close by.

The writer then alludes to Italy's change of tactics, to the renewed activity in the matter of bombarding Tripoli, to the action in the Red Sea which raised the ire of the independent tribes inhabiting those regions, and finally to the system of pin-pricks instituted about the Dardanelles and the cannonade of Beyrout.

All these little methods were collectively intended not only to exasperate Turkey, but also to draw others into difficulties; and yet, in face of the unshaken calm of the Sublime Porte, these means have signally failed. Even the last threat—the occupation of Rhodes and the other islands—has been without effect, and must continue to be so, seeing that less than ever can Turkey now give way unless she be resolved to yield up her position as the foremost Power of Islam, as the valorous defender of Allah on Africa's burning soil. And would she not endanger her prestige in the Balkans, to say nothing of her many other more loosely attached subjects, who in the loss of Tripoli would read the fall from power of the Caliphate upon the African continent. And what about the great neutral Powers who with all their divergent interests, are ever ready to interfere in the affairs of Turkey?

Referring to the loud complaints now heard in commercial quarters touching local hindrances to trade, he observes with some significance that "there are many roads which lead to Constantinople." "F. L." is, indeed, of opinion that both Italy and Turkey are more obstinately intent than ever on pursuing their quarrel, and observes that what began in the first place as a purely colonial campaign has developed into a war between two strong military states. Where and in what way, therefore, might Italy be able to take a really decisive step? Further action on land about Tripoli, he declares to be worse than useless, for here Turkey can always count on reinforcements; while operations among the islands would necessitate strong reinforcements for Italy. Therefore, he is of opinion that their only remaining "card" now is to concentrate their attention upon the Dardanelles—"that small, much-debated and undermined portion of European Turkey which separates her from that great reservoir of her strength, Turkey in Asia." Nor does the writer prescribe this measure in the form of a merely passing action.

Only the permanent hold in the narrow ways leading from the entrance to the Dardanelles on to Constantinople, the actual severance from Asia of European Turkey which would leave her in a strongly exposed situation, is the coup likely to bring the Sublime Porte into the fatal position of necessary surrender.

Whether Italy be in a position to do this is a question upon which opinions appear to differ, although the strange and culpable neglect Turkey has shown as to her navy as well as her coastal defences would seem in her enemy's favour. Nevertheless this desultory campaign and the prolonged waiting for some easier solution has but served to make the soldiers' task a more arduous one.

Italy, concludes the article, is having the game to herself this time, without any allies, for the situation is totally different from what it was in 1859 and in 1866—she will have to make some blow of energy, for her international reputation is at stake.

Sultan's Friday Prayers.

("EXPRESS" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 7.

THE present Sultan has re-established the imperial residence on the shore of the Bosphorus which Abdul Hamid deserted in the fear of meeting the same fate as one of his predecessors, who was awakened one morning by the bombarding of his palace by the guns of his own fleet.

Leaving the ancient dwelling of the Sultans on the Pointe du Serail—the scene of many a sanguinary tragedy—his father, Abdul-Medjid, installed himself in the spacious and beautiful palace erected by his architect, Garabed Balian, on a site on the seashore called Dolma-Baghtché. His successor lived there even after he had built the palace of Tchiragan, situated a little higher up.

But the suspicious nature of Abdul Hamid forbade him to feel comfortable between the sea and street, and exposed in consequence to all sorts of eventualities, and he isolated himself on the height of Yildiz, in a situation accessible from one side only and protected by the large park which surrounds it.

Dolma-Baghtché, of all existing Turkish palaces, is the only one, with the exception of Beylerbey, on the Asiatic shore, which justifies its name. It is the only imperial Turkish residence where grand ceremonies can be held, for it is the only one that possesses a throne-room capable of accommodating a large assembly.

With the beginning of the present régime Dolma-Baghtché was thoroughly overhauled, and it badly needed repairs, since for half a century the vast edifice had hardly ever been touched. A little west of the palace, and also on the shore, is situated the mosque called Validé, where the weekly ceremony of the Selamlık generally takes place.

A square planted with trees and ornamented with a clock tower separates the palace from the mosque. It sometimes happens, of course, that the Sultan offers his Friday prayers elsewhere, but the proximity of Validé to Dolma-Baghtché gives it the privilege of receiving the Padishah most regularly.

When the Sultan is about to leave the palace for the mosque, all the approaches are occupied by battalions of infantry and squadrons of cavalry. The traffic is not entirely held up, as was the case under the old régime and the people are allowed to pass between the military lines until the sharp sounds of a bugle announce that the Commander of the Faithful is taking his place in his carriage. The troops present arms, and the crowd is held back behind the hedge of bayonets.

Another bugle blast and the battalions drawn up nearest the entrance to the palace shout the old Ottoman cry, wishing long life to their Sovereign—"Padishahim tchuk Yacha!" Then one sees the large victoria drawn by four white horses with long tails almost touching the ground, advancing at a slow and dignified trot.

Mehmed the Fifth, who is always alone in his carriage, salutes the troops with a long and emphatic gesture. He is often smiling, especially now that the war in Africa has taken a better turn. Last autumn his face ordinarily appeared sad and worried, for the Sultan is a man of nervous sensibility, and he is acutely affected by passing events. His whole appearance is in striking contrast with the impassible mask of Abdul Hamid, who remained unmoved alike by the delirious acclamations of the crowd in July 1908 and during his own journey of Canossa, to St. Sophia, several weeks later.

If it be true that the countenance is the mirror of the soul, it is particularly with Oriental sovereigns that one seeks for indication of character in their manner and expression.

The grand orchestra of the palace is taking its place in the courtyard of the mosque, and it begins to play the Imperial March while the Sultan is still some distance off. Three shouts from the troops interrupt its repetition as his Imperial Majesty makes his entrance into the mosque, where he has been preceded by several of the ladies of his harem. His Ministers have awaited him at the door, and the spectacle is assuredly not without interest and significance. The solemn silence that used to announce the dreaded approach of Abdul Hamid no longer marks these Friday ceremonies, but they none the less possess that character of solemnity which always impresses an Oriental crowd.

Outside the mosque, when the Sultan is taking his place, the crowd, which had remained strangely still during the passing of the Sultan, once more becomes animated.

The prayers are finished, and the Sultan receives the Ministers who are present and questions them on public affairs. With Abdul Hamid it was the foreign Ambassadors who had access to him immediately after the Friday Selamluk ceremony. They had generally many things to say, for he personally directed the foreign policy of the empire, and often without consulting his Ministers. To-day the Diplomatic Corps has nothing to do directly with this constitutional Sovereign. It is only just to remember, however, that the British Embassy always made it a point of honour to address itself on current affairs only to the Sublime Porte—the Turkish Foreign Office—not departing from this principle even when it could quite well have negotiated direct with the Sovereign.

The conversations finished, the Sultan again takes his place in his carriage to the shrill strains of the orchestra, and returns to the palace by the same road.

In the Wake of the War.

ISLAND after island in the Aegean Sea is being occupied by the Italians, writes a correspondent of the Westminster Gazette. There is no resistance from the Turks, but a rumour is heard that the Dardanelles may be again closed, and this alone seems to cause any interest in this interminable war. A few weeks ago I started from Athens to reach Constantinople, though strongly advised not to make the attempt, for the Dardanelles were then closed and mines were freely scattered about the harbour at Smyrna, where we first landed. It was early evening when we passed out of the Bay of Athens and rounded Cape Colonna. The white marble pillars of the temple of Neptune at Sunium stood out clearly and impressively in the twilight—for many centuries now these pillars have been the first glimpse of the homeland to the roving Greek. At dawn next day we were coasting along the shore of Chios, now called Scio, and the bare hills of the island were lit up by the morning sun. Nearly all these Aegean islands have this bare look from the sea, for the mountains conceal the fertile valleys where vineyards, olive groves and cornfields flourish, and here little villages are found in which people can dream away their existence in one of the most delightful climates of the world. Scio has its tragic memories of the awful massacre of 1822 during the war for Greek independence. The Turks were let loose on this prosperous island by the Sultan's command, and all the dregs of the population of Smyrna were allowed to pillage and loot here. Out of 60,000 inhabitants only 5,000 remained, and a multitude of women and children were sold into slavery. The horrors of that time have never been forgotten and a Greek on board brought the tale to my recollection.

After passing Scio we soon reached the great Gulf of Smyrna, which is certainly a rival to the Bay of Naples in beauty. The Italian Fleet was expected and the blockade of Smyrna was hourly looked for. Here was the danger zone, and we began to stream along much more slowly, for a look-out was being kept for the harbour tug to guide us through the region of the deadly mines.

The harbour was four miles in width at this point, and when the pilot boat arrived we had to follow her very slowly and with the greatest care on a thread-like course. Her movement seemed very mysterious, and one realised the impossibility of finding the passage without this guide, yet on all sides the sea stretched in absolute tranquillity, hiding all trace of the machinery of death beneath her surface. Some people on board insisted that there were no mines, that the whole business was a farce to deceive the Italians and to gain the 200 francs which is the fee for taking a ship through this part of the gulf. But the very next day the awful experience of the Texas showed the reality of the danger, for this ship, on coming out from Smyrna with her load of pilgrims, was blown up and a hundred lives were lost, through carelessness in not following the exact course marked out, although guns from the fort had boomed out their warning.

When we reached the safe waters the little steamer glided away to the left with a shrill whistle, and soon we were passing the fort and entering the inner harbour. Across the entrance were the huge hulks of seven disabled ships ready to be sunk here on the approach of the enemy's fleet. The narrow passage would then have been effectually blocked. We anchored near the quay, and a multitude of boats darted out and surrounded the vessel, and the decks were soon crowded with a host of people with all the usual noise, confusion, and bustle that marks an Eastern port.

How curiously indifferent the Turks are to the war is shown by the fact that our captain was an Italian! In Smyrna there was no trace of excitement—the bazaars were just as crowded, the whole life of the town was in its normal condition. Italians were to be seen in the streets, the churches were open, and Sisters of Mercy and priests were unmolested. At this time we heard there was no prospect of the Dardanelles being opened, though hundreds of ships were waiting in the Bosphorus and the Sea of Marmora. The tremendous expense of this delay and the loss of perishable goods seemed to be the only inconvenience caused by the war, and this fell chiefly on the trade of other nations.

Before noon we left the harbour and passed up the gulf with the same ceremonies as in the morning. We had shipped a large number of passengers who had been waiting for a chance of reaching Constantinople, for the train journey is a wearisome round and takes at least three days. It was almost dark when we entered the port of Mitylene. The island of Sapho veiled her beauties, but the mountains rose to a grander height in the gloom, and the air was sweet with a thousand scents on that calm evening. Lights circled the whole of the bay and gleamed in hundreds amid the dark mass of trees, houses were outlined in living flame, rockets were shooting up into the sky, and a military band was playing. It was the Accession Day of the Sultan and the whole town was en fete.

After an hour at Mitylene we steamed away towards the north, and soon the outline of the island disappeared in the darkness of the night. I had a long talk with a Turkish pasha who was on board, and naturally I wished to hear his views of the war. The courtesy of the Turk is proverbial, and one remembers the saying of some statesman at the time of the Crimean War that the Turk was the only gentleman left in Europe. The attitude of my friend towards the war was one of amusement at the futile efforts of the Italians. "A great Western Power," he said, "whom we have been taught to look upon with awe and respect, has succeeded in taking Tripoli, and has got no further. Our regular troops are not there, and only a handful of our Arabs oppose them." I suggested that they might land on the mainland. "Ah, we wish for nothing better, for our soldiers can fight, but they will not come." I mentioned the enormous cost of the war. "It is costing us very little," he said, "but poor Italy is spending her millions; their only hope is in the interference of the Powers." The policy of procrastination which Turkey adopts recalls to me the phrase of the old Hebrew prophet: "Her strength is to sit still." Whatever happens will be met with that curious fatalism, which is strongest characteristic of the East—a lesson it has learnt all too thoroughly from its religion, for it strikes at the root of any strenuous effort. A Greek comic paper which I bought at Smyrna and showed to my friend had an amusing commentary on the war. Victor Emmanuel had just sat down in a comfortable armchair marked "Tripoli," he is jumping up again in a great hurry, having found an enormous spike hidden in the seat of the chair!

Early next morning we anchored in the roadstead off Dedea-gatch. In the distance there was a fine view of the snow mountains of Samothrace, rising from the mist which completely hid the lower part of the island and gave one the effect of a mysterious cloudland. Dedea-gatch is a small Macedonian port which suddenly leaped into prominence during the closing of the Dardanelles, for steamers landed their passengers and cargoes here. A wearisome railway journey of twelve hours brings one to Constantinople.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says :—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him.....Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{4}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

British Navy.

In the House of Commons of July 22nd Mr. Churchill introduced the supplementary Naval Estimates. He said the direct cause thereof was the new German Navy Law which he proceeded to examine in detail. Its main feature, he said, was increase in the striking force of the ships. All classes were immediately available. Its general effect was the maintenance of four-fifths of the German Navy in full permanent commission, which meant that it was constantly and instantly ready for war. Such preparation, said Mr. Churchill, was remarkable, and so far as he was aware, found no example in the previous practice of modern Naval Powers. The German plans involved a remarkable expansion of strength and efficiency. Discussing the general question of the growth of modern navies Mr. Churchill said that cool study and methodical preparation prolonged over successive years could alone raise a margin of naval power. It was useless flinging money about on the impulse of the moment. The strain ~~was~~ should have to bear would be long and slow. No relief could be gained from impulsive erratic action. We should learn from our German neighbours the way a policy marches unswervingly to its goal. We must have an ample margin of strength instantly ready. There must be steady systematic development of our naval forces, untiringly directed and pursued over a number of years. Mr. Churchill turned to the steps necessary on our part. The new construction referred to in the Supplementary Estimates, he said, was not extensive but the number of ships we should have to build in the next few years would have to be raised from the figures at which he had hoped it might stand. Provision was made for additional submarines and it had been found convenient to accelerate the construction of light cruisers. The main feature of the New German Navy Law would be increased fighting power, which their Fleet would possess. That involved the reorganisation of British forces in order that we might maintain the necessary margin of safety. Mr. Churchill proposed to raise the number of battleships in full commission from twenty-eight to thirty-three. There would also be a Second Fleet consisting of eight vessels. We should have from 1914 onwards five battleship squadrons comprising forty-one battleships of which four squadrons would be in full commission. There would thus be thirty-three of our ships against the German twenty-nine. This might not perhaps be considered a very satisfactory proportion, but having regard to the character of the vessels the arrangement proposed would in the opinion of the Admiralty be adequate to the needs of 1914-15. Mr. Churchill dwelt exhaustively on the question of manning of ships, declaring that it would be necessary to make large additions to the personnel for the next four years. He foreshadowed an increase in pay, and promised to make definite proposals in this connection in the autumn. He said a Royal Commission under Lord Fisher would be appointed to enquire into the question of fuel for ships in commission. This, however, implied no sudden extensive change in the subject of naval construction. Turning to the Mediterranean question, Mr. Churchill pointed out that the naval position there was about to undergo very important changes in view of the advent of the Italian and Austrian Dreadnoughts. He demurred altogether to the assumption that those two Powers whose past history was not altogether free from differences, who had never had a quarrel with us and with whom we had long been upon most friendly and most cordial terms, were likely to combine together for the purpose of attacking us. He also demurred to the suggestion that we ought to maintain, apart from our general supremacy, apart from our margin in home waters, a local superiority in the Mediterranean over the combined fleets of those Powers. We were determined to withdraw six of the older battleships from the Mediterranean and to replace them by four battle-cruisers of the Invincible type. The Invincibles would go out in the winter. Further the armoured cruiser squadron would be replaced by more powerful armoured cruisers. A torpedo station would be established at Alexandria. Referring to Mr. Borden, the Canadian Prime Minister, who was in the gallery Mr. Churchill paid a tribute to the efforts of the Canadian Ministers but declared that no announcement would be made until Mr. Borden and the other Ministers who had been in conference with the Admiralty, had returned and consulted their colleagues.

Continuing the debate on the Navy Estimates, Mr. Balfour said, he would defer criticism on the question of strategy. Although we might groan at the magnitude of this expenditure, we should have anyhow the consolation that we were not building for ambition. We were building for peace, and so long as we were building for peace and security, so long should we have the support of the opinion of the great Dominions and the smaller States of Europe and the enlightened approval of mankind. A Royal Commission under Lord Fisher was about to be appointed to enquire regarding the application of oil fuel to warships. The enquiry would be a long business and did not portend any sudden or extensive changes in the methods of naval construction.

The following is a more complete version of some passages of Mr. Churchill's speech which demand fuller reporting. Mr. Churchill said:—"The Supplementary Estimate is, of course, only the first and smallest instalment of extra expenditure which the new German Law entails upon us. The number of ships we shall have to build during the next five years to maintain the 69 per cent. standard will have to be raised from the figure at which we hoped we would stand, namely, the three next years, and four and three alternately in succeeding years to five next year and four in each succeeding year. The Germans are spending about a million a year on submarines and we cannot allow our lead in submarines to be diminished. The estimates include £160,000 for a Fleet repair ship to be attached to the third battle squadron. Four Mediterranean battleships now stationed at Gibraltar replacing the old Atlantic Fleet will be raised to eight in two years, including the two powerful vessels ready in 1913, and they will be provided with a subsidiary base at Malta enabling them to operate in the Mediterranean, if necessary. All the movements of the Gibraltar squadron will be regulated by the main situation, but its existence and position must not be overlooked, when I deal with arrangements for the Mediterranean. It will be necessary to provide two extra destroyer flotillas, one this year and one the year after next." Dealing with the question of manning, Mr. Churchill announced that the first batch of officers from the lower deck were now being selected and their names would be announced shortly. In regard to the Mediterranean, he said that the maintenance of local supremacy there, apart from general supremacy, would mean a three power standard plus an additional 40 over the strongest naval power and would impose a burden not justified by any vital or fundamental needs. The command of the Mediterranean could not be treated as something wholly separated from the general command of the sea. Any attempt to confine naval supremacy to a particular water was false strategy and bad politics. He did not propose to indicate naval dispositions which we should adopt to meet various contingencies which might arise. It was clear however that the force least suited to war in the Mediterranean would be the comparatively old vessels recently representing the Mediterranean fleet which would become an easy prey to a few ships. The right way to maintain British interests in the Mediterranean was to employ the smallest number of modern ships good enough for the work they would have to do. Even without the Gibraltar Battle Squadron, the Malta Squadron would be most formidable and unapproachable in speed by any vessels of equal power being built or projected. The Mediterranean combination of speed and gunpower offered the highest advantages, specially for trade protection, and in conjunction with the French Navy it would be superior to all possible combinations. These vessels could be spared from home owing to our great margin of powerful cruisers over the next strongest naval power.

Mr. Churchill continued:—"It is not unlikely that the Mediterranean Squadron will require reinforcing at the end of 1915-16, and if so, steps will be taken in due time. The Admiralty has received information indicating that one of the Mediterranean Powers is contemplating another considerable naval programme. If this be correct, it will constitute a new fact requiring prompt attention and it is not included in the forecasts I have given of future naval construction. The task of maintaining the naval power of the Empire under existing conditions is a heavy one. All the world is arming as never before, and we have to protect the dominions and territories scattered over every continent and ocean. There is an earnest desire on the part of the dominions to assist in the common defence of the Empire and the time has come to make that disposition effective. Apart altogether from material aid, the effect of the arrival on the blue waters of these new nations of the British Empire cannot be measured." In conclusion Mr. Churchill ridiculed the pictures which had been drawn of imperialist and economist sections of the Cabinet waging savage and perpetual war which was only suspended from time to time by unsatisfactory and unnatural compromise. The questions with which they had been dealing were not such in which compromise could easily enter. "It is easy to change a minister but it is not easy to change facts. They are unavoidable and have to be dealt with, however unpleasant the consequences. The policy I have submitted is the policy of the Admiralty. On behalf of the Admiralty I ask nothing which is not necessary, and I have not asked anything that I have not got." United British Empire means the safety of the British Empire and probably also the peace of the world. If we are told that the beginnings of co-operation in difference must be accompanied by the beginnings of association in policy, then I say that both measured by defence and by the policy of co-operation of the dominions with the United Kingdom would be of inestimable benefit and strength to the Empire in general and the cause of peace. If, he added, we could secure even at that sacrifice peace we should have done great things.

After referring to the visit of the Canadian Minister in similar terms to Mr. Churchill, Mr. Asquith in the course of his speech said:—"Side by side with growing participation in the active burdens of the Empire on the part of the dominions, there rests with us undoubtedly the duty of making such response as we can to their obviously reasonable appeal to be heard in the determination of the Empire's policy and the direction of its affairs." Arrangements to this end cannot be made in a day. They must be the result of very mature deliberations and will probably have to be developed from time to time. But without committing ourselves to any particular form of arrangement, we share with the great Dominions their feelings which as years have passed have become more and more conscious and articulate that we have a common heritage and interests, and that in the enjoyment of that heritage and discharge of duties which those interests involve we are more and more conscious partners one with the other."

The Supplementary Estimate for 1,500 men was subsequently adopted by 291 votes to 42.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Arthur Lee and other critics of Government declared that the Ministers were making war inevitable, Mr. MacDonald's argument being that Government was building in a panic and assuming the worst, while the Conservatives based their contention on the discrepancy between Mr. Churchill's alarmist talk and Government's lack of preparation.

There was an interesting passage between Mr. Balfour and Lord Charles Beresford.

The former said it was improbable that Britain would engage singlehanded the Triple Alliance in the event of war.

Lord Charles Beresford entirely disagreed. He said that Russia and France would not help much for the next two years.

He and his friends were astonished at Mr. Balfour praising Mr. Churchill. One bright spot in the outlook was the promised aid of the Colonies.

Dr. Macnamara mentioned that concessions regarding the wages of dockyard workers amounted to £41,000 yearly. He hoped to be able before Parliament reassembled to announce proposals to improve the condition of bluejackets.

The Times, Standard and Daily Mail criticise Mr. Churchill's speech on the lines of the arguments employed by the Conservative Members on the 22nd July debate. The Morning Post says the nation would have been pleased if Mr. Churchill had announced the laying down of a squadron of eight battleships corresponding to the cruisers in the Mediterranean. The Daily Chronicle welcomes the manifestations of Colonial aid, but says that relief from the burden can only be obtained by improvement in relation with Germany. The Times concludes its criticisms by pointing out that the debate is memorable for Mr. Asquith's recognition of the right of the dominions to be heard in determining Imperial policy, and says that Mr. Borden must have realised that the moral effect of his visit is already a considerable addition to the prestige of the Empire. The Daily Telegraph writes in wholehearted praise of Mr. Churchill. It says a new page was turned yesterday in the history of the Empire with the announcement of Canada's offer to share the burden and the right of the dominions to be called to the Councils of the Empire.

The Daily News asks if it is impossible to turn 'back on the fatal path of the Anglo-French and Anglo-Russian friendships. The supreme task of liberal government ought to be to secure Anglo-German friendship.

Mr. Borden, speaking at the banquet given by the London Chamber of Commerce, said:—"We have been received here in the most cordial spirits and I earnestly believe that some good has been effected by our mission. We return with a message of friendship and co-operation and the determination on the part of the people of the Motherland that they with the citizens of the Dominions are not afraid of the responsibilities of the Empire."

In the House of Lords on July 23rd Lord Selborne called attention to the gravity of the situation revealed in Mr. Churchill's statement on July 22nd with which he dealt in detail. His Lordship said that the Government's proposals, especially with regard to the Mediterranean, were mere temporary make-shifts, which proved conclusively that we were at least eight battle-ships short. He heartily endorsed Mr. Churchill's and Mr. Asquith's reference to the Dominions as marking an evolution in the history of the Empire.

Lord Crewe in reply admitted the gravity of the position and laid emphasis on the assurance that there were no divisions of opinion in the Cabinet on the subject. To announce a great programme, he said, would simply be to spur on others and thus defeat their own object. He welcomed the participation of the Dominions which, he said, must mean the representation of their interests in the Council of the Empire. Our best powers should be used to consider how best this might be achieved.

Lord Haldane agreed that in the absence of sufficient sea-power, the garrisons in the Mediterranean were ludicrously inadequate. With adequate sea-power, however, no attack on them could be sustained. So far as the position existed at present, he declared, we were giving the garrisons the protection of adequate sea-power. "I am far from wishing to speak in a tone of easy optimism," continued Lord Haldane, "on the contrary, the country is face to face with one of the most trying naval situations. The Government has made up its mind that Great Britain's position depends on her sea-power. We told the only Power that is our rival, in the friendliest fashion, that that was our view and that whatever efforts they put forth they must reckon on our making still greater efforts than theirs. We have said that we will do that not with any intention of aggression but because our sea-power is our life and that therein we intend to remain supreme. That is the view of the Government. That is the view to which we have pledged ourselves."

In the House of Commons on July 24th during the further debate on the Supplementary Naval Estimate, Mr. Churchill said it was incorrect to say that battleships were withdrawn from the Mediterranean because they were wanted in Home waters. They were withdrawn in the first place because they were useless where they were in the presence of the new ships of Austria and Italy, and, secondly, because their crews were wanted to man the more powerful ships of the King Edward class, which otherwise would have to be relegated to the reserve. Mr. Churchill denied that the transfer of the four battle-cruisers to Malta would reduce the fleet in the Home waters below what the Admiralty had hitherto considered the irreducible minimum. Mr. Churchill clearly intimated that if the naval strength of other Powers in the Mediterranean developed, we should increase our force, and, if necessary, create a Dreadnought battle-squadron there. Sufficient men would be available in 1915 to man three or four battle-ships above the fixed number. "We have the situation well in hand," said Mr. Churchill, "and there is no need for panic and alarm."

The House of Commons has adopted the supplementary naval estimates, rejecting a Radical motion for its reduction by 281 votes to 32.

Reuter wires from Paris:—The Matin affirms that Italy is about to lay down six super-dreadnoughts, the first two at the end of 1912, and Austria three. This is regarded as explaining Mr. Churchill's reference to a Mediterranean Power contemplating a considerable programme.

Home Rule.

In his speech at Dublin, 20th July, Mr. Asquith said:—The "Chaotic Opposition cannot wreck the Home Rule Bill, which will go to the Lords before Christmas whatever they do." They, however, could no longer override the judgment of the people. Home Rule was the first step in Imperial re-organisation, of which it was the only solution. He was in no way embarrassed by threats of civil war. He did not believe in the prospect thereof. The British people would not tolerate an attempt of the minority to frustrate the great international settlement in which Government had the sympathy of all the dominions.

Russo-Japanese Alliance.

REUTER wires from Tokio on 18th July:—The report published in the Times of 4th July of a Russo-Japanese Alliance is incorrect. There have been no negotiations for such a purpose and none are projected. Prince Katsura's tour is not connected with any specific political development. Most important notes, however, passed between the two capitals supplementing the agreements of 1907 and 1910, with the object of defining the respective spheres of interest of Russia in outer Mongolia and Northern Manchuria and Japan in inner Mongolia and southern Manchuria, inner Mongolia meaning that portion of Manchuria formerly so-called. The negotiations have resulted in the clearest understanding and the entente is of the greatest importance for the preservation of peace in the Far East, second only in importance to the Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

A message to the Times from St. Petersburg states that the Russo-Japanese Agreement includes the obligation for the joint defence of Manchuria and Mongolia in the event of either Power being attacked.

Sir Edward Grey replying to a question regarding the Russo-Japanese understanding relating to spheres of influence in Manchuria and Mongolia said, there was no reason to suppose that any agreement or understanding was contemplated which would adversely affect the principle of open door in regard to British commerce there. He drew attention to the Russo-Japanese Convention of 1907, recognising the independence and territorial integrity of China and the principle of equal opportunity in commerce and industry for all.

The Times expresses satisfaction that Japan and Russia have arrived at a mutually satisfactory agreement. "Britain," the journal continues, "is united to Russia by friendship, which is of the utmost importance for the balance of power in Europe and is united to Japan by an Alliance the value of which not only to ourselves and Japan but to China and the whole world has been amply demonstrated during the past nine months. Sir Edward Grey's recent tribute to the beneficent effect of the Alliance was in nowise exaggerated, and the conversation which Prince Katsura will have in St. Petersburg, London and elsewhere cannot fail to produce an even better understanding."

PRINCE KATSURA conferred for two hours on July 24th with M. Kokovtseff, Russian Minister, with regard to the position of Russia and Japan in Manchuria. It is stated that Russia is disinclined to enter into engagements which might conduce to complications with China. There will certainly be no written Treaty arrangement.

Afghanistan.

EARLY in this month a party of Mangals and Ghilzais, numbering with their families several thousand souls, crossed into the Kurram Valley from Khost. These tribesmen had been concerned in the recent rebellion and took refuge in British territory, when the rising collapsed. Their encampment was a large one and trouble might have arisen from their presence in the Borderland under the agreement between the British Government and the Kabul Durbar. Refugees or outlaws are allowed to remain in the vicinity of the frontier and the Political Agent at Kurram accordingly gave notice to these tribesmen that they must either return to their homes or submit to being disarmed and removed to a distance. A few days ago the whole encampment broke up and the party recrossed in Khost on the way to their own villages. They will probably not be molested by Afghan authorities.

The Kabul authorities have come to an arrangement with some of the principal traders in Eastern Afghanistan by which the Kafiristan route to Central Asia will be more extensively used. This route will be from Jellalabad through Asmar and over the Wanjan Pass to Badakhshan, whence some of the Kafilas will march north-west to Bokhara and others north-east to Awakhan and Kashgaria. Merchants in the Russian territory are said to have agreed to adopt this route when sending goods from the Khanates. This arrangement has been brought about as a result of the promise by the Amir's Government that armed escorts will be provided for all caravans.

China.

REUTER wires from Peking:—A fresh ministerial deadlock has occurred. The Assembly has vetoed all Yuanshikai's nominees to the Cabinet. The Premier alone remains, but he will resign immediately.

Private news received from Yunnan shows that the state of the province is still very unsatisfactory. There is laxity of control by the Republican authorities and a feeling of general insecurity prevails.

Tibet.

THE Times draws attention to the importance of Tibet's struggle for independence and considers that the restoration of Chinese authority is exceedingly, unlikely, in view of China's state of disorganisation and lack of money and men. The time is possibly approaching, the journal says, when Great Britain will have to reconsider her position with regard to Tibetan questions. The Chinese Government having been ousted from Tibet by the Tibetans themselves, may never again be in a position to act as an intermediary in British and Russian negotiations with Tibet, as provided by the Anglo-Russian Convention. Moreover, the Chinese have deliberately ignored the Anglo-Russian and the Anglo-Chinese Conventions. Britain, the journal concludes, does not seek a single inch of Tibet, but the cause of the unfortunate Tibetans struggling for freedom deserves our sympathy.

Egypt.

FURTHER discoveries have been made in Egypt in connection with the plot against Lord Kitchener. The Cairo correspondent of the Express says that the suspicions of the police were aroused by visits paid by a number of individuals to a newly-built house at Shubra, three miles to the north of Cairo. Two young men were surprised there on Monday night, but declared that they had met merely to discuss politics. When a search of the building was made, most compromising documents were found and the two men were arrested. Two other young men were also searched and arrested. Compromising papers were discovered in their possession. A police visit was then paid to the offices of the Nationalist newspaper El Lewa. This led to further arrests and to the seizure of sixty-four bags of papers. The disclosures made by the correspondence seized led the police to pay visits and to make searches in fifteen other houses in Cairo and the neighbourhood. Letters seized show that one conspirator had gone to Alexandria to prepare the assassination of the Premier, but, finding that he was being watched, he returned to Cairo, where he conferred with his fellow-conspirators. Detectives disguised as peasants were set to watch four other persons, (adds the Express correspondent). They followed them in a train to Shubra village. On alighting the men were overheard discussing the proposed assassination of Lord Kitchener, and three of them were arrested. The fourth escaped, but was captured later in the day at Berketelab. A photograph of one of the men under arrest was shown to Captain Fitzgerald, who is attached to Lord Kitchener, who at once recognised it as that of the man who had followed Lord Kitchener about on two recent occasions.

In connection with the plot for the assassination of the Khedive, the Premier, and Lord Kitchener, it has been ascertained that last month four men swore over the tomb of Wardani (executed for the assassination of a former Premier) that they would destroy the enemies of the Egyptian Nationalists. Three of them undertook to kill the Khedive, the Premier, and Lord Kitchener, and the fourth volunteered to take the place of any assassin who failed in his mission. Detectives shadowed the men and overheard the plot.

The Muslim University.

THE press communiqué that the scope of the University at Aligarh will be limited to the locality in which it may be established has created disappointment among Muhammadans at Lucknow and the feeling is growing that the Government should widen the scope of work of the Muslim University and the sphere of its control.

Public Service Commission.

It is understood that Lord Islington will be Chairman of the Royal Commission to enquire into the Public Services in India generally. He is resigning the Governorship of New Zealand for that purpose.

The Times on July 25th in a special article says that the Commission on the Indian Public Services will undoubtedly examine all the bearings of the question of the maintenance of a minimum of European officers in the higher posts. The journal adds that Indian politicians will press for its reduction, but the reasons advanced against this and the simultaneous examinations in 1893 and 1894 have not lost their force or cogency.

The following resolution was passed in the Council of the All-India Muslim League and wired to H. E. the Viceroy and the Secretary of State: "That the Council of the All-India Muslim League welcomes the proposal to appoint a Royal Commission on the Public Service of India, but respectfully urges upon Government the necessity of appointing at least one representative Mussalman on the Commission, having regard specially to the grievances which have been repeatedly expressed by them with reference to their lamentable position in the public services of India as a whole."

Aligarh College.

At a special meeting of the College trustees on July 21st, Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk's resignation in consideration of his illness and physical weakness was accepted with great regret. Haji Mohammed Ishaq Khan was unanimously elected Honorary Secretary for three years. Khan Bahadur Nawab M. Mozammel-ullah Khan will perform the duties of Honorary Secretary till H. M. Ishaq Khan Sahib is permitted by the Government to retire.

The "Burma Critic."

IN the defamation case of Mr. G. P. Andrew, Deputy Commissioner of Mergui vs. Channing Arnold, Editor of the Burma Critic, which was committed to the Chief Court Sessions, the Chief Judge has, on the perusal of the committal order, referred the case to a Full Bench which is to sit on July 31st to decide on the legality of the committal order.

The Hon. Mr. Gokhale.

AN Indian reception was held on July 19th in honour of Mr. Gokhale, who is now in London. Sir Mancherjee Bhownagree, presiding, announced that Mr. Gokhale was going to South Africa, where he hoped to discuss the affairs of Indians there with members of the Government.

Mr. Gokhale speaking at his reception said he never spoke with clearer vision of a bright future. Whatever interpretations were placed on paragraph 3 of the Government of India's despatch, they were determined to work for provincial autonomy. As the first stage of self-government, they must work for the diffusion of education among the masses.

The Late Khan Bahadur Shamsul Alam.

A Press communiqué issued by the Bengal Government states:—Khan Bahadur Shamsul Alam was murdered by an anarchist within the precincts of the High Court on 24th January 1910. He had served in the Police Department with credit and distinction for 34 years and his able, courageous and unsparing efforts in the detection and repression of anarchical crime had won for him the rank of Deputy Superintendent and the title of Khan Bahadur. Government announced immediately after the murder that arrangements would be made to confer a suitable grant of land on the widow and children and in the meantime a sum of money was handed over to them to provide for their immediate wants. The necessary formalities have now been completed and a Sanad has been presented to the widow conveying in perpetuity to her and to the male descendants in the male line of the late Khan Bahadur a jagir, the present rental of which is Rs. 5,373, comprising the villages of Chandabad alias Benipur, Mathuradanga alias Mathurapur Budhra and Satnakhi in thanas Asanpur and Nabagram in the district of Murshidabad. The jagir will be held revenue free during the lifetime of the widow and her eldest son, at half rates by the next holder and thereafter at full rates.

Calcutta Moslem Orphanage.

HER HIGHNESS the Begum of Bhopal has made a gracious response to the "Appeal" by the Calcutta Muhammadan Orphanage, which we noticed in our columns last week, by granting an annual donation of Rs. 1,200 to the Girls' section of the Orphanage. She has also been pleased to suggest practical improvements in the organisation of the institution, which are receiving the anxious consideration of the authorities.

TETE À TETE

THE Official Statement of the Progress of the Co-operative Credit Societies during the year 1910-11 has been on our table for some time. We regret that it is merely a mass of figures. We concede that in such a case as the demonstration of the progress of the co-operative movement in India statistics should speak more cogently than any self-applauding rhetoric. But the fact still remains that "the man in the street" has seldom the time and never the inclination to plunge into a mass of dry statistics and draw his conclusions therefrom. He generally prefers for his ready reference a brief authentic official account written in plain readable English of the work done in the year and the prospects of the future. The statement, however, as it is, is proof positive of the firm hold the co-operative credit movement has established over India. The figures published show that the almost phenomenal progress made in previous years is being steadily maintained. During the year under review the total number of the Societies increased from 3,497 to 5,432 and their working capital was almost doubled, swelling from approximately 126 lakhs to 207 lakhs. The business done by them was also invariably successful—there being a total profit of over 7 lakhs out of the total expenditure of 281 lakhs. The only case recorded of a loss being a deficit of Rs. 1,541 in the Central Societies of Burma; but this is quite insignificant in view of the fact that there had been an enormous expansion in the working capital of these banks from approximately 23,000 to 7,00,000 of rupees. This uniform success is an ample demonstration of the growing confidence of the Indian masses in the Co-operative Societies as well as of a better comprehension of their management and organisation. Another most interesting fact, which incidentally emphasises the essentially agricultural character of the Indian social organisation, is that while Central and Rural Societies are making giant strides in progress, the condition of the Urban Societies all over India has remained almost stationary. The number of the Central Societies has increased from 34 to 60 during the year 1910-11, their membership from 3,741 to 5,724 and their working capital from 24 to nearly 50 lakhs. The progress made by the Rural Societies is almost equally remarkable and is an eloquent comment on the rapid emancipation of the Indian agriculturist from his merciless bondage to the wily bania. The number of these societies increased from 3 to approximately 5 thousand and their working capital from 66½ lakhs to well over 1 crore. Taking the provinces separately, Madras is well ahead of them all in the progress shown by its co-operative societies. Its Central Societies with a working capital of 20 lakhs, have shown far the greatest progress in India, Punjab coming second with 7 lakhs, closely followed by Burma which, however, must soon come to the front rank if it at all sustains its almost incredible increase during the last year. In each of the two former provinces the capital has almost doubled and in the last it has been multiplied nearly 30 times. In the Rural section of the co-operative movement also Madras is second only to the Punjab. But here also the progress shown by Burma has been proportionately the greatest. For, where as the membership of the Rural Societies increased from approximately 37 to 60 thousand in Madras and from 22 to 34 thousand in the Punjab, and their working capital from 15½ to 24 lakhs in the former and from 15 to 29 lakhs in the latter province, the increase in Burma was from 6 thousand to more than 11 thousand in membership and from approximately 6 lakhs to 13 lakhs in capital. But none of the provinces except the United Provinces seem to have taken very kindly to Urban Societies. The total number of these Societies is 415 with a membership of 69,399 as compared to nearly 5 thousand Rural Societies with a membership of much more than 2 lakhs. Comparatively very little progress has been made by the Urban Societies during the year under review—there being an increase of barely 12 per cent.

It is a well-known fact that for a long time the majority of the High Courts of India did not have a single Muhammadan judge, although more than a dozen Indians sat on the Bench. The famous Simla Deputation of the Mussalmans of India urged, among other things, the appointment of

The Additional Judicial Commissioner of Oudh.

Muhammadans to such posts, and when the Government was brought to consider an important question it found no difficulty in selecting several qualified Muhammadan judges for the Indian High Courts. One of these was the Hon. Mr. Justice Syed Karamat Husain, who has just retired from the bench of the N. W. P. High Court, and last year the Hon. Mr. Mohamed Rafiq was also appointed an Additional Judicial Commissioner for the neighbouring territory of Oudh. On the retirement of the former, Mr. Rafiq naturally secured a seat on the bench of the Allahabad High Court, but there is some fear of the post he vacated being lost to the Mussalmans. We have never desired that unqualified Muhammadans should disgrace themselves and humiliate their community by being pitchforked into high appointments; but we have not yet solved the mystery of that soothing word, "efficiency," which in the dictionary of the "Nationalist" Press and a timorous Government generally means Hinduism. We have had a recent example of this in the appointment of Rai Bahadur Kanhaya Lal to officiate as Second Additional Judicial Commissioner of Oudh. We know nothing against the gentleman, and for all we know he may be fully qualified for the post which is now offered to him. But we also happen to know a good deal in favour of Nawab Mohamed Ishaq Khan and Mr. Syed Mohamed Ali who are Statutory Civilian and District Judges of the second grade and we have every reason to believe that these gentlemen are eminently qualified for the post that has now gone to an Assistant Judge in the Provincial Service. It is true that the Rai Bahadur has recently been officiating as a Judge, but the other two gentlemen are permanent judges and have done splendid work. We do not know why these judges drawing Rs. 1,000 more as permanent pay than the Rai Bahadur, have been passed over in his favour when a post carrying a permanent salary about six times the amount of the Rai Bahadur's salary falls vacant. Our only consolation is that this appointment is gazetted only until further orders. We trust that this is only due to the fact that it was not certain at the time whether Nawab Mohamed Ishaq Khan would retire or not. As he is bound to do so now after his recent election as Honorary Secretary of the Aligarh College, we hope that there will be no difficulty in the way of Mr. Syed Mohamed Ali, the grandson of the late Sir Syed Ahmed and one of the distinguished alumni of Aligarh. His record of service goes as far back as 1887, and for the last 13 years he has been working as District Judge. He has now very few years of active service before him, and if at this stage his claims are ignored, it is very unlikely that he would get another chance. We are confident that the Local Government would not be consciously unjust to him; but in these days nobody can guarantee the absence of an unconscious bias in favour of a community that knows how to force the hands of Imperial and Local Governments. We do not push forward the claims of Mr. Mohamed Ali as an individual. There are the interests of the community as well to consider, and when Muhammadans in his position are passed over in favour of their juniors, we do not know how to satisfy the Government that Muhammadans with proper qualifications are available for such appointments. Unfortunately, even conversion to Hinduism is not possible or some at least may try the expedient for a time.

We heartily endorse the lofty ideals which His Excellency Sir George Clarke set before the Bombay University "Living Universities". In the important communication which he has recently addressed to the Vice-Chancellor on the subject of the Government of India's recurring grant of Rs. 45,000 and a non-recurring grant of Rs. 3,00,000 to the Bombay University. The days of isolated colleges connected with the University only for purposes of examinations are over; and His Excellency rightly says that Indian colleges cannot any longer afford to maintain themselves as self-contained, separate teaching units. His Excellency broadly outlined reforms directed to secure corporate action among the colleges with a view to moving in the direction of wider and more vigorous life and the creating of an atmosphere in which culture and research in all the varied departments of human knowledge can grow and flourish, so that the colleges might become true centres of light and learning. These are lofty thoughts, happily expressed. But it remains to be seen how soon they will be followed by actual practice. The narrow scope of our colleges has long been a weak spot in the Indian educational system, and we strongly support His Excellency in his pioneer attempt "to move in that direction of a higher conception of the duties of a college," which, he said, did not by any means lapse after a student had graduated. We strongly recommend Sir G. Clarke's ideals for all India, and earnestly hope that the heads of other Provincial Administrations will not be long in emulating the Bombay Governor's solicitude for the improvement of higher education in India. We are glad to note that His Excellency suggests, what we have long desired, namely, the inviting of "brilliant European scholars of accepted authority" to come out and deliver courses of lectures during the cold weather. The Indian Educational Service has not been very often distinguished in the matter of great scholarship and research, although on the whole it is, perhaps, the best paid educational service in the world. It has been content with teaching college students as if they were school-boys and with complaining of the school teaching, for which, too, it is partly responsible, because it constitutes the top-heavy system of inspection in the Department of Public Instruction. Under these circumstances it is necessary to seek in Europe for scholars and researchists to lecture in our Universities and raise their standard of teaching. The cold-weather tourist in India has not often been as useful a person as the lecturers Sir George Clarke wishes to invite, and the new variety is bound to have the best effect both on India and on Europe. We hope this may result in temporary Professorships also, and we suggest that Oxford and Cambridge should be invited to lend at least their junior "dons" for terms of three years to Indian Universities. What University Extension could be more productive and what Imperialism more beneficial? In course of time, we trust this would lead to a larger number of the best teachers of England accepting permanent service in India. An Oxford "don," who gets no more than £200 a year, is at present generally dissuaded from coming to India on a salary rising from £400 a year, by annual increments of £40, to £1,000 at least, partly by the lack of good libraries, and laboratories, and partly by the absence of a society of equally learned colleagues. The cold-weather tourist lecturing in India and the temporary Professors would, to a great extent, remove the want of learned colleagues, and then it would be possible to obtain better educationists even at a cheaper cost. That would indeed be a unique success, for at present the benign Government knows only one method of making the White Man's Burden attractive to him in India, and that is an increase of pay. Who was it who talked of "a nation of shop-keepers?"

ELSEWHERE we publish a lucid exposition of some aspects of "The Indian Problem in South Africa," sent to us by Mr. Henry S. L. Polak, whose disinterested and indefatigable efforts in a righteous cause have earned for him the undying gratitude of the Indian people. Mr. Polak invites the attention of the Indian Mussalmans, in particular, to the insulting and iniquitous treatment which is being meted out to their co-religionists in the Transvaal. As we pointed out the other day, the Supreme Court of the Colony has recently decided that "plural marriages contracted in India under the personal law of Indians do not hold good in the Transvaal and that, if a Muhammadan Indian has his second wife there with him and desires to bring from India his first wife, he may not do so as she is a prohibited immigrant." Another magisterial decision goes still further and lays down that "even a first and only wife, married under a law permitting of polygamy, is a prohibited immigrant, as such marriage is invalid." These decisions open an altogether new phase in the process of political hectoring and moral iniquity with which the Afrikaner is bringing home to every Indian the reality of his status as citizen of the British Empire. It is laying up a legacy of bitterness, distress and resentment that would some day become an imperial danger of a far greater magnitude than the wit and mentality of the fashionable imperialist can compass to-day. The insolence of the spirit that exults in such peculiar acts of oppression against the Indian Moslems is equalled only by the indifference or the helplessness of the Imperial Government, which knows how to sulk behind the cant of non-interference in the affairs of a self-governing colony. What does the Empire exist for, if its statesmen are powerless to enforce elementary conditions of freedom and justice within its limits? No Indian can be expected to go into raptures over the imperial destiny of his race when he is treated no better than a pariah or a serf in an integral part of the Empire. To hold up one's hands in despair and dolefully speak of the problem as "unfortunate" does not lessen its gravity or make its edge less raspy to Indian sentiment. The British statesman who shirks it lightly or fails to realise its magnitude has but an imperfect notion of his responsibilities. We think it is time the Indian Government emerged from its attitude of passive resignation and regret to tackle the question with logical consistency and courage. The Afrikaner has no more consideration for the Indian "coolie" than he has for his pick-axe and his plough. Be it so. Let the Government of India, as a measure of self-protection, abolish the system of "indentured" slavery and prohibit the entry of the colonials into this country. The African trader or the civil servant in India should be made to feel that he is "an undesirable alien" whose presence in this country shall be tolerated only on the conditions that South Africa has imposed on the Indian settlers. This would, of course, be a measure of retaliation pure and simple, and we have yet to know of a better and surer method of achieving equality of treatment in international relations. They in Africa have industriously sown the wind, let their brethren in this country reap the whirlwind. We trust the Government of India is alive to its duty in this respect and is fully aware of the strength of Indian feeling on the subject. In regard to the particular decisions of the Transvaal courts affecting Moslem marriage laws, to which Mr. Polak calls pointed attention, we hope the Indian Mussalmans will lose no time in bringing their sense of the great wrong home to the Indian and the Imperial Governments. The matter should be taken up by the Moslem League and its branches throughout the country; and there should be no relaxation of organised efforts till the gross iniquity has been removed.

WE HAD occasion the other day to note the meagre results hitherto shown by the Prince of Wales School of Science at Aligarh and hoped that the Trustees of the College would institute a searching inquiry into the causes that led to such alarming inefficiency and waste. We trust the demand for inquiry will not be smothered by evasive apologies or killed by that most effective of weapons—silence. The Moslem public no less than ourselves must naturally be anxious to get from the custodians of the most important educational "trust" of the community an account of their stewardship. But while we wait with concern to know how they have been mismanaging the teaching of science at Aligarh, the recent publication of the Panjab University results discloses yet another disquieting state of affairs and deepens our concern still further in regard to Moslem education. The jurisdiction of the Panjab University, in addition to the State of Jammu and Kashmir, extends over three Provinces of north-western India, i.e., the Panjab, the N.W. Frontier Province and Baluchistan. Mussulmans dwell in large numbers in these extensive areas, their proportion in the total population being 54 per cent. in the Panjab, about 90 per cent. in the Frontier Province and Baluchistan and about 98 per cent. in Kashmir. The state of higher education amongst the Mussalmans of these provinces may best be judged from the figures recently published by the Panjab University. Out of the total number of 497 who passed the Intermediate Examination, the Mussalmans are 123. As regards the B.A., the number of the Moslem boys out of the 186 successful candidates is only 36! These results are startling no doubt, and, we must also plainly say, discreditable to those who profess to guide the educational affairs of the community. In this connection it would be instructive to note the performance of the Islamia College, Lahore, —another "white elephant" that costs the community over a lakh of rupees annually. This College contributes 23 to the pass total of the Moslem boys in F.A. and 7 in B.A.; while its general percentage in relation to the University results is the lowest! Here we have another subject for a thorough inquiry. We will deal with the general question of the organisation of Moslem education later on, but we must repeat what we have often said before that the future of the community depends on a right solution of this question. The educational needs of the Mussalmans are growing so various and urgent that they must naturally grudge every pie that is not well and usefully spent. The necessity to husband their very limited resources was never so pressing as it is to-day. Are the existing educational institutions, owned and controlled by Mussalmans, efficient and do they yield results commensurate with their expenditure? The soul of every successful undertaking, individual or corporate, is efficiency, i.e., a careful adaptation of means to ends. If the Moslem schools and colleges are merely costly luxuries, they might well be closed and the money, thus saved, applied more usefully.

AN ESTEEMED correspondent informs us that the Right Honourable

Red-Crescent and Red-Cross.

Mr. Amir Ali and His Highness the Aga Khan are between them maturing a plan for establishing the Red-Crescent Society as a permanent Islamic institution, and would address the International Tribunal at Hague to extend to it the same universal recognition which has been extended to the Red-Cross Societies of all Christendom. It seems to be incredible in this advanced age, but it is none the less true that the European Powers, for all their vaunted civilisation, can yet tolerate the monstrosity of a Christian State refusing to recognise an institution which only differs from their own Society in that it has got the word crescent and not cross in its name. We earnestly appeal to the Muhammadan community and to all lovers of justice all over the world to organise a powerful agitation with a view to bring pressure to bear on the International Tribunal at Hague. We confidently look to the All-India Moslem League and to all of its Provincial branches unanimously to pass resolutions, strongly supporting the two great leaders of the Indian Mussalmans in their selfless endeavours in the cause of Islam. A united agitation by the Indian Moslem community is bound to produce a great effect on the British Foreign Office, which would considerably strengthen the hands of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Amir Ali and H. H. the Aga Khan.

AFTER a long period of waiting it seems that, thanks to the energy of Sir Harcourt Butler, we are to have a fully manned Sanitary Department. It is hoped that, apart from the executive appointments which would necessarily go to Indians, some of the administrative posts also should go to them. An Indian is not always likely to be as firm an officer in condemning insanitary localities as a European, but he is far more likely to be able to persuade the people responsible for such insanitary conditions, to alter them. In other words, he may not have such a passion for sanitation as a European, but he is more likely to effect improvements smoothly. The "experts" are a great force in this country, and woe betide the man who does not fall down and worship them. But "experts" have a tendency to divorce practical methods from theoretical pronouncements, and even at best their injunctions remain counsels of perfection possible to be acted upon only in another and more sanitary world, where presumably the need of the "expert" ceases to exist. But it is not always that expert injunctions stop here, having more than once been known to result in breaches of the peace and even riots of large dimensions. The earlier days of plague in Bombay and in the United Provinces bear testimony to the theoretical zeal of the "experts." There is, however, another aspect of the question. The European experts do not know what goes on within the four walls of Indian houses, and only an Indian is capable of discovering every insanitary nook and corner. We, therefore, hope that the posts of Deputy Sanitary Commissioners would practically be reserved for qualified Indians. We find that two such posts have already been given to Drs. Nehru and Panday in the United Provinces, and a Behar contemporary suggests, among others, the name of Dr. Varis, M.D., who is a well-known Behari practitioner of Lucknow and was Plague Medical Officer of the United provinces. We hope a man of Dr. Varis's qualifications would be induced to accept such a post in the interests of sanitation in his own Province. The new province is by no means in a very healthy condition, and some sacrifices must be made by all Beharis to build up various services of Behar.

WE have read with interest an article in the Indian Review on the new "library" gospel, which seems to have emanated from America and according to which public libraries form an integral part of public education. We must say that we are absolutely at one with the writer in his enthusiastic praise of the American system of throwing open the portals of public libraries, not only to chosen scholars and research workers, but to all alike, "thus stimulating the enquiring spirit and broadening the minds of the common people." We received from a correspondent the other day the report of a meeting held recently at Baroda "in order to form a Library Club on the lines of the library associations and clubs of America." We quite agree with our correspondent, that it is quite in the fitness of things that in this as in many other matters Baroda should be the first State in India to strike out a new line of departure. "In fact, it is a most natural and necessary corollary of that system of compulsory education" which we have always held up as a sound model for the British Government to follow. "The whole work of a public library, whether recreational or educational," continues our correspondent "should be of a social nature; and hence by various methods of work—e.g., by finding a reader for every book on its shelves and a book for every reader in the community, by popularising high-class literature—the libraries should co-operate with the educational and religious institutions as a triangular base of intellectual and moral progress." We heartily endorse every word of this view of the goal which public libraries should have in view, and we cannot too highly applaud the generosity and foresight of the Maharaja and his intense enthusiasm for the education of the masses of his subjects in establishing the Library Club. We wish the Club—which has been regularly formed—every success, and we sincerely hope that other Native States and the Indian Government will not be unnecessarily tardy in taking up for their own emulation a model so indisputably sound, and of such high public usefulness. We are quite certain that active steps in this direction might very profitably be taken at once, and that the authorities need not wait to "make it a corollary" to the passing of Mr. Gokhale's Bill into law.

EVEN after our repeated requests formal applications for the Hamdard Debentures have not been sent in by some of the gentlemen who had intimated their intention of purchasing certain number of Debentures long ago. We have had to bear all this time the extra expense of issuing reminders every now and then, but it would appear that some of the intending subscribers of February and March have no intention of making good their informal promises. Under the circumstances we cannot leave matters to hang on indefinitely; and we have decided to wait till the 10th of August, after which we will strike off the names of those whose formal applications have not reached us. We hope those who really intend to subscribe but have been delayed in sending in their applications by some chance or other will now take the trouble to do so before the expiry of the date we have been obliged to fix.

The Comrade.

The Situation in Turkey.

II.

GHAZI AHMED MUKHTAR PASHA, the new Grand Vizier, has formed his Cabinet, and the ministerial crisis is for the time being at an end. The most important feature of the new Ministry is, we need hardly say, the character of its personnel. With Kiamil Pasha as President of the Council of State, Nazim Pasha as Minister of War, and Husain Hilmi Pasha as Minister of the Interior, an essentially new set of ideals and methods will probably be applied to the governance of the Empire in its home and foreign affairs. The new statesmen differ from their predecessors in office in every cardinal conception of politics, in temperament, in outlook, in the spirit and principles of a coherent national policy. They formed their notions of statecraft in the School of Midhat: an echo of the Manchester Liberalism of the mid-Victorian era, with its vague humanitarianism, its dogmatism, its doctrinaire economics and its infatuation of the French revolutionary doctrines. They are old veterans no doubt, trained in affairs and fully competent to deal with large and complicated issues of empire. But the situation that confronts the Turkish Government to-day, both at home and abroad, derives its gravity from problems of a new texture and new factors of international politics. Democracy has ceased to be a fetish in its old cradle in Western Europe. The driving forces behind international affairs are new and make the few survivors of orthodox Liberalism gape in helpless wonder. The new currents of diplomacy and aggressive imperialism that cosmopolitan finance has let loose have swept crashing through the old-world fabric, leaving behind tottering creeds and deserted temples. "The shattering, destroying, over-whelming force," which swam into Mr. Churchill's ken as the supreme measure of national existence, has altered the character and the scale of the welt-politic. Such is the political climate of Europe, and the task of Turkish statesmanship is to make the State organism fit for vigorous life in the new environment. It is from the pressure of the new atmospheric conditions, so to speak, that the internal and external problems of Turkey have acquired their present proportion and character. The race of younger statesmen, whose aims and ideals have found expression through the programme of the Committee of Union and Progress, have on the whole a truer perspective of things. They have an unerring instinct for reality and a just sense of the needs of the Empire, though they may have the impatience of idealism and blundered through inexperience. But the new Ministers of the stamp of Kiamil Pasha, with all their experience of affairs, prestige and undoubted patriotism, have the immobility of age and the unconscious bias of an old-fashioned liberalism. Whether the old formulas can fit in with new facts may well be questioned.

The announcement of the new policy for Albania has about it an unfortunate ring of the melodrama. It tears to shreds with a flourish of trumpets the scheme of pacification elaborated by Hadji Adil Bey with immense labour and skill, which had met with warm approval everywhere throughout Europe and had barely yet been put to execution. We hope the surrender of the Prishtina garrison is not the first fruit of the new policy. We would not be surprised if it were, for peace at any price will never be purchased till Albania and Macedonia have got their autonomy and the Turk has departed bag and baggage from Europe. The attitude of the new Ministry towards Albania explains its fundamental difference of policy from Said Pasha's Cabinet. To make this difference clear and realise the magnitude of its effect on other grave issues in the Ottoman affairs, it would be necessary to briefly set forth the rival programmes in their main outlines and weigh their relative fitness and importance with reference to the realities of the situation. It must, however, be remembered that rival political organisations based on differences of policy and principle can scarcely yet be said to exist in Turkey. The Committee of Union and Progress is the only political body with definite aims and purpose that has so far presented the nation with a constructive platform. The so-called Union and Liberty politician is often a disappointed place-hunter or, at best, a visionary whose miscellaneous stock of good intentions has not yet crystallised into a practicable programme. The only reasoned departure from the Unionist principles exists in the ideas of a few statesmen of the old generation of liberals, who dreamed of French and English institutions while they served the despotism and caprice of Abdul Hamid. The Committee of Union and Progress has drawn almost every thinker, dreamer and patriot of the younger generation into its ranks. It represents on that account the most virile, purposeful, organised and inspiring body of opinion in Ottoman affairs.

The main planks in the programme of the Committee of Union and Progress are found in its name, i.e., the Ottomanisation of the various races inhabiting the Empire and the development of its internal resources. But before any progress could be made in these directions, it was necessary to keep the Empire immune from foreign aggressions. No internal progress could be worth an hour's purchase as long as the threat of a Russian or an Austrian invasion or the danger of Balkan complications weighed on the consciousness of Turkish statesmen. The supreme need of the Empire was, therefore, to organise its defences, to create an efficient army and navy that would free it from all possible dangers on its extensive frontiers and preserve its integrity and independence. The Committee had no great love for diplomatic finesse, but it believed in self-help and that defensive strength without which no nation can hope to be heard with respect in the counsels of Europe. Within the short space of four years it has created one of the best armies in the world; while the development of the Turkish navy—a far more expensive and laborious undertaking—was being pushed on with vigour before the Italian descent on Tripoli came to interrupt the work in that direction. The next most important need of the situation was the organisation of the finances of the Empire. The growth and spread of education, administrative reforms and the extensive schemes of irrigation, railways and other public works depend entirely on the financial prosperity of the country. The Committee statesmen consequently set themselves to evolve order out of the financial chaos, overhaul the whole Finance Department and introduce root and branch reforms in the incidence of taxation and the methods of collecting it. The revenues of the Empire have increased by one third within the last four years. Defensive strength and prosperous finance are the fundamental conditions of internal development. And, though every Chauvinist in Europe accused the Committee of Chauvinism, only the true Ottoman patriot can rightly estimate the great service it has rendered to the Empire. The problem of national unification is perhaps the most difficult with which Turkey has got to deal. Even if there were no Greeks, Bulgars, Serbs and Albanian Christians, the breath of whose nostrils is treason, the task would still have been a heavy charge on Turkish statesmanship. As it is, the problem of creating a unified national spirit and identity of aims and aspirations amongst the various races of the Empire is perhaps the most stupendous that any country has had to solve. There are only two courses open to the Turkish statesmen. Either Albania and Macedonia should be given complete autonomy, or the central authority of the Sublime Porte should be retained intact, the provinces being given limited powers of initiative in administrative matters with a view to conciliate reasonable local traditions and customs. In the former case, the Turks would have to give up the sponge after more than three hundred years and withdraw to Asia Minor, for the myth of suzerainty would not be worth the paper on which it might be written. In the latter case they would have to face a formidable campaign of intrigue and spasmodic insurrection, but may certainly overcome it by dint of perseverance, patience and courage and retain their hold on the European provinces of the Empire. The choice has long been as clear as the issues it involves. Those who think a middle course to be possible have yet to learn their alphabet of the Balkan politics. As long as the Bulgar dreams of another "Tsardom" in the Near East, the Serf of his mythical kings, the Albanian wants to retire within his shell and the Greek waits in devout self-forgetfulness for the advent of the empire of Constantine, autonomy for Macedonia and Albania would mean the end of the Ottoman Empire in Europe. The analogies from the European systems with which the Turks have been pestered for upwards of fifty years, are perpetrated by those who know enough history to mislead the world, or, more probably, are calculated efforts to frighten the Turks into surrender by the glib use of portentous formulas. The German system or the British Empire are held together by the strong forces of common culture, common religion, common aims and common blood. And even in their case it was after strong central authority had done its work and evolved ultimate unity of purpose that the stage of federalism was reached and the parts were allowed to individualise. Indeed, the complete identity of ultimate interests is a condition precedent to any devolution of power. The interests of the Christian races in European Turkey are avowedly and openly hostile to those of the ruling race. The talk of autonomy in this case is but a plain hint to the Turks to quit.

The Committee of Union and Progress has weighed the issues and taken its choice. It has resolved to keep intact at any cost the Ottoman Empire in Europe. Therefore the only course open to the Unionist statesmen has been to impress upon the Bulgar, the Serb and the Albanian that the Empire shall be held together, that they shall have to live as peaceful and loyal citizens, sharing in equal measure, its duties as well its rights. It was on this principle that the policy of Said Pasha's Cabinet was based. Hadji Adil Bey framed his tolerant and liberal measures for pacification within the limits of this principle. Mahmoud Shevket Pasha took the necessary steps to maintain order and put down disturbances with this aim in view. The disturbances themselves have been artificially created by foreign intrigues. Yet the outcry engineered in the foreign press that ruthless military repression was being applied to a people groaning under the weight of oppressive wrongs, found its echo in Constantinople. Meantime the mutiny broke out at Monastir, which appears to have been principally due to the discontent of certain officers who felt aggrieved in the matter of promotion and accused Mahmoud Shevket Pasha of favouritism. The "Military League" sprang into existence through the secret manipulations of the Albanian ex-deputies; and it framed its demands with an utter disregard of the Constitution. It was the first time in Ottoman history that the Sultan himself had to remind the representatives of the army what they owed to the nation and the Empire. Perhaps the significance of this reminder will not be lost on the ardent spirits who are blindly dancing to the tunes of a few self-seeking demagogues in their midst. We do not know if the position of the old Cabinet became utterly untenable after the monastir outbreak, but its resignation has thrown the Unionists, at any rate, for the time being into the background. The new Ministry has begun its career by a sudden, complete and almost ostentatious reversal of policy. Albania is to be pacified by entreaties and exhortations. Perhaps some scheme of devolution in provincial administration may follow on the heels of the announcement. Our only hope is that it may not re-echo throughout the length and breadth of the Empire and call forth all the parochial instincts and passions that yet await formulation. The dream of an Arab Empire with Cairo as its centre is known to have some fascination for certain chancellories in Europe; and though the best elements amongst the Arab population in Egypt, Syria and Arabia repudiate all such ideas with scorn, it must be confessed that Syed Idrises are not wholly wanting amongst them, nor are the Italian methods a special prerogative of Italy. Unification of the Empire is its first and its greatest need; and it should not be sacrificed to clamour and opportunism. We have nothing but the greatest admiration for some of the individual members of the Cabinet. The Grand Vizier is a military veteran with liberal ideas, devoted patriotism and a genuine desire for the strength and greatness of his country. Kiamil Pasha is one of the most experienced statesmen in modern Turkey, has a wide grasp of foreign affairs and commands great respect abroad. Nazim Pasha is one of the best Turkish generals, a strong administrator and sincere patriot. Husain Hilmi Pasha is one of the greatest administrators in the Empire. But their policy in internal affairs seems to be venturesome, if not decidedly dangerous, and it remains to be seen if it would be successful.

In foreign affairs, too, the policy of the new Cabinet is bound to undergo a change. The Unionist statesmen have not yet evolved any definite principles for the foreign policy of the Empire. They have been walking through the devious paths of European diplomacy by faith rather than by sight. They first leant on British friendship, but the grandmotherly tone of the British Press eventually drove them into the orbit of Germany. The Italian raid gave them the measure of German friendship; and since then the pendulum has again been swinging in the opposite direction. They have been learning through misadventure and picking up their threads of knowledge by sad experience. They were just beginning to emerge out of the opportunism of their early days and evolve certain well-defined aims in foreign affairs in accordance with the needs, the risks and the opportunities of the Empire. The new Ministry will have the advantage over the old in that it contains many veterans of affairs who are bound to pursue a definite foreign policy. With Kiamil Pasha and Husain Hilmi Pasha in the Cabinet, it may confidently be assumed that the keynote of its policy will be a conscious effort to bring about an Anglo-Turkish entente if not an alliance. Such an arrangement will, we are sure, be to the mutual advantage of both, for there are many points of contact between Turkish and British interests and very few of conflict. There is, however, one question that is bound to be dealt with in a more or less decisive way, if the relations between the two countries begin to move in the direction of a mutual understanding. We mean the anomalous position of Egypt. There have been persistent rumours in well-informed quarters that British policy has recently been busy creating a favourable situation for the formal annexation of the country. The conjuncture of events like the Italian raid, the appointment of Lord Kitchener, his forcing of neutrality on Egypt and the deliberate rigour with which he applied it against the Turks, lend weight to these rumours. Kiamil Pasha, too, has been credited by some to view the surrender of Egypt with no great dislike. Be that as it may, we trust British friendship will not be bought by the present Ministry by the surrender of Egypt. No friendship, however precious and desirable, can be worth buying at such a price. Leaving every other consideration aside, it would be a supreme act of treachery to the Egyptian people, and we presume no Turkish Government can afford to lose the sympathies of the Egyptians, the Syrians and the Arabs at this stage of the Empire's history.

The attitude of the new Ministry to the war will, we have every reason to think, be practically the same as that of its predecessor. The most prominent of the new Ministers have already expressed their opinion about the issues involved in the struggle and the unalterable resolve of the Ottoman nation to fight those issues to the finish. Kiamil Pasha had hit off the Italian parliamentary farce superbly when he said that "the decree of annexation was quite worthy of the nation, which had produced so much comic opera." We have already dealt in our previous article with the several factors that have emerged on the scene and discussed their bearing on the course of the war. We had said that the danger of European intervention was daily growing imminent, that Italy's one chance lay in that direction, that without the possibilities of new complications and developments in the Balkans Turkey can have little anxiety about the military issue in Tripoli. If it could be possible to bind down Europe to an absolute pledge of non-intervention, the question will simply become one of comparative financial stability of the combatants. Manifestly the drain on Italian resources is enormous and it cannot continue at the present rate for another year without completely exhausting the country. That contingency Italy is trying to avoid by means of a desperate and unscrupulous diplomacy. The chances, therefore, of new complications arising out of the situation and making the intervention of the Powers inevitable are numerous and great. Dr. Dillon, whose remarkably lucid and thoughtful articles on the chances of peace we reproduce in full, thinks that financial exhaustion will eventually determine the issue, provided there is no change in the diplomatic situation. The proviso admittedly takes note of a contingency that is in our opinion most likely to happen. We trust the new Ministry will carefully take stock of the forces that Italy has been manœuvring into the field of diplomacy and will carefully provide for all emergencies. By a peace treaty affecting her sovereign rights in Tripoli, Turkey has nothing to gain and everything to lose. Even if the Sublime Porte signed away the vilayets of Tripoli and Cyrenaica in a mood of impatience or fear it would make no difference in the military situation. We publish elsewhere an account of the Arab conference in Tripoli which would give some insight into the firm resolve that fires the gallant defenders of the land. No Turkish Government can afford to forfeit Arab loyalty and the sympathy of the Islamic world by hastening to accept any terms of peace that would be damaging to the prestige of the Empire, humiliating to Islam and would hand over a Moslem land with its people in perpetual bondage to its enemies.

Politics and History.

LORD MORLEY in his address as Chancellor of the Manchester University, delivered to a University audience on 28th June, took as his text the familiar theme of the scope and purpose of practical politics in relation to history. But, though the subject has been worn threadbare by discussion, it never fails to become a source of inexhaustible freshness and interest in the hands of a master. Lord Morley has in an ample measure the gift of making the commonplace bright and significant. He has all the moderation, the breadth of vision, the philosophical temperament and the fine literary expression which rescue any subject from the blight of triviality and invest it with life and meaning. Every word that he utters is pregnant and alive, the sentences that issue from the mint of his brain attain a universal currency as standard coin. They are the fruits of ripe and mellow thought.

The address that he delivered to the Manchester audience is a profound study of the modern tendencies in politics in the light of history and experience. The modern age is in that fluid stage which precedes every reconstruction in thought, politics, in the aims and purposes of social union. The period is full of anxiety, doubts and misgivings. As he says, any reflective observer can sketch the signs of the times in rather formidable outline. Political power is described as lying in the hands of a vast and mobile electorate with scanty regard for tradition and history. Democracy is going to write its own programme. The structure of executive organs is undergoing a change. To some, there is apparent a difference of attitude towards law as law, a decline in reverence for institution as institution. Old ideas and words are losing their significance, "yet we are apt to go on with our manful battles as if the flags and banners and vehement catchwords all stood for old causes. While intent, and with good reason, on the topics of the time—on strikes, aeroplanes, the gold reserve, the price of Consols, China, Persia, Mesopotamian railways—is it possible that we are somnambulists, only half awake to strong currents racing in full blast over our heads and under the ground at our feet, and sweeping through the world of white men, black men, brown men, yellow men?" The spirit of change that is coming over old formulas and battle cries and old conceptions of social and political well-being should not, however, be allowed to paralyse us with terror or puff us with undue elation. When new social ideas are slowly taking possession of a people, then is the time for all of us to remember the spirit of this passage from Spinoza:—"When I applied my mind to politics with the same precision of mind as we use for mathematics, I have taken my best pains not to laugh at the actions of mankind, not to grieve over them, not to be angry with them, but to understand them."

The present is an era of intellectual unrest, of deep questioning into the truth and purpose of institutions, laws, ideals, political and religious creeds. This critical temper, much sharpened by the discoveries of biology and cognate sciences, got its initial impulse from the ideas of the French Revolution. Rousseau, who began his "Social Contract" by proclaiming that "man is born free and everywhere he is in chains," summed up in a trumpet-call of revolt all the passions born of social misery and political injustice. "A score of books in political literature are acts, not books." With "Social Contract" the storm of the world-battle opened. It reached not politics only, but philosophy, art, letters, churches, education; for what strikes deep in politics, strikes deep all round. History on one side, Law of Nature and Rights of Man on the other. It is easy enough for a latter-day critic to riddle the book with "shot and shell of logic, doctrine, figures, history"; but the influence of a book of this nature depends on its fitness for occasion as occasions emerge. "It is not abstract or absolute strength in argument or conclusion, but the fact, half-accident, of its happening to supply an impressive, persuasive, exciting attack or defence, or some set of formulae that the passion, need, or curiosity of the hour demands." There can, however, be no doubt that many of the visions of the French Revolution have proved will o' the wisps. Wrong, oppression, misery still abound in a world where the absolute equality of democratic rights is as yet an aspiration. The Rights of Man have been effectively questioned and much ridicule has been poured by some modern thinkers on the assumption that sovereignty resides in the will of the people. People's will may be directed to wrong-doing, inspired by prejudices, ignorance, wild and wicked passions. The evolutionary sciences have added powerful streams of thought and feeling to human knowledge and political power is beginning to be wielded with new motives for new ends.

Still, however, history is one, long, continuous unfolding of the story of man. There are no periods, no pauses, no complete, rounded off happenings, beginning and ending by themselves. Is it possible to construct a science of human society in the light and with the guidance of past human experience? A race of "Sociologists" has come into existence in the wake of the great biological discoveries of the nineteenth century. Human personality is, however, a disturbing factor and it is doubtful if ever it will become susceptible of a complete analysis. As long as personality remains an incommensurable thing, elusive, dynamic, almost miraculous in its manifestations, the "laws" governing social development will remain as so many guesses. Much of the confusion of modern political thinking is due to the efforts of the politician to measure social and political phenomena in terms of biology. As Lord Morley observes, he may "borrow phrases from the biologist, and talk of embryos, germs, organisms, but surely those are right who insist that we have not come near to the definite erection of an inductive political science." That is, however, no reason why the politician should not reason, or the historian should not explore, with the methodical energy, caution, conscience, candour and determined love of truth that marked Darwin and the heroes of the natural sciences. The continuity of history is a truism which, nevertheless, often requires reiteration. The scientific enthusiast in search of "principles" is in the habit of isolating social phenomena for study, and is sometimes apt to forget that the roots of history reach back to the beginning of things and the chain of cause and effect stretches forth into infinity. "History never does stop short," says Lord Morley, "If you are of the school that insists on the event being its own justification, on fact and reason being the same thing, on the real and the rational being identical, on force and right being all one, at least be sure that you have the fact in full and the event in all its dimensions and its duration."

To practical statesmen concerned with immediate problems and questions of the hour historical parallels are a snare, because they are so convenient and make people feel sure of their ground. But, in spite of all that is said about the unity of history and the identity in the elements of human nature, the general body of a political case is never exactly the same. Machiavelli thought that the revolution of the wheel of human fortune brought past situations back to new points. A wiser school insist that history never repeats itself. It was perhaps Lord Acton who once said that in contemporary problems he saw old friends with new faces. Had he probed a little deeper he would have perhaps found new hearts, new minds and new blood coursing through the veins. After all, history in the making is a fresh chapter added to the story of man in which the characters play their part with courage and deliberation, or become a mere sport of blind forces they are unable to control and pass into silence. Lord Morley makes a pregnant observation on the subject:—

According to some scientific historians with a right to speak, history does not solve questions; it teaches us to examine. After a life of labour in examination, a great event, they say, is seldom fully understood by those who worked for it. Our vision is surer about the past; there we have the whole; we see the beginning and the end; we distinguish essential from accessory. To contemporaries events are confused, obscured by passing accidents, mixed with all sorts of foreign elements. Both contemporaries and historians, more often than they suppose, miss a vital point, because they do not know that intuitive instinct which often goes further in the statesman's mind than deliberate analysis in argument. A visitor of Bismarck's once reminded him that Schopenhauer used to sit with him at dinner every day in the hotel at Frankfurt. "I had no business with him, I had neither time nor inclination for philosophy," said Bismarck, "and I know nothing of Schopenhauer's system." It was summarily explained to him as vesting the primacy of the will in self-consciousness. "I daresay that may be all right," he said, "for myself, at least, I have often noticed that my will had decided before my thinking was finished." Improvisation has more to do in politics than people think.

Is there any guiding thread in history? Are the movements of the world onward? asks Lord Morley. And he seems to hesitate before formulating a definite answer. "History in the great conceptive of it has often been compared to a mountain chain seen far off in a clear sky, where the peaks seem linked to one another, towards the higher crest of the group." Many people treat progress as if it were like the law of gravitation in the world of matter. We know more about nature in the world of matter, have more power over its energies; human race has multiplied; life is longer, vigour and endurance have waxed. But only a fraction of mankind has access to higher standards of comfort and well-being. "If an angel of the Lord," says Mommsen, "were to strike the balance whether the domain ruled by Severus Antonius was governed with the greater intelligence and the greater humanity then or now, whether civilisation and general prosperity have since then advanced or retrograded, it is very doubtful whether the decision would favour the present." New ideas, manners, customs, institutions follow one on the heels of the other in quick succession, and one is apt to lose sight of the few things that seem immutable and may endure for immeasurable time. Lord Morley sums up similar reflections in a characteristic passage:—

After all, it is well to measure the procession of changes that have marked culture, civilisation, and the modern world, against some stupendous fixities of human things. If we think, for example, of all that language means, of the unplumbed depths of mortal thought, mood, aim, appetite, right, duty, kindness, savagery, and yet how stable language is amidst the vortex and how immutably the tongues of leading stocks in the world seem to have struck their roots. And in the four great faiths—Christianism, Judaism, Islam, Buddha—in spite of reformation, counter-reformation, internecine conflict within, displacements by fire and sword from without, yet how steadfastly the name, the rites, the practices, and traditions persist.

After giving a gentle hint to the ardent spirits, who are always ready to substitute aspiration and enthusiasm for reason, to cultivate a sense of proportion, Lord Morley winds up the theme with an earnest plea for clear thinking, deep study and sound reasoning, in short, all such habits of mind which lead to the formation of sound opinion. If democracy—popularly called government working through public opinion—is to be successful in the heavy tasks awaiting it in the present and the future, it must be endowed with trained habits of mind:—

The star of strength and greatness rises or sinks in a State according to the proportions in its numbers of men and women with courage, energy, will, and open, supple, teachable intelligence; and then, besides, on their power of making their qualities effectively felt. If we are in Carlyle's genial phrase so many millions mostly fools, and if those who are not fools are but as dumb dogs, then the case is desperate. But before losing heart, let us be sure that our political arithmetic and algebra are right.

The Indian Problem in South Africa.

(By MR. HENRY S. L. POLAK.)

It becomes increasingly important that Indians, regardless of sect or province, should study most carefully the problem presented by the condition of their brethren overseas, for, apart from the fact that, almost daily, it becomes worse, that problem is one most nearly touching the national amour propre. That being admitted, perhaps no section of the Indian people could have a greater interest in the problem, as it reveals itself in South Africa, than the followers of Islam. Apart from the fact that the bulk of the larger business interests of the South African Indian community are in the hands of Mussulmans, there exists specific anti-Mussulman legislation in at least one province of the Union, which, too, has recently had the unique distinction of holding Islam up to public opprobrium in the Courts of Justice. For these, among other reasons, I am anxious to appeal to Mussulman India for something more effective than lip-symmetry and platonic interest.

There is, in South Africa, an Indian population of nearly 1½ lakh of which the greater proportion is composed of Indians of the labouring classes, mostly from the Madras Presidency, but amongst whom are to be found an appreciable number of Mussulmans from Eastern Bengal, Behar and the United Provinces. Their fate under Indenture has been so eloquently described by the Hon. Mr. Gokhale in the Imperial Legislative Council, last March, that any additional words from me will savour of supererogation. When the contracts have expired, the labourers have three choices open to them. They may avail themselves of their right to a free return passage to India; but as their average savings after five years are extremely small—something like Rs. 137, most of them are unwilling or unable to return. The second alternative is that they may re-indenture; but the Indian public will readily realise that this choice, if availed of, must normally be more or less a matter of economic compulsion. Lastly, they may remain free in Natal, though, under the existing law of the province, they will not be allowed to acquire statutory domicile there until the expiry of another three years after the conclusion of their contracts. In Natal alone amongst territories flying the British flag, freedom has its monetary value, for the law provides that an indentured Indian who does not return to India immediately upon the termination of his indenture, or who fails at once to re-indenture himself, is permitted to breathe the free air of Natal, if a male over 16 years, and if a female over 13 years, at an annual cost of Rs. 45. The effect of the imposition of this iniquitous tax upon the poverty of the poor is that hundreds of women have been driven to sell their virtue, whilst men have been driven to crime or to desertion of their families. Failure to pay the tax, which falls due immediately the contract has expired, involves the debtor in liability to imprisonment with hard labour. The result of all this is that the self-owners of Natal have been able to congratulate themselves and the public upon the fact that, today, only 6 per cent. of the time expired labourers can afford the privilege of freedom, the remaining 94 per cent., almost in equal moieties, being obliged to re-indenture or to return to India in a destitute condition.

The trading section of the community have also deep cause for complaint. Before a man may open a store or even hawk goods, he has to obtain a licence, and his application must be made to an official, known as the licensing officer, who is the servant of a municipality or board, on which Indians are unrepresented, and whose members are mostly the Indian's trade rivals. Knowing his employer's policy, he makes a practice of refusing licences to Indians, whilst granting them to others. Appeal to the supreme court against such flagrant injustice lies only where the re-issue of a current licence is refused. There is no appeal against the refusal of a transfer or of a new licence, and even colonial born Indians have the utmost difficulty in procuring a licence. Much the same conditions obtain in Cape Colony. In the Orange Free State there is practically no Indian population.

The Transvaal has always been the worst offender against Indians generally and Muhammadans in particular. In 1885, on alleged grounds of sanitary requirements, a law was passed against "the native races of Asia, including the so-called coolies, Arabs, Malays, and Muhammadan subjects of the Turkish Dominion." The "coolies" were, of course, the Indians. The "Arabs" were the Muhammadan Indian traders. The "Malays" were the half-caste descendants of the old Malay slaves. The Turkish Muhammadans included, as the law has since been interpreted, Turks born in Europe. All these people were denied every franchise and the direct ownership of landed property. They were required to register if entering the Republic for purposes of trade, and were required, for sanitary reasons, to reside in insanitary locations. The policy of the Boer Government has been followed and developed by the succeeding British Administration. In 1907 a new Registration law was passed, repealing the above offensive definitions. In the same year an immigration law was passed, absolutely excluding all Asiatic immigration. The most distinguished Indians, such as the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali, the Hon. Sved Ali Imam and the Hon. Mr. Mirza Abbas Ali Bag, were prohibited immigrants, and it was against this offensive racial and religious discrimination that the passive resistance struggle was directed that entailed so much intense hardship upon the Indian community and eventually resulted in the success of the movement last year, culminating in the provisional settlement, whereby it was agreed to introduce legislation repealing the Act of 1907 and removing the statutory racial bar as to immigration. Those who realise the strength of the forces arrayed against the Indians will realise the magnitude of this moral and material victory. The promised legislation, though introduced this year, has not passed, for a variety of reasons, but the Government are under promise to re-introduce it next year.

But the Transvaal Indians are labouring under many other grievances. Their future is most precarious as their very rights of residence are threatened under the Gold Law. Their right of indirect ownership of land (i.e., through a European nominee) has been taken away by regulation issued (it is believed, unlawfully) under the Township Acts. They still have no franchise and have restricted rights of locomotion. And now the Supreme Court has delivered a judgment that has come as a thunderbolt to the community. It has decided that plural marriages contracted in India under the personal law of Indians do not hold good in the Transvaal, and that, if a Muhammadan Indian has his second wife there with him and desires to bring from India his first wife, i.e. may not do so as she is a prohibited immigrant. A more recent magisterial decision, still to be confirmed, goes even further, and declares that even a first and only wife, married under a law permitting of polygamy, is a prohibited immigrant, as such a marriage is invalid. The insult to Islam is only equalled by the enormous moral issues involved in these decisions, compelling, as they do, either material ruin or the break-up of families. It is sincerely to be hoped that the Mussulmans of India will offer a strong protest against them and that they will demand the repeal of a law that asperses marriages contracted in India under the Islamic law.

The McCormick Case.

You never saw him with a revolver?

No, I never saw him with a revolver.

You never had complaints about his going about with a revolver?

Not to the best of my knowledge.

You never heard that he threatened natives with a revolver and terrorised them?

No.

He is an overbearing violent man?

I don't think I am qualified to give an opinion of Captain McCormick. I should not feel justified in saying that.

Did you never get any complaints from Mr. Sherard about him?

Not that I remember. I don't think I did.

I suppose you know that Mr. Sherard went to Victoria Point to enquire into this case, about the rape and abduction?

No, he was there already.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was sent from Victoria Point to Captain McCormick's plantation?

Witness: Yes.

To investigate this charge of abduction?

Yes.

You know that the investigation took place in Captain McCormick's house?

I have no knowledge of that fact.

Not even heard of it.

Well, there is some passage in one of the diaries about McCormick's case.

You say you don't know that the enquiry was held in Captain McCormick's house in the presence of Captain McCormick?

Witness: Do you mean the enquiry for abduction? I have not noticed it.

• Mr. Hamlyn: Yes, and I put it to you that Captain McCormick had the little girl on his knee all the time and a revolver in his pocket.

I don't know. I would like to see the Police Papers.

You know Mr. Sherard complained to Mr. Buchanan about it? I saw no official complaint.

Is it usual when making an enquiry against a person to go to the house of that person and hold an enquiry?

No, I should think not.

And to have the complainant on his knee must have struck you as very absurd?

It is not the right way to conduct an enquiry.

Did you take any action on that?

You will see various actions taken by Mr. Finnie, the D. S. P.

What did Mr. Finnie do?

I think Mr. Sherard was called upon for his explanation. That was a matter for the Inspector-General of Police.

Was there a shooting case on McCormick's estate, in or about the estate, in connection with McCormick and his servants?

The witness hesitated and the question was repeated.

Yes, that was about last October.

And a man was shot dead?

No, he received injuries from which he died afterwards.

And McCormick's servant got a month's jail?

I think he did.

What was his name?

I could not tell you his name.

To The Court: One of McCormick's servants, shot another of McCormick's servants.

Mr. Hamlyn: His name was Joseph?

I don't remember.

Is not this servant in your employ now?

No, that I know of.

Neither in your house nor in any official capacity?

Well, I don't know who shot the servant.

Where was this case tried, this shooting case?

Victoria Point.

Who tried it?

The Sub-Divisional Officer.

Can you give me his name.

Mr. Stevenson.

He is Mr. Buchanan's successor?

Yes.

McCormick used to import arms from Penang direct?

He tried to.

And Mr. Buchanan put a stop to it?

Very likely, I really don't know.

A stop was put to it?

Well, there was some dispute about 303 rifle, which was just coming to a termination before I came to the district. It was not allowed to be imported.

Do you say that the people around McCormick's estate were not living in terror of him?

Well, he had enemies there and he appears to have as many good friends—some very bitter enemies.

And why has he enemies there?

Well, that is going rather back. I will explain to you. He has taken up land that was formerly waste open land and maintained large herds of buffaloes. I mean open grazing land. He has taken this up to plant rubber and some of the people there have never forgiven him for that.

Mr. Hamlyn: Yes. Any other reason?

He has had quarrels with them about labour contracts and things of that sort. Some of them cut his nurseries.

Anything more?

I don't remember. Those are things which come up more or less officially.

Now we come back to where we started. I repeat to you again that McCormick is an over bearing, violent tempered man.

I say I am not prepared to endorse that description.

And intemperate in his habits. You have never seen him the worse for liquor?

No.

Counsel was here interrupted by Mr. Rutledge.

Mr. Hamlyn, addressing the Court: What I wish to prove, Your Honour, is that this man McCormick was a terror in the neighbourhood and a friend of the Deputy Commissioner.

The Court: You might pass on to another point.

Mr. Hamlyn. You say, Mr. Andrew, that McCormick never thrashed any of the natives?

The only case I ever heard of was one that happened, I fancy, soon after I went there—the son of Mohamed Din.

Mohamed Din was an ex-Thugyi?

An ex-Headman.

And McCormick lived with this Mohamed Din for 6 months?

That is known to him. I have never heard it before.

You have never heard that McCormick came here a most impetuous man?

No.

And you say he has not terrorised the neighbourhood?

I should say not. I might say this about him terrorising the neighbourhood. When I first went there I saw he did not get on well with the natives, that is, the Malays, and I spoke to him about it and told him he ought to make a point to get on much better with them.

Now we come to a very salient point in this article which affects yourself, and I would draw your attention to the fact that you have not included it in your complaint. You have taken various extracts from this article and put them in complaint, but you have left out this particular passage, that is "he has been, it appears, for a long time an intimate and apparently valued friend of Mr. G. P. Andrew, I. C. S., officiating Deputy Commissioner at Mergui since 29th October 1909." Is that true or false?

Literally speaking it is false because I never saw McCormick until after the 29th October, 1909.

Is that true or false?

It is false. He is not an intimate and valued friend of mine at all. He is a friend I meet in the Club, a man I invite to dinner.

You say he is not a friend; or will you say he is a friend?

I did not know what you mean by a friend. I say there are some thirty planters in the district and I do not know him as I know several others. A question like that is a matter of opinion. All I can say is that up to that time I had met him some half a dozen times—up to the time of his case.

Now in the month of April, 1911, Mr. Buchanan went on leave?

Yes, for a month.

That was before the abduction case?

Yes, that started in July.

And you went to Victoria Point and stayed there practically the whole month?

Yes, I took Buchanan's duties.

You practically remained there a whole month?

I was there nearly a month, not the whole of the month, some 23 days altogether.

And you saw McCormick pretty frequently?

I saw him on his way to Penang. I saw him when he came back. Yes, I saw him pretty frequently.

And during your stay at Victoria Point you resided on his estate in his house for many days?

For five days during his absence.

And during your visit to Victoria Point you dined with him and breakfasted with him frequently.

Not frequently. I returned from his house just before he came from Penang. I went and slept the night there on his return, as I had to show him alterations which he had to make in certain grants.

He had already gone to Penang before you went to the house?

Yes.

When he came back you were still in the house?

No.

You still say you are not a friend of his?

I leave you to judge.

During that visit at McCormick's place you saw this little girl Aniah?

I did not.

You mean to say that you did not know, while you were staying in that house, that her father and mother and relatives were making frantic endeavours to reach you?

I do not believe they were. I heard about it after this case.
 And that McCormick's servants prevented them?
 I do not believe they did.
 You have heard about it?
 I have seen it alleged in deposition.
 Why don't you believe it?
 Because if any body had made any efforts to see me at all, he could have done so.
 That is your reason.
 Yes.
 During your visit on that occasion to Victoria Point you inspected Mr. Buchanan's office?
 Yes.
 He had no notice of it?
 No, he was away.
 And whilst you were inspecting it McCormick was with you?
 No.
 Now recollect, Mr. Andrew?
 No.
 You swear it?
 I swear it. (After a pause.) You mean in the office?
 Whilst you were inspecting Mr. Buchanan work was McCormick ever present?
 No, not to the best of my knowledge.
 Are you prepared to swear that he was never present, when you inspected Mr. Buchanan's work?
 On no occasion.
 And he was not urging you to get Mr. Buchanan transferred?
 He may have made some remarks, but he never asked me to have Mr. Buchanan transferred. He never pretended to like Mr. Buchanan.
 You say he never pretended to like Mr. Buchanan?
 Yes, I say for at least a year before he was transferred he never pretended to like Mr. Buchanan.
 And whilst you were in Victoria Point you complained to the Commissioner about Mr. Buchanan?
 Not necessarily. What do you mean by complaining about Mr. Buchanan? I sent my inspection report? I had to do that.
 And without being called upon to show cause or any explanation Mr. Buchanan was censured?
 Perhaps he was. If you have got the paper, put it in please. I cannot carry these things in my head.
 Was he censured or blained or condemned over your visit?
 I think he was.
 It appears that the child Aniah had attracted the attention of McCormick?
 I cannot tell you.
 "Evidence is available that he spoke of her as a beauty, and that he made some efforts to get her, young as she was. The woman MeSone, to whom Aniah was sent for a while by her parents, was the mistress of a Mr. Clarke, then assistant to Mr. McCormick, and she was then living in Mr. Clarke's house" You know Mr. Clarke?
 Yes.
 And you know MeSone?
 I know her relationship to Mr. Clarke.
 His Mistress.
 Yes.
 Mr. Clarke's house is in McCormick plantation?
 Yes.
 What position does Clarke hold?
 Assistant, I presume, to McCormick.
 Aniah is the daughter of one Fatima and the father is one Malassa?
 Yes.
 You agree that the mother Fatima entrusted the child to one MeSone?
 Yes from my enquiry.
 Mr. Hamlyn: "And one evening soon after she arrived McCormick called at Clarke's." I suppose you agree with that. Did that appear in the evidence before you when you enquired into this case?
 Witness: I agree with that statement from what I know of this case.
 Mr. Hamlyn: "Doubtless he had called before and knew the child was there. On this occasion he found the child playing with another child in the compound and, according to the statement on oath of Aniah, he lifted her up in his arms and took her to his house." Is that a true allegation of facts?

 Witness: He never said that he took her in his arms, and took her away by force.
 Mr. Hamlyn: I want you to let us know whether the paragraph I have read is a correct statement of facts.
 Mr. Rutledge to the Court: Your Honour, I object to the question in the form it is. Everyone of the questions have been put to the witness as if they had been within his own knowledge.
 Mr. Hamlyn: Very well, I will put it this way. Is this a fair statement of the facts of the case? Is that a correct statement of facts?
 Witness: It was so alleged.
 Mr. Rutledge to the Court: Your Honour, I again object to the question in its present form.
 Mr. Hamlyn: Is it a correct statement of facts and proved?
 Witness: No. McCormick's house is two miles away. Aniah is a child nearly twelve years of age and I regard it as extremely improbable that he carried her all that way. It was not denied before me that McCormick took the child from Clarke's house.
 Mr. Hamlyn: You know that at the Police enquiry McCormick denied it in toto?
 Witness: I could not tell you from memory. It is here in the Police papers.
 Mr. Hamlyn: You know I take it, that after the enquiry held in McCormick's house the girl Aniah was subsequently examined by the Police, in Inspector Sherard's own house?
 Witness: Yes.
 Mr. Hamlyn: And after that McCormick called on Inspector Sherard and insisted upon reading the girl's statement?
 Witness: That is alleged.
 Mr. Hamlyn: That he intimidated Mr. Sherard with a revolver and compelled him to alter the statement. Has that been alleged at all? Is this the first time you have heard of it?
 Witness: That allegation has not been made to me that he terrorised Sherard into making alterations. This is the first time I have heard of it.
 Mr. Hamlyn: You agree that alterations have been made in McCormick's statement?
 Witness: Yes.
 Mr. Hamlyn: There were two witnesses of the actual abduction one Bedin and Sahut. Is that true?
 Witness: Yes.
 Mr. Hamlyn: Why did you not call them?
 Witness: Well, McCormick did not deny in my Court taking the child away. I did not call Sahut because his evidence was not necessary, because the taking away of the child was not denied in my Court.
 Mr. Hamlyn: This was a charge of abduction and it was necessary for you to know all the circumstances that made up the abduction?
 Witness: Yes, certainly, certainly.
 Mr. Hamlyn: And you did not ascertain those circumstances?
 Witness: I think I did.
 Mr. Hamlyn: Sahut was an eye-witness?
 Witness: Yes.
 Mr. Hamlyn: Bedin was an eye-witness
 Witness: Yes. I shall have to refer to the Police papers. I cannot carry all this in my head. I did not take their evidence because the taking away of the child was not denied.
 Mr. Hamlyn: Did you not say that it was abduction in any case on account of the child's age, notwithstanding the circumstances?
 Witness: Yes.
 Mr. Hamlyn: The woman MeSone, as did McCormick himself, varied their statements regarding the circumstances surrounding the abduction. You agree that they did?
 Witness: Yes.
 Mr. Hamlyn: The child was kept from her parents for three months or thereabouts. Did you ascertain in the enquiry how long she was kept away from her parents?
 Witness: Up to the time of recovery of the child it was fully three months according to the allegations in my Court.
 Mr. Hamlyn: On the 14th July, 1911, when the child was recovered by the order of the Magistrate MeSone said that Aniah stayed in her house for two weeks. She then went and lived with Ma Pe Yin. She did not see her go away and she did not know how she did go?
 Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: It was alleged by McCormick and Ma Pe Yin that Me Sone, with the knowledge of the child's mother Fatima had sold the child to Ma Pe Yin. You have seen that on the Police record?

Witness: I don't remember. Who alleged it?

Counsel: Ma Pe Yin.

Witness: When? She alleged what?

Counsel: That MeSone and Fatima had sold the child to Ma Pe Yin. Will you admit that MeSone contradicted herself. Gave two versions (witness hesitated). Did she or did she not?

Witness: Give me the two versions.

Mr. Hamlyn: reading: "On the 14th July.....". This statement was made in the presence of McCormick, and on the 21st July MeSone gave another version (read).

The Court to the witness: Are you satisfied that there were variations in the statements given on the 14th July and on the 21st July?

Witness: I think that I have stated somewhere that all the witnesses for the defence made wild reckless statements. The witnesses certainly changed their statements.

Mr. Hamlyn: That a Police Officer was sent to McCormick's to bring the child, is that substantially true.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: McCormick terrorised the witnesses and, according to Mr. Sherard, shouting if they did not give evidence to please him. Did that come to your knowledge? Is it true or false as far as you know?

Witness: I do not know.

Mr. Hamlyn: You have not tried to ascertain whether this is a false or true statement?

Witness: No, I made no enquiries.

Mr. Hamlyn: It was a disgraceful thing if this sort of thing did happen?

Witness: Yes, I don't agree with that sort of thing.

Mr. Hamlyn: On that occasion McCormick stated "I do not know who brought her here," but he altered his statement to "I brought her here" on the 17th July. Is this a true statement on the part of Mr. Arnold or is it false? Have you taken the trouble to ascertain whether the statement in this article of which you are complaining is a true or false statement? I put it to you that he had seen the child's sworn statement and had altered his own statement. You did not take the trouble to see whether he altered it or not?

Witness: No, I did not make an enquiry to see why the accused had altered these statements.

Mr. Hamlyn: Surely you ought to have cross-examined the accused?

Witness: I know that he made two statements.

Mr. Hamlyn: There is a very serious conflict in the two statements. He denied the abduction in one of the statements in toto?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: I would commence with the 3rd column, Mr. Andrew. On the 22nd. he made a further statement, that is, McCormick made a further statement,—"I took her away to my house I took her to mine and I handed her to Ma Pe Yin." Did you know this had been made by McCormick?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: They made no impression on your mind?

Witness: They made no impression on my mind. Well, it is a common thing for accused persons to change their statements.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did it not have a very serious weight with you, this statement being in variance with the others?

Witness: It did not.

Mr. Hamlyn: You did not examine him on these three points. "Now, there is not a shadow of doubt that McCormick abducted the child and that he did so, as we allege, for the purpose of subsequently raping her, as he did a few days later according to the child's sworn statement....." What have you to say about that?

Witness: I say that is not proved by the evidence.

Mr. Hamlyn: You did not believe the little girl's story, that she was put across his knee?

Witness: No, I did not.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you agree that the girl had been ravished? Did you come to the conclusion that the girl had been ravished?

Witness: I think so.

Mr. Hamlyn: By whom?

Witness: I cannot tell you.

Mr. Hamlyn: Dr. Evers had been subpoenaed to give evidence by you?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was not present in your Court?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you subpoena the Assistant Surgeon in Victoria Point?

Witness: Yes, Dawlat Ram.

Mr. Hamlyn: He at first demurred to coming, not having got permission from his superior officer, Dr. Evers?

Witness: I don't think so. I don't remember that at all. I asked the Sub-divisional Magistrate at Victoria Point to bring all the witnesses up from that side and he included this Assistant Surgeon.

Mr. Hamlyn: And he made an objection that he dared not leave the place without permission from his superior officer, Dr. Evers.

Mr. Hamlyn: Was not a wire sent at your instance to this Assistant Surgeon?

Witness: I don't remember anything about that. I don't remember anything about the witnesses coming from Victoria Point.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you telegraphed that Dr. Evers had given permission?

Witness: I would rather say no, to the best of my knowledge. I do not remember anything about Dawlat Ram's appearance at all.

Mr. Hamlyn: Cannot you think?

Witness: To the very best of my knowledge I did not.

Mr. Hamlyn: You did not send a telegram in the name of Dr. Evers at all telling him to come?

Witness: I did not.

Mr. Hamlyn: Have you had any correspondence with Dr. Evers?

Witness: I will swear to the best of knowledge that I have not.

Counsel: Very well, I will take your answer. Continuing, Dr. Evers had been asked specially, to make an examination of the girl through the mother of the child asking, imploring, that she might be examined and she was sent to Dr. Evers to be examined by the Sub-divisional Officer?

Witness: She was examined by Dr. Evers.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you did not think it necessary to examine Dr. Evers?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you know that Dr. Evers was not in attendance in Court on the day you were enquiring into this matter?

Witness: I do not know.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you see the statement here that the child was under examination by the D. S. P. for five hours and she was not shaken at all? It is about a dozen lines down the third column.

Witness: I see it.

Mr. Hamlyn: I suppose you examined the Police papers when she gave evidence.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And her evidence in Court before you was supported by the D. S. P. that she was examined for five hours. The child's evidence was also corroborated by the mother's evidence?

Witness: That is a question I will have to refer to my proceedings before I could reply to (witness reads the proceedings).

Mr. Hamlyn: What do you refer to therein?

Witness: I refer to the rape therein, to the abduction. I refer later (witness reads again from the proceedings).

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you pay any heed or attention to the sworn statements made by the mother and the child before Mr. Buchanan?

Witness: Yes, there were very many discrepancies. Do you want to know one of them? [Witness] reads. "Aniah says, I did not tell my mother before I was taken to the hospital....." Fatima says that "when she was given back to me.....she was suffering from.....that she caught in Captain McCormick's house."

Mr. Hamlyn: Who had stated that?

Witness: Aniah

Mr. Hamlyn reading: "Leaving aside the charge of rape for the moment, what is the accused's explanation of his taking possession of the child? It is the most amazing and incredible explanation conceivable. We are sorry to be obliged to write plainly but the facts cannot be boggled. McCormick asserts that the child was suffering from gonorrhoea....." Do you believe that?

Witness: I consider that it was proved by the evidence in my Court. By her own relatives, there is Mr. Clarke, MeSone, Hajee Rahim.

Persia.

News of the Week.

In the House of Lords, Lord Lamington called attention to the unsatisfactory situation in Persia and re-iterated the statements with reference to the diminishing of British prestige. He complained that Great Britain was too ready to sacrifice her Persian interests to Russian demands.

Lord Crewe defended the Anglo-Russian Convention using arguments similar to those put forward by Sir Edward Grey recently. Great Britain and Russia, he said, would do their best to help Persia financially. He emphatically declared that Great Britain would do her utmost to avoid anything like military occupation of Southern Persia. It would be folly from every standpoint to enlarge our responsibilities in that direction. The problem was most difficult but there were signs of improvement.

Lord Curzon said that the situation in Persia was most gloomy and our attitude was inevitably leading to British military occupation of Southern Persia. Dark clouds were rolling up pregnant with danger not only to our relations with Russia but to the Indian Empire. He thought that the Government should show a little more spirit and courage in its dealings with Russia and a determination to insist upon the maintenance of Persian integrity.

Sir Edward Grey replying to Sir George Robertson in the House of Commons on 16th July said he was aware of Russia's proposal to build a railway from Julfa to Tabriz, independently of the Trans-Persian Line. He did not know whether Persia had sanctioned the project, but he was already in communication with the British Minister in Teheran, with regard to the proposal of a British firm to construct a line in the South. If the concession for a railway were given in the North, we should claim a corresponding concession in the South, but the railway from Julfa to Tabriz was not a very extensive project.

No news of any kind is available regarding the Trans-Persian Railway, but beyond doubt the Home Government have been frequently in communication with the authorities in India on this question. Mr. Johns, the Chief Engineer, is still in Simla, and he will, it is presumed, resume survey work next cold weather, as usual.

Teheran, July 4

I am informed that the opposition to the Trans-Persian Railway project among Moscow merchants, led by M. Christoffnikoff, who is a very wealthy and influential export merchant to Persia, is growing in volume. The Russkoe Slovo is about to publish an article from its Teheran correspondent condemning the scheme as most damaging to Russian commerce.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Odessa, July 1.

It is semi-officially announced that the Council of Ministers has under consideration a tentative scheme for the construction of a railway from Djulfa to Tabriz. It may be recalled that when, about a decade ago, Russia came to the financial assistance of the Teheran Government, after England had undiplomatically declined to do so, one of the primary conditions of the Russian loan was that this country should have the first and exclusive option of building railways in Persia. It is, presumably, in virtue of that agreement that Russia now proposes to construct a Djulfa-Tabriz railway independently of the projected Trans-Persian line. It is possible that Russia is somewhat doubtful whether the Russo-Indian railway project will eventually be approved by England and the British-Indian Government. In the meantime she is not unnaturally desirous of securing for her own commerce and industry the important North Persian markets, and a line connecting her Caucasian system with the capital of Azerbaijan would, undoubtedly, give her the advantage she seeks; and, furthermore, it would materially help in the consolidation of what is already, practically, the Russian protectorate in the provinces of Azerbaijan and Urumiah. If the Djulfa-Tabriz Railway scheme be decided upon by the Council of Ministers, it will be submitted to the new Duma at its first session in the late autumn, and it may be safely assumed that that Assembly will readily agree to the Ministerial proposal and vote the necessary outlay. There are no physical difficulties in the way of the line's construction. The distance is, I believe, not more than eighty miles. Russia's commercial traffic between Djulfa and Tabriz has for some considerable time past been carried on by motor-wagon transport under Russian military escorts, and the trade is said to show a steady increase.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, July 2.

The ex-Shah's Treasurer and Private Secretary left Odessa some days ago for Vienna. Muhammad Ali himself is said to have either already left or to be about to leave for Europe. Carlsbad is announced as his destination. It will be remembered that a journey to Carlsbad was announced last July, when preparations for his return to Persia were completed. His agents here and in Europe display great activity, which causes much anxiety. Tabriz, where his supporter, Shuza-ed-Dowleh, is Governor, appears to offer him more attractive ground than the Turkoman country which was the scene of his recent failure.

Teheran, July 3.

Russia shows a disposition to withdraw the troops at Kazvin for the purpose of military concentration in the Caucasus. All reports from Meshed, however, tend to show that the occupation of Kharasan bears the stamp of permanency. Extensive barracks are being built for the troops.

Persia in Extremis.

B. W. STANTON, writing in the Financier of 26th June has the following:—

The departure of His Highness the Regent from Persia may well be considered to be the commencement of the final act of the Persian drama—a pathetic drama, and one long drawn out, but none the less real and certain.

The present unsatisfactory state of the Government will no doubt give place to a temporary reshuffling of the cards. What will be the upshot? That there are many clever and capable men among the Persians is a fact which is not questioned, men possessing mediocre ability, but we cannot point to one possessing the outstanding capabilities which go to the making of a leader, and it is just at this juncture—when the responsible head has left the country, and their mainstay in battle has been done to death—that a leader is needed. What is even more deplorable than this is the lack of clean-handed and clean-hearted patriotism, and of prominent men who, from pure and disinterested motives, working with a real, unselfish courage, are willing to sacrifice their personalities, and, if necessary, their all, for the benefit of their country at large and their fellow countrymen in a common bond. Heroics and self-sacrifice, as the result of evil doing, are neither required nor necessary.

The Persian places his trust in no one; consequently, no one trusts him. Every single individual has an axe of his own to grind, and it is this "personal axe" which is ever the real incentive to all his words and deeds. It is due to no fault of his that this is so—it is his heritage and his burden. There are many who would gladly pursue the better and nobler path of life, but circumstances are against them, and so the evil goes on, and is perpetuated from generation to generation, with the cruel and deplorable result which we see.

If perchance we could find ten just men—men who would divest themselves entirely of self and join together in a bond of righteous brotherhood—ten men determined to face intrigues and contumely with a bold front and an upright policy, meting out retribution to evil doers (or even if we could find a Kareem Khan or Nauder Qulce), the country might breathe again the air of tranquility and plenty. But we look in vain for such a consummation.

Persia, as Persia, is a question of the past, and to blink that fact is but to make matters worse. The Meshed correspondent of the Near East, in his letter of 24th May, writes:—"The masses of people in Persia are poor, and any interruption of their means of livelihood is very serious. No doubt the larger part of Persia's population is indifferent to the political condition of the country, except in so far as it affects them personally, and would be entirely satisfied with either Monarchical or Constitutional Government if they could only be guaranteed safety of life and property, and be reasonably sure of the necessities of life. The Treasury is worse than empty, and the country has no one who can develop its financial resources. Most men in power use their position to accumulate money for themselves. The likelihood of Persian independence and self-development has passed away, and the sooner it is acknowledged that Russia has taken over Northern Persia the sooner will the country settle into what is to be its future normal condition." This is writ large and of unerring truth. "Independence submits to no restraint or dictation from outside, and the first condition of national existence is the power of resistance to such restraint."

Persia has lost her power of resistance, and, along with it, her independence. Persia as an independent entity has passed and gone, and any further attempt or effort at regeneration from within or to bolster up her rotten carcass is but to prolong the agony of her poor bleeding and starving millions (tau ba kunh-e-beekh-e-asos va bunyed faused ast). It is, perhaps, hardly true to say that her power for self-development has passed away. Self-development is still possible, but with her independence gone a leader is needed to preserve her integrity and to foster self-development. Is there such a man among them? And are there the other nine men to follow his lead? We wait for the answer, and time alone will show. If the leader and his lieutenants are not forthcoming, then it is only a question of time (and that of short duration) when her integrity and her power of self-development will be thoughts of the past. Will not the best of Persia's manhood combine in a final effort to save this last shred of honour left to them? Will not the discordant elements (internal and external) agree to a truce, and together facing the inevitable, endeavour to save at least the integrity of their country? There are those able and willing to do so; but, alas! they lack the backbone for such an effort. Wanted, a leader!

Sir Edward Grey and Persia.

A WHITE Paper was issued on the 4th July containing further correspondence respecting the affairs of Persia, and covering the period from Christmas last to 2nd April of the present year.

The published despatches throw an interesting light on the action taken by the British Government following the executions of Persian ecclesiastical dignitaries by the Russians in Tabriz reported at the beginning of the year.

Sir George Buchanan, the British Ambassador to Russia, writing from St. Petersburg to Sir Edward Grey on 4th January reports that on the previous day he had a conversation with the Russian Foreign Minister on the subject of the execution of the Sikat-el-Islam, and told him that the execution of this high placed ecclesiastic struck him as being "a most unfortunate occurrence, as well a grave blunder." The Ambassador pointed out that it was almost certain to arouse intense indignation throughout Persia, and that probably the Russian authorities would be represented as having caused the execution for the express purpose of provoking fresh disorders which would furnish them with the necessary pretext for occupying Teheran.

M. Sazonoff replied that the military authorities had no choice but to inflict capital punishment on the Sikat-el-Islam, who had been one of the chief instigators of the recent troubles and of the anti-Russian movement, and that they were moreover obliged to take account of the temper of the troops, who were incensed at the tortures to which the Russian wounded had been subjected.

Sir George's despatch proceeds:—

"I said that I quite understood that acts such as those which he had just mentioned must be severely punished, but that I still thought that it would have been more politic not to have inflicted the death penalty on the Sikat-el-Islam. Russia was, like Great Britain, a great Mussulman Power, and I feared that his execution would shock the feelings of our Mahomedan subjects. What, however, pre-occupied us most for the moment was the danger of its provoking an outbreak of fresh disorders in Persia, which might in their turn lead to the occupation of Teheran by the Russian troops. His Excellency was no doubt aware of the violent opposition which the despatch of Russian troops to Persia had aroused in the House of Commons and of the very difficult position in which you (Sir Edward Grey) had been placed. I therefore trusted that he would do all that was possible to restrain the Russian military authorities in Persia, as the occupation of Teheran could not fail to put a severe strain on the Anglo-Russian understanding.

"M. Sazonoff, in reply, expressed the hope that nothing would happen to render such an occupation necessary, but said it was impossible for the Government not to reckon with Russian public opinion, and in view of the state of anarchy reigning in Persia he could not meet the wishes which Mr. Mallet had expressed to Count Benckendorff in your name with regard to the withdrawal of the Kazvin force. His Excellency explained that the force of 1,000 men sent from that place to Resht had only been transferred in order to strengthen the garrison at the latter place."

Sir Edward Grey, in a despatch to Sir G. Buchanan in February, said:—

"Count Benckendorff told me to-day that the withdrawal of the Russian troops from Kazvin would soon be accomplished—half of them would be returned to Russia, and the other half would go to Ardebil and Resht. I said I was very glad to hear this."

In a despatch dated 15th January Sir Edward Grey informed Sir George Buchanan, in connection with the Tabriz incident, that as order had been restored there did not appear to be any reason why the withdrawal of the Russian troops from Kazvin "should not now be proceeded with." Sir Edward continued:—

"You should take an opportunity of speaking to M. Sazonoff in this sense, but in doing so it is desirable that you should explain the considerations that influence His Majesty's Government in the matter. They have recognised that a Persian Government which pursues a policy hostile to Russian interests cannot be strong. Such a policy leads inevitably to friction and conflict with Russia, that must weaken the Persian Government and impair or destroy its authority. All the more is it necessary that a Persian Government, when friendly to Russian interests, should be supported and encouraged. The present Persian Government has complied with the Russian demands, and has shown a genuine desire for friendly relations with Russia. Unless there is some response to this attitude and some encouragement is given to the Persian Government it will not be apparent to the latter or to their subjects that they have anything to gain. A withdrawal of the Russian troops from Kazvin would give such encouragement. It would justify to the Persians what their present Government is doing, and would thereby strengthen its position and enable it to regain the authority that is essential to the restoration of order in Persia."

Concerning the pensioning of the ex-Shah Sir Edward Grey telegraphed to Sir George Buchanan on 23rd January:—

"It should not be forgotten in considering the position of the ex-Shah that he no longer has any right to claim a pension at all, and I am of opinion that if the two Governments decide to grant him one they should only do so on obtaining from him some fuller guarantee that he will not return to Persia. He has weakened the Persian Government by his incursion, which cost them considerable sums to check, and has thus made them less able to deal with the disorders in the south, which have consequently increased. As a result British trade has suffered severely."

Sir Edward also wrote to the British Ambassador on the same day:—

"I spoke to Count Benckendorff in the sense of my telegram of to-day's date about the ex-Shah's pension. Count Benckendorff said the important thing was to get the ex-Shah out of Persia. He did not deprecate a written undertaking such as I had suggested being required, but it might be that the ex-Shah would refuse to come out of Persia with such a condition. Would it be wise to insist on the condition if his withdrawal from Persia could be obtained by waiving it? I said if the ex-Shah did come out of Persia without any condition I thought the Russian Government should put him under surveillance."

A despatch from Sir George Barclay, the then British Envoy to Persia, dated Teheran, 8th March shows that the compensation demanded from Persia by the British Government for the attack on Mr. Smart, the British Consul at Shiraz, was £4,744. It was stated in the House of Commons on 27th March that the Persian Government had agreed to pay compensation as a first charge on the next loan.

The final letter, which was from Sir Edward Grey to Sir G. Barclay, on 2nd April said:—

"His Majesty's Government have carefully considered the whole situation in South Persia, with special reference to the attack on Mr. Smart. It seems essential that the men, who are well known locally to have been guilty of that outrage, should be handed over to the Persian Government for punishment. If this were done His Majesty's Government would at once withdraw the detachment now at Bushire and if the tribal chiefs and headmen have shown a friendly feeling and peaceful attitude for at least two months, and no more road outrages occur, the withdrawal of the cavalry from Shiraz and Ispahan will follow. The Persian Government must, however, understand that the continuance of this benevolent attitude on the part of His Majesty's Government must depend on the establishment of an efficient Swedish gendarmerie, and they must therefore undertake, before the final withdrawal of the troops, to support the Swedish officers by all the means in their power."

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

A message received by Reuter timed four o'clock on the morning of the 19th July from the Dardanelles states that heavy cannonade is proceeding at Kumkaleh at the entrance to the Straits.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—At one o'clock in the morning of the 19th July eight Italian torpedo boats attacked Kumkaleh. The forts replied sinking two of the boats and damaging the other six. The Porte has ordered the closing of the Dardanelles.

Reuter wires from Rome:—It is semi-officially stated that Italian torpedo boats on the 19th instant penetrated the Dardanelles but that they were discovered by searchlights and subjected to heavy cross fire from the forts on both sides. They found the Turkish warships anchored but fully prepared, being protected by steel cable obstructions. Consequently they made no attack and retired though they suffered no damage. The Porte has decided not to close the Dardanelles, but to reduce the width of the Channel between the mine fields.

An Italian Note published on the 19th July says it is absurd to suppose that six torpedo boats attempted to force the Dardanelles. The Note ascribes the cannonade by the forts to panic.

On the contrary a despatch from Constantinople on the 19th July declares that after the withdrawal of the torpedo boats, which were apparently trying to surprise the fleet anchored off Gallipoli, twenty-two Italian warships, accompanied by transports, were sighted off the Straits.

News of the attack on the Dardanelles was received with surprise and incredulity in Vienna and Berlin, where it is believed that certain mysterious negotiations between Italian and German financiers with a view to peace have been progressing hopefully.

A proclamation of the Sultan was read to the troops after the Selamlık on the 19th instant. It mentions that certain officers on the 18th instant submitted unconstitutional demands forgetful of their military obligations. The proclamation urges the troops to observe discipline and abstain from politics as the development of tendencies to the contrary had encouraged the enemy to approach the gates of the capital. It appears that the demands mentioned in the proclamation were formulated after a meeting of officers at the Ministry for War which delegated Nazim Pasha and Hadi Pasha to wait on His Majesty and demand the dissolution of the Chamber and the appointment of Kiamil Pasha as Grand Vizier.

The Italian newspapers in announcing the withdrawal of torpedo boats intact, thanks to the bad Turkish gunnery, after penetrating twenty miles up the Dardanelles, declare that these heroes have written the most glorious page in the naval history of the world.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—A belief prevails in competent quarters that grave developments are pending. The Committee of Union and Progress being abandoned by the army and being unwilling to withdraw gracefully is running extreme risks in order to preserve a last hold. But the temper of the army was clearly shown in demands presented to the Sultan insisting on the appointment of Kiamil Pasha as Grand Vizier and the dissolution of the Chamber.

Reuter wires from Rome on 22nd July:—Detailed despatches announce that the damage to the torpedo boats, which carried out the Dardanelles raid, is insignificant.

It is officially stated that the Italians attacked, routed and decimated 1,500 of the enemy at a position to the west of Misurata. The Italian losses were nineteen killed and eighty-seven wounded.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 22nd July:—Tewfik Pasha has relinquished the post of Grand Vizier to which he was appointed recently owing to the refusal of the Sultan to dissolve the Chamber, His Majesty maintaining that such action was unconstitutional. Tewfik Pasha will remain Ambassador in London. Ghazi Mukhtar Pasha has been appointed Grand Vizier and is forming a Cabinet.

The Italians now admit that some slight damage was suffered by torpedo boats recently in the Dardanelles affair. Their object was to attack the Turkish fleet. The leading torpedo boat actually passed two obstruction cables protecting the fleet before returning.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 22nd July:—Kiamil Pasha has been appointed Foreign Minister, Nazim Pasha, Minister for War, and Hossein Hilmi, Minister of the Interior.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—At the last moment, changes have been made in the Cabinet. Kiamil Pasha becomes President of the Council of State and Noradunghian Pasha, Foreign Minister. The change is regarded as significant and as foreshadowing the early accession of Kiamil Pasha to the Grand Vizierate.

The Cabinet has decided to abolish the state of siege and trial by court-martial in Constantinople and to send immediately a peace mission to Albania.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—The Government has ordered suspension of hostilities in Albania and instructed the authorities to do their utmost to pacify the Albanians and withdraw the troops within the chief towns.

The Albanians captured Prishtina on the 21st instant, the garrison surrendering.

News by the English Mail.

REUTER'S Agency is informed by the Imperial Ottoman Embassy that the Turkish Commander in Tripoli has cabled to the War Ministry in Constantinople that the false Italian reports of fighting at Sidi Said should be contradicted. Turkish official telegrams state that the enemy in three columns attacked the Turco-Arab camps in the vicinity of Sidi Said on June 27th, and that after fierce fighting which lasted seven hours the enemy was driven back and pursued as far as the sea, leaving many dead bodies on the field.

(FROM THE "TIMES.")

The War Minister in Constantinople has received the following telegram from the Turkish Commander in Tripoli regarding the two battles of June 27th and 28th at Sidi Said:—On June 27th the enemy made a sortie with superior forces in the vicinity of Sidi Said, and at first succeeded in advancing some distance. Later, however, through the action of our cavalry, they were obliged to retreat, after a stubborn battle which lasted seven hours, and were pursued as far as the coast. The enemy lost heavily in this engagement and left 500 dead bodies on the field. Our losses were 159 killed and 296 wounded. On the 28th the enemy, three regiments of infantry strong, attacked Sidi Said, which they succeeded in occupying, after a desperate resistance on our part, by means of their heavy guns, which had been placed on the east side of Bu Kemmesh, and by the bombardment from their warships. Second Lieutenant Said Soubhi Effendi is among the dead.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

The Jeune Turc learns that four Italian emissaries have arrived at Cettigné. They propose to visit the capitals of the Balkan States and to have interviews with the leaders of the Opposition parties whom they will try to influence to take energetic action against the inactivity of their Governments in the present situation. After having visited the capitals of the Balkan States the Italian emissaries will also visit the principal Albanian towns.

It is stated that Italian emissaries have already arrived at Scutari in Albania where they are trying to incite the people to revolt.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 3.

The Chamber to-day approved the first reading of the entire Budget, which is the same in all essential as that submitted by Nail Bey previous to the Parliamentary dissolution, except in regard to the ordinary expenditure, which is now increased to £136,000,000. This sum does not include the cost of the Turco-Italian War, which is now dealt with separately.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

The Italian losses for the two engagements at Sidi Said are returned at thirty-nine killed and 190 wounded, a not inconsiderable total in view of the slight influence that this inferior advance is likely to have on the campaign as a whole. If, however, a general forward movement is impossible, the Italian commanders are adopting the right tactics in spinning out their small successes. Public opinion at home is gratified, and the army of occupation is freed from the demoralising effect of prolonged inaction. In regard to the contraband trade, however, it is possible that Italian watchfulness, at no time very thorough owing to the extent of the littoral involved, has become still less effective latterly. If reports are to be believed little difficulty is now experienced by the Turks in arranging for the consignment of guns and ammunition to the Tripoli coast, while food supplies are conveyed as previously from the Hinterland of Tunisia. Add to this the fact that the Arab levies are said to be receiving regular payment, although small, from the Turkish Government, which has never lost touch with the province in regard to ordinary administrative functions, and it will be seen that the Italian claim to annexation must appear particularly inadequate to Turkish eyes. Italy's steady yearly outflow of Italian emigrants to America is to be checked. The outflow is to continue, but in another direction to Tripoli. They are to be cajoled into the desert empire of the New Rome, and their path to good wages and friends in the United States is to be strewn with rocks and shoals. The Transatlantic steamship companies will thank the Italian authorities. And, if grass does not grow in the sand of the Sahara, or if the enemy's tactics succeed in keeping the Italians on the coast, like ivy on a wall, the Italian emigrants will likewise be grateful to their paternal Government.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

According to the Agence Ottomane, the Temps learns from Rhodes that the sudden change of attitude of the Italians causes uneasiness to the islanders whose ancient privileges the Italian Government appears disposed to restrict. The rigorous measures maintained at Rhodes and Cos considerably embarrass the inhabitants. The state of war has paralyzed business, and trade with Turkey is ruined. The levying of quarantine and lighthouse duties has resulted in steamers not calling at Rhodes. It is the islanders who are suffering the most by Italy's reprisals against Turkey.

The Iktiham learns that the British Government has accepted in principle the demand of the Sublime Porte for the appointment of British officers in the Ottoman gendarmery, but has laid down certain conditions. One of the conditions is, according to the Iktiham, that the officers shall not have to demand instructions from Constantinople on all questions, and that they will be free to have recourse to all measures they deem necessary in the exercise of their duties. The Sublime Porte is said not to be quite disposed to accept this condition, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs will open pourparlers with the British Government in view of finding a clearer and more acceptable formula.

According to the Agence Ottomane, the Tribuna says that all that has been said and written concerning the future of the Aegean Islands is premature.

The Corriere d'Italia says that the premature agitation of the Greek element in the islands serves the purpose of Turkey, and that she is using it to create difficulties to Italy and this prevents her occupying other islands.

M. D. Caclamanos, the new Greek Minister in Rome, has denied most emphatically in an interview that the Greek Government had taken any part, direct or indirect, in the meeting at Patmos of representatives of the Aegean Islands occupied by Italy or in the drafting of the Note which the islanders addressed to the Powers. He reiterated the official declarations that the cordial relations between Italy and Greece had not been affected in any way by the Italian initiative in the Aegean Sea.

The special correspondent of the Daily Telegraph reports from Chios that the notabilities of the islands have assured him that the expectation of the advent of the Italians has been continuous during the whole month. Thrice since the seizure of Stampalia several Muhammadan families of Chios have taken refuge in Constantinople or Smyrna, and thrice they have returned hither. Italian warships often took soundings off the southern part of the island. Obviously the feelings of the population vary according to race, but the correspondent is enabled to assert that the Greeks would in no wise welcome a permanent Italian occupation. Martial law prevails throughout the islands but no complaints are made against the Civil Governor, the military commander, or the officers. The local commander of troops and his comrades are resolved to offer a spirited resistance and the correspondent is convinced that they will keep their word.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

A check has been administered to the aspirations of the inhabitants of the Aegean Islands by the Italian military authorities. Owing to a misunderstanding the delegates at the conference at Patmos were subjected to some indignities. The mistake was rectified as soon as possible, but the inhabitants were reminded somewhat emphatically by General Ameglio that the Islands were in Italian military occupation, and that there could be no talk of autonomy. At the same time, a semi-official statement was issued in Rome contradicting the report that the Italian Government had summoned to the capital representatives of the Aegean Islands. Someone who purported to be the representative of the inhabitants of the islands, the statement continued, had come to Rome of his own accord, but he had not been received either by the Minister for Foreign Affairs or by any member of the Government. The Italian Government could not well adopt any other attitude. Having rendered an early conclusion of the war impossible by a premature proclamation annexing Tripoli, it ought to be very careful that the door is not shut on the only possible terms of peace by ill-advised haste in dealing with the Aegean Islands, which it has temporarily occupied in the course of its naval operations.

Athens, June 26.

During a cruise among the Turkish islands in the Aegean Sea which Italy has not yet occupied, I have had ample opportunity to study the effects of Italian politico-military tactics upon the Ottoman Government, the Greek population, King George's advisers, and upon the crucial perplexities of the international situation, and this is what I find. The islanders everywhere welcome not so much the arrival of the Italians as the break in the Turkish domination, because they regard it as a prelude to autonomy, which, in turn, is but a stage in the progress towards annexation by Greece. The population of the archipelago is stirred to its depth, and the stream of excitement is being turned upon European diplomacy, which has unwittingly created for itself a new source of constant trouble and peril in the Near East. The problem of the islands, once acute, will never disappear, and every conceivable solution will strike at the root of Turkish national existence. Ottoman statesmen, alarmed by the outlook, are eager for assurances that Europe will lay the spectre which it has conjured up. They are convinced that Russo-Italian policy is shaping itself in two measures—first, the financial exhaustion of the Ottoman Empire, which is compelled to expend enormous sums of money in preparation for attacks which are not contemplated; and, second, the creation of a situation which from the standpoint of international commerce, Europe cannot brook. Thus if Chios is captured, Smyrna will be cut off by sea, and terrible losses will be inflicted upon neutrals with no corresponding gain to Italy.

Turkey is quite willing to make a compromise now, but on the condition that Italy also agrees to split the difference. If Italy refuses the Ottoman Government will fight to the end, whatever that end may be, even though it be suicidal, and the Powers will have to lie in the bed they are making for themselves.

The Italian nation is accustoming itself to the thought that the islands of the archipelago will partly become Italian, and partly be under Italian protection, and it is understood that King Victor Emmanuel is very desirous to retain Rhodes at least. This consummation, however, would raise the passion of the Greek population to white heat, and render M. Venizelos' position in Greece exceedingly difficult.

Meanwhile, trade, industry, and commerce on all the islands are stagnant, the Turkish Government is being financially exhausted, the international situation is being made more complicated than ever, and Italy, who is causing these fateful changes, is not reaping even a slender benefit.

Constantinople, June 25.

I had an interview to-day with the Minister of the Interior regarding the report that he intended to engage foreign advisers as inspectors of the Ministry of the Interior. In confirming it he emphasised his great admiration for English methods of administration, and said that he wanted the help of Englishmen to infuse spirit, energy and a sense of responsibility into the Turkish officials, who were otherwise extremely competent. The Minister referred in flattering terms to the work of Sir Richard Crawford at the Custom House and Mr. Graves on the Financial Commission, who accompanied the Minister on his recent tour in Albania. He explained that he would need an Inspector-General and two assistants, the one a specialist in police organisation, the British police being one of the finest organisations in the world, and the other for statistical work. The Minister proposed to attach inspectors to each vilayet, beginning with those of European Turkey and Eastern Asia Minor, and gradually extending the system. They would take rank after the valis, have control over all officials, and report on all subjects affecting their administration.

The foreign Inspector-General would keep the men "up to the mark," besides furnishing advice and suggesting improvements in administration. The Minister added that he was willing to pay well, but wanted men who would work. He hoped eventually to see foreign advisers attached to all the other Ministries, chiefly those of Mines, Forestry, and Commerce.—Reuter's Special Service.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Berliner Tageblatt, in a leading article on the meeting, calls attention to hints in the semi-official press that an effort will be made at Baltic Port to draw up terms of peace between Italy and Turkey on the basis of the views held in common by Germany and Russia. The journal is of opinion that the German and Russian policies in regard to the war are far from identical, and says there would be no advantage in German co-operation in bringing about a peace under the auspices of a close Russo-Italian entente, by which all the sacrifices would fall to Turkey's share. The journal adds:—"Already a glowing affection for England is displaying itself in Turkey, which may prove somewhat expensive for us."

Turkish Finance.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

On Tuesday, in the Chamber of Deputies, the Minister of Finance, Djavid Bey, opened the discussion of the Budget. Without touching on the question of the war surtax which he reserved for treatment during the discussion of the special Bill relating thereto, the Minister pointed out that the chief characteristic of Ottoman Budgets since the Revolution of 1908 was the steady increase in the revenue, which continued even after the outbreak of the war, the month of April last showing an increase of £1125,000, as compared with the corresponding month of 1911. He declared that the deficit of about £14,000,000 in the ordinary Budget would already have disappeared if Europe had consented to give Turkey economic freedom, the yield of the Customs surtax of 4 per cent. and of the patent tax, the acceptance of which by Europe was still being negotiated, being sufficient to balance the Budget. As soon as the negotiations were concluded Turkey would raise nothing but productive loans for the execution of public works and the exploitation of the country.

The Minister of Finance praised the friendly attitude of the Ottoman Bank and the Administration of the Public Debt, thanks to whom the operation of the Sinking Fund was continued during the war, and was even more rapid than that of any other public debt. In conclusion, Djavid Bey announced that the negotiations for the construction of the Black Sea railways were approaching their termination, and that a project for making tobacco a State monopoly would be presented to the Chamber in about a week.

Situation in Albania.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

THE deserters at Monastir are said by the Hakk to have made the following demands:—

1. Equitable treatment of officers.
 2. Trial of the members of the former Cabinet by the High Court.
 3. Change of the present Cabinet.
 4. Formation of a General Staff under the Presidency of the Sultan.
 5. Dissolution of Parliament and the holding of new elections.
- Measures to be taken for preventing occult forces from influencing the Chamber and the Government.
6. Formal interdiction to officers to mix up in politics.

The Yeni Asir learns from Monastir that eight officers who left Monastir by night on Saturday took the direction of the Lake of Prespe. Their present whereabouts are not known but it is rumoured that they have joined the 58 soldiers who deserted from Monastir and that they went in the direction of Elbasan.

Two officers, a bugler and two soldiers who deserted have been arrested at Katchan by a detachment of gendarmes. The officers offered no resistance in order to avoid bloodshed.

All the deserters, with the exception of two lieutenants, are Albanians.

It is rumoured that all the officers who have deserted are capable men and supporters of the Union and Progress. It is affirmed that there must be serious motives for the movement. In the memoir they have addressed to the Commander of the Army Corps they demand (a) The dissolution of the Chamber because of irregularities in the elections. (b) The dismissal of all the Ministers except Hadji Adil Bey, Minister of the Interior, and the integral application of the Unionist programme. (c) The formation of a new Cabinet composed of members enjoying the confidence of the Union and Progress and the activity of the Committee as a public political organization.

The Hakk learns from Salonika that the recent movements of troops have no connection with events at Monastir. It is owing to alarming reports received from Mirditia that the Government has had recourse to severe measures for repressing any attempt at a revolt in that district.

The incidents in the Monastir district are not of a nature to render a serious military expedition necessary.

The commander and inspector-general of the 6th Army Corps sent a delegation composed of three officers to the deserters to try and clear up the misunderstandings which led to their deserting.

The correspondent of the Hakk records two rumours which, he says, are not even worth a denial but which caused a considerable sensation in Salonika. One of the rumours is to the effect that the deserters from Debré, who joined those at Monastir, dismantled the guns of the garrison at Debré. According to the other rumour, the deserters are opposed to the continuance of the war and demand the immediate conclusion of the peace.

The Salonika papers received yesterday state that the officers sent to parley with the deserters have not yet returned.

The Balkan says that Niazi Bey, of Resna fame, has asked permission of the Sublime Porte to lead a body of volunteers against the deserters.

It is reported that a number of Albanian students from Constantinople and Salonika have fled to Corfu. It is added that several Albanian chiefs have assembled at Corfu in view of organizing a general rising in Southern Albania.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 28.

The following communiqué was issued by the War Office last night:—

Another officer of the 20 who deserted has been captured by the detachments sent in pursuit. The rumours that Monastir is surrounded and that ten battalions have deserted are spread by those who desire to excite the public and insult the Ottoman Army. The public are warned not to pay attention to falsehood designed to mislead them. These reports are calumnies, the work of evilly-disposed persons whose interest it is to depict the internal and external condition of the country in the most sombre colours. No new incident has occurred to modify the existing situation.

Unfortunately, it is none too clear what the "existing situation" in Monastir province is and the War Office thus far has done little to enlighten the public as to its nature. In default of official news Constantinople is obliged to fall back upon the meagre information contained in the Salonika newspapers of 26th June. The Roumeli, the organ of Dr. Nazim Bey, says that the original number of the deserters was 13 officers and 100 men, mostly from the Bistritza barracks, three miles south of Monastir. They are believed to have been suborned by the Albanian Committee. The Independant of Salonika says that the deserters took several machine guns, and £1,000 with them from Bistritza.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 30.

The hurried action of the Government in introducing a special bill to deal with officers and men who take part in politics has produced an unfavourable impression in Parliamentary quarters, where it is regarded as a confession of weakness in regard to the reported discontent among the various Macedonian garrisons. There is a strong current of feeling against the Minister of War, but it is believed in the official world that the patriotism of the Turkish officers will prevent any outward manifestation while the war continues. Consequently the situation is not considered to be so grave as rumour represents.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, June 30.

According to information received from a well-informed source at Monastir, the total number of deserters amounted on the 26th instant to 22 officers and between 270 and 300 men, the majority of whom came from the Bistritza barracks, near Monastir, and from Dibra, and the remainder from Koritza, Kirchevo, Ochrida, Philip, and Resna. They were joined by 12 Albanian notables of Monastir and Dibra, and by about 140 armed Albanians from those towns. A battalion of Rifles was sent to keep in touch with the mutineers, but was ordered by Zeki Pasha to avoid a conflict. A speech delivered by Zeki Pasha to the garrison of Monastir was received in silence. Zeki Pasha appears to be returning to the capital, according to some reports in disgrace, and rumour attributes to Fethi Bey, the commandant of Monastir, the intention of resigning his command. Eyub Sabri and Omar Nadji Beys are still at Monastir. Dr. Nazim Bey has arrived in Constantinople.

Nafid Bey, the officer captured in disguise at Resna, is an Albanian and a brother of the present Ottoman Military Attaché in Berlin.

According to the latest information, the Government has opened pourparlers with the mutineers. Meanwhile Parliament has voted urgency for the discussion of the addition to the military penal code, which will take place to-morrow.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 1.

In the Chamber to-day the Minister of War explained the urgency of the Officers' Bill, imposing penalties upon officers and soldiers taking part in politics. The present was an opportune moment, he explained, owing to the mutiny at Monastir of certain officers and men, who would be accused of deserting during a state of war.

An Opposition deputy created great uproar by a speech declaring that flagrant partiality was shown to officers belonging to the Committee of Union and Progress, and contending that the Government should find out the causes which led loyal officers to sacrifice their prospects in order to demonstrate their grievances.

After being described by a member of the majority as inopportune the bill was eventually voted by a large majority.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 1.

There is no change in the general situation. No further desertions have occurred since June 27, both the mutineers and the loyal troops continue to avoid one another with a success which confirms the impression that each side is extremely reluctant to strike the first blow. Pourparlers between Tair Bey and the authorities, who apparently are represented by deputations of officers from the Monastir and Salonika garrisons, continue. It is semi-officially stated that the demands formulated by the mutineers are less extreme than was first reported, but no official statement is made as to their tenor.

A belief now appears to prevail in official and also in foreign diplomatic circles that the affair may end in some sort of compromise. It is certain that the great majority of the officers of the Army, whether they condemn or approve the conduct of the mutineers, are highly averse from the idea of civil war, which they realize might lead to a foreign invasion of the European provinces.

Salonika, July 2.

Although 12,000 troops have now passed through Salonika to Monastir, it would appear that the Government is ready to despatch a still larger force if necessary to attempt the forcible repression of the Monastir revolt. The latest news points to a more conciliatory attitude on the part of the officers of the garrison, who now demand only the promulgation of an Iradeh amnestying the deserters. We have, however, yet to see the effect produced upon them by the arrival of the Committee's expeditionary force.

The mutineers, having been reinforced by a considerable number of Albanians, have now retired in the direction of Delvina and show no disposition to treat with the authorities. The Monastir revolt has, as anticipated, greatly encouraged the Albanian rebels, and the news from Malissia and Mirditia is the reverse of reassuring.

Fethi Pasha, the Commandant of Monastir, has been sent to Constantinople to counsel the adoption of an amicable attitude towards the deserters.

Salonika, July 3.

No time has been lost by the Monastir officers in entering into relations with the troops sent to suppress the revolt who are encamped outside the town. In most cases these troops professed ignorance of the destination and object of the march when passing through Salonika, and have, it appears, already expressed a decision not to fire on their comrades.

The mutineers are proceeding in the direction of Argyrocastro, where a few days ago the situation was reported to be very threatening. Some troops have been despatched from Monastir in order to occupy certain strategic positions, but it is unlikely that they will come into contact with the deserters. Eight more battalions are en route from the Dardanelles.

Constantinople, July 3.

Fethi Pasha, who arrived from Monastir last night, to-day submitted his report on the situation there to the War Minister, and this communication was subsequently laid by the latter before the Council of Ministers which was held this afternoon to discuss the Albanian question. Several delegates from provincial branches of the Committee of Union and Progress have arrived here in order to confer with the chief organization.

July 4.

The Agence Ottomane has been officially informed that three officers and 35 men among the deserters have surrendered at Monastir and that ten more deserters have been captured near Kalkandelen. The situation, it is added, is now causing less anxiety to the authorities.

On the other hand, the Embassies were informed last night by the Government that no private telegrams could be sent to and beyond Salonika till further notice, the wires being reserved for official messages.

The position occupied by Isa Boletintz, the Albanian leader, and his followers has been attacked and captured by the Imperial troops after seven hours' fighting. Isa Boletintz himself escaped.

Two Bulgarians have been arrested at Monastir with bombs in their possession.

A report from Strumitza states that a skirmish has taken place between the Imperial troops and a band of 20 Komitadjis.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Commenting upon these events and comparing them with those of 1908, M. Jean Herbette, the well-known foreign editor of the Siècle, propounds an interesting theory. "There is one striking coincidence between the two movements," he says. "The revolt of 1908 ingeniously 'canalised' by the Young Turkish officers, was largely provoked by the danger of foreign intervention in Macedonian and Albanian affairs. After the Reval meeting a semi-official Note was issued in London on June 20th announcing that an Anglo-Russian scheme of reforms had been virtually agreed upon for the pacification of Macedonia and Albania. In the first days of July 5,000 or 6,000 Albanians assembled at Ferisovitch in order to protest against this act of foreign intervention, and if the emissaries of the Committee of Union and Progress succeeded in persuading them to demand a Constitution the success was due to the fact that a constitutional régime really appeared then as alone capable of saving Turkey from the control of European reformers. But what exactly is that which occurred last Sunday? The Tanin of Constantinople published a declaration by the Minister of the Interior announcing the appointment of Inspectors in Albania and Macedonia. These inspectors will be charged with watching over the application of reforms and will have for their chief a British inspector-general. Here, therefore, by the will of the Government itself, which ought to have guarded against the importation of foreign reforms, European Turkey is being given over to the control of foreign officials. Is it to be wondered at that the revolutionists of 1908 should to-day go back to the idea of a revolution?

It will be noted that one of the charges levelled by the mutinous officers against the present Government is that "it has sold Turkey to the foreigner."

The Berlin Lokalanzeiger publishes the following sensational information in connection with the mutiny at Monastir. General Abdullah Pasha, who commands 120 battalions of troops (about 30,000 men) in the Aidin vilayet of Asia Minor, refused to embark for Constantinople at the head of his army because he had promised his officers not to support the Government in its struggle against the Albanians. For similar reasons the Governor of Konya refused to execute an order from the Minister of War to get together all the Redifs of his district. Abdullah Pasha has been recalled and General Ali Pasha appointed in his place. General Shakab Bey sought to induce the officers of his division to take the place of the Albanian officers who have deserted, and thirty out of a total number of forty refused point blank. The journal also reports a rumour that the navy is fully in sympathy with the mutineers and that 80 per cent. of the army officers on active service belong to a secret society which has submitted the same demands as the Albanians, viz., the resignation of Said Pasha; the impeachment of Hakki Pasha; the individual responsibility of the Ministers; the dissolution of the Chamber; new elections; a general amnesty; the expulsion of Shevket Pasha, Talaat Bey, Djavid Bey and Djahid Bey, the latter editor of (Tanin) from the party (?), and the removal of the Young Turkish Committee from affairs of State.

It is difficult to say to what extent this information is accurate, but it would explain the inactivity of the Government in the face of the present crisis. It is, however, worthy of note that part of it finds corroboration in a message from the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung. The latter writes:—"The movement in Albania and the parallel movement of the officers are gaining every day in extent and inspire increasing anxiety. Almost throughout the length and breadth of Albania the telegraph has been interfered with, and to-day (June 28th) the wire between Constantinople and Monastir has stopped working. Seventy more officers from Monastir have taken to the mountains and taken over the organisation of the existing bands and small detachments of troops. It would seem certain that the Government can no longer rely upon the Monastir garrison. Nor has General Fethi Pasha, the commander of the army corps there, been able to execute the orders of Mahmoud Shevket. The information which reaches the general staff asserts with considerable confidence that Fethi Pasha is in sympathy with the Officers' League. This would surprise nobody, as Fethi Pasha has the reputation of a skilful diplomatist who only professes allegiance to the Committee from mere expediency. He was for many years Turkish Minister in Montenegro and Serbia.

"Yesterday," the correspondent continues, "the Minister of War caused a mobilised division of Redifs from Izmid to be transported on four steamers from Haidar Pasha to Rodosto, and thence by rail to Monastir—altogether ten battalions. This is a very important experiment. Will these troops reach Monastir, and, if so, will they be able to assume the offensive? Should the contrary prove the case, a terrible catastrophe will befall the whole structure of the Committee party. It is also reported that ten more battalions were to be transferred from Smyrna to Monastir, but the officers there had taken the oath not to proceed against their brethren.

"The fermentation among the officers is growing perceptibly. One may foresee that should the mutiny at Monastir be crowned with some success, it will extend in all directions. Officers there are observing that the new régime has brought their hundred Abdul Hamids. There is an Officers' League in existence very much like that in Greece. The officers of the Serres garrison were desirous of joining it, but were refused admission as Serres is a bulwark of the Committee party. On the other hand, the garrisons of Salonika and of other important centres in Macedonia are under the influence of the League, which recently issued a manifesto demanding, among other things, the resignation of Mahinoud Shevket and the removal of the Personal Section which has recently been established at the Ministry of War to the Sultan's Palace, after the manner of the Prussian Military Cabinet."

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung supplies further interesting information about the Monastir mutiny. "The movement," he says, "is also directed in a most decisive fashion against Mahmoud Shevket Pasha. His speech in defence of the Bill on the political activity of officers will have certainly come too late. It will have a directly opposite effect to that desired, especially as the causes which are essentially at the bottom of the political action of the officers will not be removed. One of the chief of them is the appointment of officers of lower grades to important administrative posts. Thus a number of majors are mütesarrifs (prefects), and a few colonels are valis. This practice leads to perpetual conflicts with old commanders of brigades, divisions, and corps in those places, and gives rise to charges of favouritism."

In a further message the correspondent states that the Cabinet, after prolonged deliberation, has decided not to resign, but to meet all eventualities. Authentic information, he says, is arriving from Erzerum and Smyrna announcing growing disaffection among the officers of the army there. "A high officer who was till recently in close touch with the Committee assures me that grave events are impending, as regards which, however, silence must be kept for the present." Lastly, the correspondent has received reliable information to the effect that the notorious Isa Boletins, having refused a "present" from the Government of £75,000, is seriously threatening Mitrovitsa, and has stopped all work undertaken by the Government for the construction of the roads from Mitrovitsa to Novi Bazar and from Mitrovitsa to Djakova.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

According to a Rome telegram to the Agence Ottomane the Corriere d'Italia dwells upon the absolute necessity for Italy to resume her land and sea operations. The Corriere d'Italia is displeased with the counsels of prudence given Italy by the foreign Press and particularly by the German and Austrian Press. It confirms the report that after the bombardment of Preveza Italy took an engagement with Austria not to extend the war operations to the Adriatic and Ionian Seas. Austria, on the other hand, had not only prepared for a mobilization on the Novi Bazar frontier but also on the Italian frontier. The Corriere goes on to say that the famous decree of annexation was the result of counsels received from the Berlin Cabinet through the Italian Ambassador in the German capital. The Corriere says in conclusion that Italy must never forget these facts which show up the real value of her alliances.

Referring to the Corriere's statement that the Italian Government had followed the counsels of the Berlin Cabinet in proclaiming the annexation, the Osmanischer Lloyd says that it is not worth while insisting on the absurdity of this libellous insinuation, which is only a new attempt to sow discord between Germany and Turkey.

Turkish Internal Reform.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 23.

THE newspaper comments on Hadji Adil's scheme for creating in the Ministry of the Interior a Board of Control, with an English expert in charge, are less pronounced in character than might have been expected. The only two Turkish papers which make reference to the Minister's announcement, namely, the Independent Sabah and the Opposition Ilham, express approval of the scheme in principle.

The Sabah, which has frequently advocated of late the employment of foreign experts, urges the Government to carry out its plan with energy and not permit itself to be daunted by the bogey of public opinion, which it so often professes to fear. Ottoman public opinion, declares the Sabah, only desires reform by whatever means effected.

The Ilham remarks that though the idea of employing foreign experts is extremely depressing to Ottoman patriots, it must monimentally be admitted that the necessity exists. If, adds the journal, the plan had been put in execution before the last elections there would certainly not have been such glaring abuses.

The Azadani, the organ of the Armenian group in Parliament, expresses gratification at the inclusion of Armenia among those regions in which the Inspectorship is to be established at the earliest possible date. The journal points out that, seeing that the aid of foreign experts is freely sought in financial and industrial matters, there can be no logical objection to the employment of such experts in internal administration. The Azadani, commenting on Hadji Adil's reference to England, expresses the warmest admiration for the English spirit and English methods of government.

Discussing the peace rumours to-day, the Tanin declares that the utmost Turkey would be prepared to discuss would be the question of those points on the coast of Tripoli over which Italy might reasonably claim rights of conquest.

The War.

(BY DR. E. J. DILLON.)

Views of the Turkish War Minister.

Constantinople, June 14.

EVERYBODY knows, or thinks he knows, what the Turkish or the Italian Minister of War will say about the contest between the two nations, because his position dictates his public utterances. The War Minister of a belligerent Power cannot re-echo the praiseworthy sentiments of a peace society nor sound a pessimistic note when speaking in the hearing of his people. He must needs be blithe, cheerful, and even his wildest hopes must be turned to certainty before he puts them into words. Why, therefore, trouble him at all? For many good reasons. One is because people want to know how a man in such a position looks and talks and bears himself; what manner of reply he gives to unexpected queries, and whether, of his own accord, he will say something new or reflect some change of opinion or sentiment among his colleagues. That is why I called on Mahmoud Shevket Pasha to-day, and when I left him I felt sure that I had not gone for nothing.

As usual, the general was sitting in his spacious apartment, the predominant colours of which are red, gold and white, signing papers as fast as he could. "One moment, and I am at your service," he said, after we had exchanged greetings. During that moment, which expanded into some minutes, I watched him working. It was an interesting procedure. I have often seen other War Ministers hard at work during a campaign, and I mentally compared him with them. Mahmoud Shevket Pasha had but one man waiting on him, a civilian, who first presented the square little documents and then scattered sand from a little wooden spoon over the wet ink of the signature. Like most Orientals, the War Minister is accustomed to dispense with a table when writing. He simply lays the paper in the palm of his left hand and scribbles away quite rapidly. On the right hand of his table hangs the trumpet of a telephone—one of the few that exist in the Ottoman Empire. As yet Constantinople has no public telephone, but certain Government offices in Stamboul have the use of the invention among themselves. In two or three years the population will be provided with this indispensable auxiliary to modern business.

"You are the centre of interest towards which the gaze of Europe is turned," I began, as soon as the last sheet of paper had the clabbed signature affixed. "How so?" he asked, with a smile. "Because the defence of Turkey rivets the eyes of the world, and for the moment you are the soul of the defence," I answered. "Formerly it was Enver Bey, but now that the struggle is transferred to the Sporades, and threatens to advance to Smyrna, you are become the living embodiment of the national defence. The world would like to know how you look upon the relative positions of the combatants since Rhodes and the other islands have been captured." "Why only since then?" queried the Minister. "Because it is commonly assumed that the naval operations which ended in their capture mark a new phase of the war." "Do you, who are in the midst of us here, also assume that? Did you notice many tokens of the new phase in the nation?" "I cannot say that the warlike spirit has abated since I left Turkey last December," I rejoined. "On the contrary, I should say it has grown more ardent. That is quite obvious, but it is not the obvious things which are always the most decisive. It often happens that a nation wears blinkers, and looks only where its leaders wish. What I should like to know is whether you see in recent events any cause for modifying your view of the situation." "No; I see none whatever. Neither do my colleagues. In fact, there is none. We were peaceably disposed when we were attacked, and we shall be peaceably disposed when the aggression has ceased. Until then, we shall parry the enemy's thrusts. To this natural attitude there can be no modification, except such as may ensue upon a modification of the cause. The enemy may move us to sheathe our sword by first sheathing his. But, short of that, nothing can determine us to act otherwise than we are acting."

"Attack is generally considered the most effective kind of defence," I went on, "and I have heard your method of meeting the enemy criticised on the ground that it leaves unutilised some of the most redoubtable weapons of latter-day warfare, such for instance, as the aeroplane, the dirigible, and the submarine. The circumstance that you have eschewed these inventions is, to my mind, proof sufficient that you had adequate motives. But, doubtless, the public would be well pleased to become acquainted with them."

"The critics who would have me employ airships of one kind or another," answered the Minister, "in order to drop bombs upon the enemy's war vessels in the Aegean are laymen who are not conversant with this subject. I am. I have studied it specially. The conclusions at which I arrived warrant my resolve to keep to the tried and approved methods of war. What result worth having worth paying heavily for, could be expected from an airship flying at the rate of from sixty to 100 kilometres an hour, and while in full flight dropping a relatively small object upon a target very far below? It is impossible to take aim from an airship in the ordinary sense of the term. You cannot possibly do it. And the theory of probabilities reduces your chance of hitting the ship, without aiming at it to the vanishing point. This is no mere theory; we have had the truth brought home to us in the literal sense of the word. In Africa our men, camped on the fringe of the desert, have been the objective of attacks carefully organised from airships. The conditions were more favourable for our enemies than they would be for us. They had a motionless target, the camp; it offered a larger area than a warship. And bomb after bomb was thrown down, but they all fell very wide of the mark, and might have been mere sandbags for all the damage they inflicted. Such results are not calculated to tempt us to imitate our enemies. I admit that the conditions under which a dirigible would work are not quite the same. There, a relatively stationary position could be obtained if circumstances happened to be propitious, whereas the aeroplane is compelled to move on all the time. If the dirigible encounters a head wind of the same force as the fair wind that had been driving it, it ceases to move for a moment, it becomes relatively stationary. But the concrete use that can be made of this is not worth mentioning. No, aerial navigation is music of the future. We must wait until it can give results worth striving for. During the present war it will remain what it is, a negligible quantity. That is why I have spent no money on these latter-day 'weapons of war.'

"What you say is highly interesting," I remarked, "and will give pause to those phrasemongers who talk glibly of the hydroplane as the latest thing in national defences, seeing that it can drop a bomb weighing over 400 lb. from a considerable height into a Dreadnought, almost without ever missing. That is the claim. The so-called 'stabilizer,' which keeps airships stationary while the military men are throwing down explosives, is another of the innovations they have been advocating. Not being competent to offer an opinion, I am very glad to learn yours. And so, too, will the public be. 'Tried and found wanting is your verdict,' 'That's it,' replied Mahmoud Shevket Pasha.

"Another matter of regret which I have heard expressed here in Turkey turns upon the inactivity of the Ottoman fleet. Your own people give vent to lamentations because no attempt has as yet been made to let loose a submarine against any of the hostile line of battleships. They urge that a torpedo boat or a submarine, small though it be when compared to a Dreadnought, is capable of annihilating the giant ship. Yet you can buy twenty-five submarines for the price of one of the greatest battleships."

Mahmoud Shevket's eyes twinkled as he answered: "In conversation and in print all those theses which you have outlined sound or look well. They fire the imagination. But they won't do much more just yet. The submarines promise much, but achieve little. A glance at the history of their performances will make that clear. And if, as is maintained, they can glide about so swiftly, so imperceptibly and so far, why has not our enemy done the thing which your question suggests? Our ships are just out there: you have seen them. Why not destroy them if the feat be indeed so easy as is assumed? There must be some good ground for this forbearance on the part of our foe. Well, let me tell you that it lies in the limitations of the submarine and the torpedo-boat, in their present shape. If you study their speed under water, the distance they can be relied on to go alone, the difficulty of manœuvring them when not on the surface, and other conditions on which their usefulness ultimately depends, you will see cause to demur to the opinion of the critics whom you quote and to agree with me that they are not the weapons for the present struggle."

Here I should like to open a parenthesis in order to say that I have this evening pursued the matter further, and questioned another public man, one of the most eminent in the Empire, on the same subject. And this is what he told me: "You cannot put your trust in submarines, at least not yet awhile. Even under favourable circumstances, hardly more than 5 per cent. of the mines launched against a battleship actually hit it. And a hit does not by any means involve its destruction. Many people imagine it does, but that is an error. Three or four mines are required, at the very least, to blow up a Dreadnought. In the Russo-Japanese War, I remember, a Russian ship, the Tszarevitch, I think, was struck and damaged by a mine launched by the enemy. But it continued to fight, and after having done considerable damage to Japanese vessels, got back to a Chinese port without outside assistance. To get from one to three hits at a battleship you want at least thirty submarines, costing some three million pounds sterling, which is the price of a Dreadnought! And when you have them you may wait long before they justify the outlay on them.

"But I may give you another reason—although you have had enough already—why the experiment is not feasible. If we had the submarines we could not use them. Our men are not trained. Courage there is enough and to spare, as you well know. But technical skill and dexterity in the use of these vessels are and must be lacking among our men. Foreigners? Yes, there might be found foreigners both willing and able. But . . . In fact, there was, I believe, a spontaneous offer made by some friendly officers of a nation, which shall be nameless. They were ready to run the risks. But our Government thanked them, and declined their proposal. Why? I cannot say."

But to return to the Turkish War Minister. I said: "As yet these, the Italians, have produced no effect in the way of shaking the Government's determination to fight on to the bitter end or of cooling the patriotic fire of the nation. The capture of the islands I know has left these things as they were. But suppose for a moment that they bombard Smyrna, land troops there, capture the city, and treat it as they have dealt with Rhodes. Would that make . . ." Before I had got to the end of my sentence the War Minister's eyes flashed, and, interrupting me, he exclaimed: "I will say but one thing: We await them in Smyrna." "Yes, we await them there." "Their sudden appearance before Smyrna would not come as a surprise to you?" "No. We are ready for them. Let them come."

Here, again, I should like to make a digression. One of the most eminent military authorities in Turkey whose words on these particular questions carry more weight than those of anyone else, said to me to-day: "Italy cannot surprise us now in Smyrna, and without a surprise she can do nothing. If she ever entertained the scheme of attacking Smyrna, it behoved her to execute it when her ships appeared before Rhodes and Stampalia. That was the most auspicious moment for action. It has passed now, and cannot be recalled. Smyrna at present is in an excellent state of defence; men, munitions of war, reserves, supplies, three lines of communication, in fact, everything a commander could desire, is there. And it is getting a good commander. We cannot say that the Italians have impressed us as a fighting people, either on sea or land. We may be prejudiced against them, but look at the facts. Take but one group: the bombardment of the Dardanelles. What was the practical good of it all? Nil. You can go and look at the shelled places if you like, and you will see that it is so. They gained nothing. They fired some three hundred missiles—more or less—at our works on the shore of the Dardanelles, without inflicting five pounds' worth of damage. Yet each of those projectiles cost, roughly speaking, about £120. And over and above, you must bear in mind the enormous damage which the firing did to their own guns, which deteriorate rapidly. Here, then, was a vast sum of money flung, so to say, into the sea. Our gunners, on the other hand, who responded slowly, and had moving targets to aim at, hit two Italian ships and injured them sensibly. Yet we do not claim to be a naval people."

"You ask me why we, on our part, fell into the error of leaving on the islands garrisons too small to withstand the enemy, and therefore destined to be taken prisoners, and why we gave them artillery. My answer is, we made no mistake. The arms and the men were left there, not to resist the invasion, but to keep order on the island and hinder a massacre during the approach of the enemy's squadron. As soon as the Italians appeared, fierce passions broke loose, and would, in some cases, have cooled their fire in human gore had our soldiers not been present to maintain order and enforce respect for law. It is true that the garrison of Rhodes was ready to make a gallant stand against the foe, but it was foiled by the treachery of the non-Moslem elements there, who pillaged the army stores, and in other ways paralysed the activity of the army. But, after all, that is but a little thing. The islands cannot be defended successfully. Yet some of them can, and will, be defended resolutely. Mitylene is one. If attacked it will resist gallantly, and keep the enemy busy for at least eight or ten days. So, too, will certain other islands. But it is better to say little and do much."

And now to come back to Mahmoud Shevket Pasha. I said to him, "in foreign countries the view has often been put forward that the Ottoman Empire has no navy ready to meet that of Italy, the outcome of the contest is a foreign conclusion." "Yes, I know. Many such judgments have been delivered since the beginning of the war by volunteer critics and prophets. I am no politician. I am a soldier. My duty is to defend the territory of my country. I have done it; I am doing it, and I mean to continue to do it. The task of our army is to prevent the enemy from taking and appropriating what belongs of right to us. And that task we will discharge." "With success you think?" "Most certainly I do. Not only do I believe, as all the world does, in the justice of our cause, but I have faith in its triumph. What sort of a defence could I offer if I lacked that heartening faith? I possess it in the highest degree, and so, too, does the army."

"Well, how will the war end?" I asked. "It cannot go on for ever. What is your forecast of the last act?" "That is a question which cannot be answered," rejoined the Minister, "without data of a political character, if, indeed, it can be answered, even then. Turkey did not commence the war. Her attitude is defensive. And defensive it will remain. She is striving to save the people of Tripoli from being forcibly brought under the sway of Italy. And she will succeed. We have not broken the peace of Europe. We are only defending ourselves against an unprovoked attack. It is not, therefore, for us to say when the struggle will end. That question should be addressed to the aggressors. We will not yield an inch. We have it in our power to defend our own successfully against our present foe. And we mean to do it."

After this declaration the conversation took another turn, and in the course of it the War Minister uttered more than one interesting statement, which I may reproduce later on.

—The Daily Telegraph.

The Modernisation of Turkey.

THE Frankfurter Zeitung devotes an interesting leading article to the present movement in Albania. It says that the transition of backward actions to modern civilization is always a painful process accompanied by many relapses and many dangers. There is, however, one condition which is absolutely necessary for the successful accomplishment of this transition—freedom from disturbance from outside and from interference with its progress. This was the happy lot of Japan, but is not the lot of Turkey. Turkey may have some disadvantages as compared with Japan, such as the absence of historical culture (?) or of national unity, but she also possesses great advantages in the form of great inner strength, moral vigour, and youthful freshness. There is no reason to doubt that she would have succeeded in accomplishing her process of transition to a modern State if she had not been disturbed by her neighbours.

In point of fact, however, "scarcely was Young Turkey born in 1908, requiring all the quietness she could get than Austria-Hungary abused the situation for the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Simultaneously Bulgaria tore herself formally off. The Greek aspirations remained as vivid and aggressive as before. Montenegro and this or the other great Power lent their support to the Albanian insurrections. England continued her undermining work in Arabia. Russian intrigues and military action in Persia created a strong unrest on the Eastern frontier. Lastly, came the attack by Italy on the African provinces and the attempts by Russia to get some profit out of it so as to recompense herself for her defeat in Manchuria. Where was Young Turkey, amidst all these international complications and aggressions, to find the peace and concentration of mind that were necessary for the realisation of fundamental reforms? It was not unnatural that she should have concentrated all her material strength on the reorganisation of the army. Neither in men nor in means was the young country rich enough to be able to spare so much for the work of administration, education, and industrial development as the best of her leaders certainly had wanted. With all that one cannot say that Young Turkey has, in the course of these brief four years, accomplished less than could have been in all fairness expected and demanded from her. And yet crisis follows upon crisis, exterior and interior crisis, and to judge by some of the news arriving from Turkey, one may almost fear the outbreak of another revolution."

The article proceeds to describe the present mutiny of Albanian officers, and concludes: "The Ottoman Empire, even apart from the war with Italy, is in such a precarious condition that every internal convulsion spells danger to its life. We who stand outside, we, Germans, above all, have every reason to wish Turkey that she may sustain this crisis and emerge from it vigorous as before—we Germans above all, since we must never forget that we are not in the least interested in the heritage, but very much so in the life of the Ottoman Empire."

The Young Turks and German Friendship.

THE Berliner Tageblatt publishes an interesting interview with Husein Djahid Bey, the well-known editor of the Tanin, who has passed through Berlin on his way to Norway. "Is it true," he was asked, "that Young Turkish policy has of late assumed an Anglophile direction?" Djahid Bey replied: "It would be too much to speak of an 'Anglophile direction.' We are still hesitating, though the war has undoubtedly damaged Turco-German relations. The Young Turks were the best friends of Germany, but experience has shown them that Germany's love for Turkey is on all really important questions only platonic. This has made us think. If you were to ask me what it is exactly that we expect from closer relations with England, I should really not be able to reply definitely. It is, however, but human that we should seek (new) friendships, having become disappointed in our friendship with Germany. Of course we quite recognise the difficult position in which Germany finds herself. She cannot attack Italy if the latter stretches out her hand for Tripoli. But a few years ago another German ally took from us Bosnia-Herzegovina. Of what use to us is such a friendship? We must thank our lucky stars that Germany has not ten more allies."

With equal bitterness Djahid Bey spoke of Baron von Marschall. "His position in Constantinople," said Djahid Bey, "became rather difficult. Before the outbreak of the war we were assured by Baron von Marschall that Italy would not attack Tripoli. He advised us rather to recall Ibrahim Pasha from Tripoli, since his activity was irritating to the Italians. We recalled Ibrahim Pasha, and when the war broke out Tripoli had neither a governor nor troops."

In the course of the interview the editor of the Tanin took the opportunity to repudiate the construction that had been put upon his remarks (quoted in the Manchester Guardian) concerning the possibility of negotiating with Italy upon the basis of the latter's sovereignty over the Libyan coast. The representatives of the Powers, he said, had at once rushed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs to ascertain whether the Tanin was voicing the opinions of the Porte. The interpretation, however, was false—Turkey stood where she did from the beginning; she was prepared to submit the entire case to the Hague Tribunal, but otherwise she would not yield an inch of Tripoli voluntarily.

The Arab Conference in Tripoli.

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade.")

(FROM THE "AL-ALAM" CORRESPONDENT.)

BENGHAZI, June 23.

WHEN the Italians gave currency to the report that peace was about to be concluded between Italy and Turkey, the whole Arab population was greatly perturbed and distressed. On the 23rd June all the heads of the Sennusi Zawiyas and the leaders of Arab tribes gathered together in the Turkish camp and unanimously took a most solemn vow to the following effect:—

"We call God and all his angels to witness that we will never, under any circumstances, acquiesce in any such treaty of peace with Italy as would give them the least power of interference in the affairs of this country—whatever justification might be advanced for the interference and whatever shape it might take. And we will never consent to any terms except that Tripoli should permanently remain a purely Islamic land under the protection of the Caliph. Failing to secure such terms we do solemnly vow that the sword will continue to be in our hands as long as a single man from amongst us is left alive in the desert."

All the Turkish officers and soldiers have also joined in this vow. Under such circumstances no gain whatever can accrue to Italy even if it succeeds in making some treaty with the Sublime Porte, inasmuch as the inhabitants of the country themselves and their protectors, the Turkish army, would not be at all prepared to accept it—the more so, in view of the experience which they have so recently gained of their own strength and capacity to offer stubborn resistance. The fear, the perplexity and the weakness of their opponents is becoming increasingly manifest to them.

The Turkish Government, too, will be unable to accept any treaty which must be wholly repugnant to the Arab subjects of the Sultan.

The Italians bombarded Kowaiza, Talmia and Tokra from the sea and fired 320 shells. Except that one Arab was killed in Kowaiza, all the shells were wasted.

It is rumoured in the most reliable circles in Benghazi that General Bricola, the Italian Commander, is greatly hampered by the financial stringency which has begun to weigh on the activities of the Italian army. He is reported to have negotiated a big loan with a Jewish financier named Khwaja Haroon Mitri.

The Attitude of Turkey.

IN reply to a suggestion repeatedly made by the Continental, and especially the French, press that if Italy were wise and withdrew her annexation decree she could easily obtain peace on the basis of a de facto possession of Tripoli, the Tanin, whose connections with the official world are notorious, makes the following declaration:—"We repudiate the idea that peace cannot be concluded because Italy would not consent to the establishment of a régime analogous to that of Egypt and Tunis. Turkey does not seek any subterfuge in order to escape from the Tripoli difficulty. We are not shedding our blood for the shadow of sovereignty—we are defending a real sovereignty." It then, however, makes a significant observation. "We think it necessary to make known this view so that Europe may not find herself later on in the presence of unexpected results. Italy could only assert the right of conquest over Tripoli if she were actually to occupy the whole of the country. We could then try to find a way of coming to an understanding. As it is, however, Italy can only assert her right of conquest over the coast which she is occupying. Consequently negotiations can only refer to her sovereignty over these points."

The French press makes no comment upon the concluding remark, but some of the German journals, such as the Postische Zeitung, attach to it great importance, interpreting it as an attempt "to restore the wire between Constantinople and Rome."

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says :—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him.....Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{4}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully, which I share is that British policy in India should have three objects in view. The first, which we believe to be assisted by our present policy as explained in the third paragraph of the Despatch, is if possible to devolve on Local and Provincial Governments as many functions of Government as can safely be entrusted to them. The second is to employ as many Indians in the public service as reasonably can be employed. The third is to combine the pursuit of these two objects with the maintenance and permanence of British rule in India, because, we believe, that the perpetual continuance of British rule is the best way to secure the happiness of the Indian people.

"Of course, there is some difference of opinion as to the extent to which provincial autonomy is possible, even with regard to the meaning of words of local autonomy. On a previous occasion, I pointed out that Lord Curzon had spoken of provincial autonomy in matters of finance. I am certain that he did not mean by that, that the Provinces ought to be allowed to raise and spend revenue as and how they pleased. What His Lordship evidently meant was, that a larger share of public expenditure should be left to local collection and expenditure on a defined principle. Therefore, in this connection again, it is reasonable to suppose that certain limits which need not be small or tightly drawn are intended to exist as between the Provincial and the Central Government.

"There has been a second misunderstanding in the use of the word 'goal,' describing lines on which the Government of India desires to work, the road along which the Government of India desires to travel, being thus mixed with a supposed possible termination of that road on which an entirely new form of Government will be found to exist. I venture to say there is no kind of permanent position which the Government of India ought to have in view. It cannot have in view what some Indians describe as "Swaraj." Therefore, although it desires to advance along the road of including in the Government of India as many native inhabitants as possible, it does not, I do not believe it will ever, speak of a final goal which it desires to reach. I reiterate that there is nothing in the teachings of history or of recent conditions of the world which can make the dream of the complete self-government of India within the British Empire even remotely probable. We have succeeded in weaving into the Empire two European races, the French in Canada and the Dutch in South Africa. We are now trying to solve with them problems of general defence, giving the component parts of the Empire a share in the shaping of Imperial policy. Can anybody conceive a similar solution of the Imperial problem for hundreds of millions of men of an altogether different race from our own? Is it conceivable that at any time an Indian Empire could exist on the lines of Australia and New Zealand with no British officials or troops, no ties of creed or blood replacing those material bonds?" "I am far from saying that such an ideal is an ignoble one or that those holding it ought to be described as disloyal. There are some who believe it possible to secure in India the continual presence, influence and service of men of British blood with no prospect of a violent rupture between these two races. I believe that on the lines I have laid down there is ample scope both for service and distinction for men of Indian births, and of the different races. I see wide growing fields for the full play and exercise of the remarkable special qualities of the Indian intellect. I can imagine there are gifted, most estimable

The Week.

Indian Home Rule.

In the House of Lords on 29th July Lord Inchcape called attention to the difference in the statements of Members of the Government with regard to the Government of India's despatch of 25th August last year.

Lord Crewe, replying, said that in connection with this subject a series of legends had grown up. In the first place, the Government of India was supposed in the third paragraph to have pointed to Swaraj, Self-Government or Home Rule for India, as the aim and object of its policy of which the change of capital to Delhi was a part. Lord Crewe continued: "The legend proceeded that there were differences in meaning or intention between the Government of India, myself and Mr. Montagu. The whole of this legend is absolutely baseless. As regards Mr. Montagu's excellent speech at Cambridge so little did I conceive that he had said or desired to say anything different from what I had said in the House of Lords that I never even called his attention to the particular passage in his speech which, of course, I otherwise should have done. The Government of India was of opinion that this and some cases of misrepresentations of our meaning were due to the use of the word autonomy in the Despatch. It is possible that this caused some confusion but the opinion of the Government of India men loath to abandon the idea that they or somebody like them may be Premier of an Indian Dominion, or, Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army, but I think it is only those who think less of service and more of distinction who would lose heart if they braced themselves to set aside this vision altogether and settle down to closer co-operation with this Western race, for the moral bettering of the country to which they are so deeply attached and of which we are so proud to be the Government."

Lord Lansdowne then spoke. He said that Lord Crewe's speech showed an undercurrent of uneasiness with regard to the effect of the memorable paragraph and of Mr. Montagu's interpretations in India and England. Lord Lansdowne quoted passages from Mr. Montagu's speeches which, he argued, was irreconcilable with Lord Crewe's views of the Despatch. He said that Lord Crewe's three points of policy was incontrovertible. Everything must depend on tact and patience, and especially on the caution with which these principles were followed out. He was glad that Lord Crewe had realised that some statement was necessary to dissipate the apprehensions aroused.

Lord Courtney said that an attempt had been made to solve a mystery. They had better leave the mystery to solve itself. Nobody was competent to pronounce the final word. He himself was unable to see what could replace British Rule in India. But he said we ought to be content with the process going on without speculations about the entire withdrawal of British influence. It was surely unwise in view of what was happening in the East to attempt to put a limit for future developments. It was enough for the present to persevere in the present wise policy and leave the future on the knees of the gods.

Lord Crewe explained that he had not desired to indulge in positive prophecies as to the ultimate future of India. But he objected to being described as sharing dreams which he did not share. He agreed that to attempt to look too far ahead was unwise.

Irish Home Rule.

MR. BONAR LAW spoke at a Unionist demonstration on 27th July and reviewed the political situation. He said the Government had refused to consider the separate treatment of Ulster. If the Government attempted to use troops against the Ulsterites, they would start civil war, which would shatter the Empire. Proceeding, he said that the Unionists would undertake two great reforms, the housing of working classes and helping agricultural life by creating small holders. (Cheers.) He deplored the condition of British credit, which he said was due to the threats of Government. He affirmed that the first plank in the Unionist platform was Tariff Reform and Imperial Preference. (Applause.)

The Strike.

THE strike ended on 27th July. The Strike Committee has issued a manifesto recommending immediate resumption of work saying that this is better than abject humiliation, especially as the men have exhausted every reasonable means of conciliation. The manifesto declares that all agreements prior to the dispute must be maintained.

It is announced on 28th July on behalf of the men that the strike will be resumed. This, however, does not effect the situation at the docks where work is active with a continuously increasing staff. Many have undoubtedly returned to work during the last few weeks but thousands will find their places filled. Employers maintain a firm attitude.

Canada.

It is believed that the Canadian ministers have invited Messrs. Asquith and Churchill to visit Canada in the autumn, while the Dominion Cabinet is discussing the naval plans. Mr. Churchill will probably accept the invitation.

Mr. Borden, who has returned from Paris, was presented with the Freedom of the Leather Sellers Company. In his speech he said that Canada was not inclined to become a silent partner in the work of carrying on the Empire. Canadians were determined that the Empire should be maintained and the seas kept open. Britons throughout the world would continue the great work of civilisation.

The Mikado.

Reuter wires from Tokio on July 26th:—The Mikado is dead. The Japanese Embassy in London is deluged with condolences.

The British, French and Italian press publish eulogistic obituary notices of the late Emperor of Japan, extolling his services in the development of civilisation in Japan and in its transformation into a great power. The Times compares the late Emperor with William I. and says that the sympathy of Great Britain is extended to the Japanese Imperial family and people on the death of their beloved Emperor. The journal is convinced that the decease does not mean a change in the policy of Japan.

His Excellency the Viceroy has asked the Japanese Consul-General to convey to the Japanese Government his sincere regret and that of the Government of India at the death of the Emperor, the illustrious ally of England.

IN THE House of Commons on 30th July Mr. Asquith announced that to-morrow he will move an address to His Majesty expressing deep regret at the death of His Majesty's ally and friend the Mikado, and praying that His Majesty will convey to the new Emperor of Japan, the profound sympathy of the House of Commons with the Imperial Family, and the Government and people of Japan.

The King has cabled his condolence to the Crown Prince.

Asiatics for German Colonies.

REUTER wires from Cape Town:—Dr. Solf, German Colonial Secretary, who is visiting South Africa, was interviewed at Cape Town. He said that the importation of Asiatic labour into German South-West Africa was imminent.

REUTER wires from Johannesburg:—Dr. Solf, German Colonial Secretary, denies having said that the importation of Asiatics into South-West Africa was imminent. He thought the Home Government would not object if Asiatics proved absolutely necessary but anyhow, it was uncertain whether the Chinese Government would consent to the restrictive conditions imposed.

Egypt.

REUTER wires from Cairo on July 29th:—Three men charged with being concerned in the conspiracy against the Khedive and Kitchener have been committed for trial.

The Cairo correspondent of the Times cabled on 29th July:—"The investigations which are being conducted have revealed the existence of a secret society and the Nationalist Party is seriously compromised. Startling discoveries have been made, but their publication is improbable on account of reasons of State. Letters from Ali Kamel, who is now undergoing three months' imprisonment, and from Hassan Kamel, who was arrested on Saturday, have been seized."

A later telegram says:—"The men arrested in connexion with an alleged plot against the Khedive, Lord Kitchener, and the Premier have appealed to the Courts to be set free, but their application has been refused. The Parquet heard the evidence of two Alexandrine Europeans, who testified that Hassan Kamel informed them of his intention to assassinate a high personage. The police are 'shadowing' a large number of suspected Nationalists."

Afghanistan.

RELIABLE news has been received from Khost at Lahore on July 26th to the effect that a settlement has been arrived at by the Afghan General Nadir Khan with all the sections of Mangals and Ahmadzais. General Nadir Khan is now proceeding via the Zambur Pass to Mutun, the headquarters of the valley. The Khost rebellion may, therefore, now be looked upon as at an end, though how long peace will be maintained is a matter upon which much difference of opinion exists.

It is stated that the settlement with Mangals in the Khost Valley has been all in favour of the tribesmen. No Afghan officers or troops are to be stationed in their country and they will pay a lump sum annually instead of land revenue and taxes.

There is no probability of the blood feud between Yar Mahomed Khan and the family of Usman Khan recently murdered by treachery at the former's village of Chura, developing into a general quarrel between the Maliddin Khel and Zakka Khel Afridis as the majority of the tribesmen are indifferent spectators of the feud.

China.

REUTER wires from Peking:—Yuan-Shai-Ka has triumphantly overcome the obstruction in the National Assembly which after rejecting his nominees for the Cabinet has now confirmed five and rejected only one, who is a member of the Southerners' party.

Tibet.

REPLYING to a question by Major Archer Shee with reference to the maintenance of status quo in Tibet, as it was at the time of the signature of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, Sir Edward Grey said on 26th July that Sir John Jordan, British Minister at Peking, acting under instructions, had protested against any change being made in the political status of Tibet at variance with the Anglo-Tibetan treaties and with the complete undertakings which China has given to Great Britain. He did not think that it was desirable at present to approach Russia with a view to a variation of the agreement in the direction of allowing a British agent to be sent to Lhasa. He trusted it would be possible for status quo to be preserved in accordance with the existing agreements.

Haj Pilgrims.

WITH a view to prevent Indian pilgrims from being stranded in the Hedjaz without sufficient funds to enable them to return to their homes, the Government of India desire to impress upon all pilgrims the extreme desirability in their own interests of either securing return steamer tickets before leaving Bombay or other port of departure or of depositing money sufficient to cover cost of the return journey at the British Consulate in Jeddah.

Public Service Commission.

IN THE course of his speech in the House of Commons on July 30th Mr. Montagu announced the appointment of a Royal Commission to examine and report upon the following matters in connection with the Indian Civil Service and other Civil Services, Imperial and Provincial.

Firstly, the methods of recruitment and systems of training and probation ;

Secondly, the conditions of service in regard to salary, leave and pension ;

Thirdly, such limitations as still exist as to the employment of non-Europeans and the working of the existing system of division of Services into Imperial and Provincial, and generally to consider the requirements of the Public Services and recommend such changes as may seem expedient.

The members of the Commission are :—

Lord Islington, Chairman.

Lord Ronaldshay

Sir Murray Hammick.

Sir Theodore Morison.

Sir Valentine Chirol.

Mr. F. G. Sly, I.C.S.

Mr. Mahadev Bhasker Chaulal, Member of the Bombay Executive Council.

Mr. G. K. Gokhale.

Mr. W. C. Madge, Member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council.

Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim, Madras High Court.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

Mr. Laurens Fisher.

Mr. Gokhale.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" LONDON CORRESPONDENT.)

I UNDERSTAND the Marquis of Crewe has paid the Hon. G. K. Gokhale a marked compliment. The King and Queen are to honour the Secretary of State for India by dining at Crewe House in Mayfair on Wednesday, 24th instant and Mr. Gokhale will, I hear, be one of the fellow guests of Their Majesties on the occasion.

Sind Education Cess.

THE Government of India, it is understood, have accepted the principle of the Sind Muhammadan Education Cess Bill, a measure which is now pending before the Bombay Legislative Council and if the Bill be eventually passed it will assist greatly the development of Moslem Education in Sind.

"Burma Critic" Case.

BEFORE a Full Bench of the Chief Court of Lower Burma, composed of all the five Judges on 1st August Mr. Guy Rutledge, Government Advocate, appeared to show cause why the committal order of the District Magistrate of Rangoon, in the defamation case G. P. Andrew, I.C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Mergui, versus C. Arnold, Editor and part proprietor, of Burma Critic, should not be set aside as being illegal. Counsel said, he would have welcomed the idea if the defence had called their evidence in the lower court, which would have given him an opportunity of ascertaining their credibility and character. He could not say he was legally prejudiced but he would have preferred to have met that evidence so far as this province was concerned, this Court was unfettered by legal authority on the point regarding the stage at which proceedings could be stopped by the Magistrate.

Mr. Hamlyn for Mr. Arnold submitted that his client had been discredited by the Magistrate's action in committing him to the Sections at the stage he did, namely, the cross-examination of the complainant. Counsel cited the "Calcutta Law Journal" volume XVI, July 1912, the latest authority which fitted the present case to a nicety. It was held that if a Magistrate made up his mind to commit a case to a Court of Session before the case for the prosecution was absolutely closed, one witness for the prosecution remaining to be examined and the defence had applied to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses. The defence were entitled to the indulgence of cross-examining the prosecution witnesses. In the present case the Magistrate, having stopped his cross-examination where he did, deprived him of the chance of having the accused discharged and the summons dismissed. Counsel submitted that the Magistrate's action was altogether wrong in adopting 36, Cal. page 48, and the case in Ratan Lal's Unreported Cases, page 975, which, in Counsel's opinion, did not interpret the law rightly.

The Court reserved orders.

Obituary.

THE deaths are announced of Mr. Allan Hume, Late Bengal Civil Service and the Archbishop of Cologne.

New Universities.

A PRESS Communiqué, dated Simla, 26th July, states:—In view of the recent announcement it is important to state that the decision in regard to the affiliation to the proposed Universities of Aligarh and Benares is the decision of the Secretary of State and that it is final.

Moslem Education.

A MEETING of the promoters of the Muhammadan University at Aligarh will be held at Lucknow on 12th August and a deputation will probably proceed afterwards to Simla.

At a meeting of the Executive Council of the Bengal Presidency Moslem League held on the 28th July 1912, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:—That in order to meet the growing demand of the Muhammadans for higher education and in consideration of the fact that a large number of Moslem students are every year refused admission to the Presidency and other colleges, a representation be submitted to Government for the establishment of a first grade College for Muhammadan students in Calcutta and to make provision for the admission of Muhammadan students to the Presidency and the Medical Colleges, and (2) that the Council view with great disappointment the decision of the Government of India and the Secretary of State that the scope of the proposed Moslem University will be confined to the local limits of Aligarh and the Council respectfully but emphatically protest against the decision which they do not accept as a settled fact and hope that in view of the fact that large contributions have been made to the University fund from all parts of India, the Government will see their way to reconsider their decision in regard to affiliation.

Indian Criminals.

"COMMISSIONER" BOOTH-TUCKER of the Salvation Army, who has arrived in Bombay on 29th July, gives an interesting account of the arrangement made between the Punjab Government and the Salvation Army for the assistance of prisoners discharged from the Borstal Central Jail, Lahore. The prisoners will have an opportunity of passing the last few months of their sentences in the Salvation Army Home where they will have an opportunity of being employed industrially and earn a wage of four annas a day, the best workmen being transferred later to the Salvation Army model village if they choose.

Honorary Officers.

THE Madras Government have decided that a trial be given in this Presidency to the system of appointing honorary officers to relieve Revenue officials of a portion of their work. The honorary officers will be designated Honorary Deputy Collectors and will be appointed for three years in the first instance and will be eligible for reappointment thereafter. They will, for the present, be entrusted with the disposal of applications and trial of suits under the Madras Estates Land Act I of 1908. The Government consider the most suitable persons for appointment would be the retired Government officials of the grade of Deputy Collector and Tahsildar but do not lay down any hard and fast rules.

Indian Budget Debate.

MR. MONTAGU in introducing the India Budget on 31st July said he was going to announce a departure in policy which was of great importance. Referring to the Abor Expedition he paid a tribute to General Bower and the other gallant officers and the men, and expressed sympathy with those who had lost their lives.

"Of course," he said, "the outstanding feature of last year was the visit of Their Majesties, whose welcome enhanced by their own personality was echoed from end to end of the Indian Empire. I do not want to risk the anger of critics, but I want to reiterate the belief that there is a growing spirit of nationality in India, the direct product of British rule. There is growing up in India a caste of educated Indians discussing the affairs of the nation in English. It is small wonder that educated persons in India should welcome the King who is the representative of the unity which is Britain's gift to them. Beyond these are the uneducated classes who welcomed the King because of the peace, tranquility and growing prosperity produced by those governing India on his behalf.

There is the old doctrine that we govern India by the sword. I do not want to dispute a fundamental truth, but I want to assert that it is because we govern India by the consent of those who know and the cheerful acquiescence of those who do not realise all it means, that His Majesty's welcome was so wide and real. I do not propose to trespass on the more debateable ground of the administrative results of the visit. The Lords and Commons had their say. I stated my case with regard to the removal of capital from the provincial centre, and the Partition of Bengal, and I am bound to adhere to the opinion I expressed that the important misgivings of the commercial community of Calcutta will prove unfounded.

Reviewing the financial position, Mr. Montagu said "it was highly satisfactory to report that the general economic conditions were more favourable than had been anticipated. He thought the House would agree that it was right to treat the surplus as the outcome of a financial condition which could not be relied upon to recur and apply it to special non-recurring purposes.

Referring to the New Delhi, he said that the site recommended by the Expert Committee lay south west of Delhi. The ground was virgin soil and drainage was simplified by the fall of the ground towards the river. Although no plan for laying out the city had been finally decided upon, it was safe to say that a park not less than a thousand yards in width would intervene between the walls of Old and New Delhi. It was hoped that the city would grow up to be the enduring seat of the British Government firmly planted in the affections of the people. The cost of the new capital was estimated at four million pounds sterling. The Architects for the Government Buildings had not yet been chosen. They did not intend to build private residences and shops but would let others build. It was anticipated that New Delhi would prove a serious burden on the finances of the country. If new taxation was going to be imposed for the purpose of providing a surplus, or remission of taxation was refused or money withheld from administrative needs, then the objections in India would have weight. But there was no idea of creating a surplus in any of these ways. There would not be new taxation and remission of taxation would not be prevented, because while New Delhi was being built the opium revenue would be disappearing and it was not the Government's intention to propose remission of taxation which would be reimposed.

Mr. Montagu referred to the passages in his Budget speeches in 1911 and 1912 to the effect that social rather than political changes were required in India and continued, "I want now to devote attention to one problem which I believe underlies all other problems in India, namely, education. Indian students in England are a very serious problem. The educational facilities here are often purchased at an exorbitant price. It may well be that the solution of some of the difficulties will be found in providing better facilities in India itself, but while they are here it is our duty to welcome our Indian fellow subjects to the best of our ability. Mr. Montagu admitted the difficulty of interesting men and women in England in Indian problems, but he humbly appealed to them to show some hospitality which would be work of the utmost value to the Empire. "I do not want to go into details. I have had ample proof of the serious consequences of allowing Indian students to believe that the majority of women with whom they come into most easy contact in the lonely lives they lead in lodging houses are typical of English womanhood." He appealed to undergraduates in big Universities not to allow the Indian visitor to be segregated or isolated or rudely treated.

Mr. Montagu reviewed the work which Mr. Arnold's organisation in Cromwell Road had performed. The scheme had been inaugurated in 1909 and had fully justified itself. It had grown far beyond the control of the original organisation. Mr. Montagu paid a tribute to Mr. Arnold and his assistant, but said that re-organisation was necessary.

Referring to the appointment of Mr. C. E. Mallet as Secretary for Indian Students, Mr. Montagu said that what was required was knowledge of the conduct of public office. Mr. Mallet would be a link between the Secretary of State and their various organisations in India. Mr. Arnold's work was confined to the guardianship and care of Indian students in London. Mr. Montagu hoped that each University enrolling Indian students would appoint an officer similar to Mr. Arnold. Lord Crewe was willing to assist such efforts financially.

The Committee appointed to enquire regarding Industrial and Technological Students have not yet reported, but Mr. Montagu understood that all the members were agreed with regard to the importance of practical training. He was concerned at the difficulty experienced by Indians in getting it. India was going to develop great industries and her young men were going to learn to manage them. If they would not learn here, they would go abroad. When they returned to India they would give orders for plants to those countries with whose processes they were familiar.

Referring to education in India, Mr. Montagu reviewed their difficulties in the way of universal education owing to the scattered population, the apathy or hostility of many parents and scarcity of teachers. But the difficulties should serve as an incentive to greater activity. Government thought that Mr. Gokhale's estimate of his proposals was a sanguine one. Mr. Montagu said he hoped Mr. Gokhale would not misunderstand him when he urged patience. Universal free education in India must come as it had done in other countries, but the time was not yet. The Government was dictated by the same aims as that of Mr. Gokhale, but Government thought that the best thing was not to make education compulsory and free at present but to improve and multiply the schools. He alluded to the result of compulsion in this connection in Baroda. The grant for education announced at Delhi was but a prelude to a much more extensive programme. That programme was to increase the number of primary schools by 75 per cent. and to double the school-going population. New schools would be placed in villages at present without schools, and it was also intended to improve existing schools. The completion of programme would necessarily take some time. It was desired to make teaching more practical and more attractive. Teachers must at least pass the Upper Primary Schools standard and their pay to begin with would be 12 rupees a month. Teachers would be graded and pensionable.

Referring to higher education Mr. Montagu said it was proposed to extend model schools where required to co-operate with private or aided schools. Only graduates would be eligible for employment as teachers, with graded series of salaries ranging from Rs. 40 to 400 per mensem. The curriculum would be equal to the modern side of English Public Schools with manual training and science teaching. There would be an increased grant for properly managed schools and it was hoped to provide suitable hostel accommodation.

Referring to the Universities Mr. Montagu said the dangers of catastrophic change might be mitigated by the residential system which was most successful in moulding character and by the presence of English masters and professors who would know how much could be done by example. Speaking of the sanctioning of the Technological Institute at Cawnpore, he said that technical education was going to be advanced throughout India. The Government was going to be proud of their record, and if their educational ideals were realised, they would have laid the foundation of a national system of education by a network of really valuable schools, colleges and universities, so that Indian students would be able to qualify themselves in India for the highest position in every walk of life.

Mr. Montagu referred to the question of removing avoidable grievances under which Indians laboured while promoting the efficiency of the public service. There were debatable points upon which the authoritative pronouncement of a Royal Commission was desirable. As Indians became better educated, with a wider knowledge of the world, it became more important that we should not risk deterioration. He reviewed the present conditions of the Civil Service, especially in regard to the admission of Indians. "I do not want," he said, "to suggest that these services can be dealt with piecemeal, but there is a question for principle which has to be decided." He then announced details of the Commission as given above.

In conclusion Mr. Montagu dwelt on the moral and material progress in India. As India was a progressive country, two warnings were necessary. The first is that we cannot now, even if we want, embark on a policy of reaction. The mighty mass of India is moving in response to our own stimulus and to try to force it back into sleep would be to force it into unwilling sleep. That could only be achieved by repression, which would be a calamity. The second warning which I offer humbly is that it will never do to rely on out-of-date advice. If we do our duty, our enormous responsibilities, we must move forward however cautiously trying to keep ourselves as intimately informed as possible regarding the modern and changing aspects of problems. Nobody can possibly foretell what will be the eventual characteristics of the population of India.

Mr. Montagu said he had tried to show how not only the English people but the English language was vital to India. No one could deny the old aphorism that East is East and West is West, but a great Bengali had laid it down that they must meet at the Altar of humanity. What I want to point out is that they are not meeting in discord but in harmony. They are not mutually destructive but mutually complimentary. The golden thread of Oriental idealism is being woven into the cob web of our scheme of life, science and government, which we are handing down to the Oriental to show him the road of progress. East and West are united in India in building, let us hope successfully, a lasting temple of their joint ideas.

Mr. Wyndham advocated that Oriental architecture should be adopted in building new Delhi.

Referring to yesterday's debate in the House of Lords he said he hoped that the Government in announcing its policy would refrain in future from using terms capable of misinterpretation and of being regarded in India as promising more than it was in their power or intention to perform.

With regard to opium he deprecated outstripping the wants of India in our desire to carry out our engagement towards China.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald said he could not understand why Government set its face against the appointment of an independent Auditor and Accountant-General. Money was voted in India and was not always spent in accordance with the vote. In conclusion, he urged increase in the number of women doctors.

Mr. Charles Roberts, in moving his resolution dealing with opium and alcoholic liquors, said he hoped that the Government of India's connection with the sale of opium for other than medical purposes would be terminated as soon as possible and that the inhabitants of India would be given greater power in determining the location and number of liquor shops.

Mr. Theodore Taylor urged the Government to cease the cultivation of opium in its own territory and to substitute cotton.

Mr. Montagu said it was impossible to accept Mr. Roberts' amendment and he asked him to withdraw it, but not in any spirit of hostility to its purpose. Mr. Montagu added that the Government was familiar with the conditions in the Punjab and the Government of India would make every effort to lessen the evil. In regard to opium, the Government of India did not intend to reduce the area still under cultivation. They believed, as at present advised, that the recrudescence of poppy growing in China was only temporary. "The Chinese Government has assured us that they will adhere to the Convention and we do not propose to vary the agreement."

Mr. Montagu continued: "It is a bad moment to ask us to extinguish the Indian trade with China as it would encourage the people of China to break the law."

Mr. Roberts' amendment was withdrawn.

Replying to the criticisms of Lord Ronaldshay, Colonel Yate, Mr. Barton and others, Mr. Montagu said that the decrease in the Army Estimates was not due to any policy of retrenchment likely to jeopardise the defences of Empire. With regard to the extension of railways, it was not always easy to raise a large loan and they were compelled to modify their demand on the London Market in this respect.

"Our activities in Tibet were governed by the Anglo-Russian Convention, and came more into the sphere of Sir Edward Grey."

The Budget was passed after the closure had been applied.

Mr. Montagu stated last evening that orders had been issued to allow the gold standard reserve to increase until it reached 25 millions sterling of which five millions would be in gold.

TETE À TETE

THE Orient and the Occident are uniting in their sympathy with the Land of the Rising Sun in its recent overwhelming bereavement. The 46 years' "Era of Good Works," which span the reign of His late Imperial Majesty Mutsu Hito, has seen the Japanese nation transformed within the brief period of a single generation. When the late Mikado ascended the throne in 1867, Japan was a little-known island, steeped in ancient barbarism, dense ignorance and conservative imperviousness to the leaven of the new civilisation which was marching unswervingly with giant strides all over the world. A mere lad, he could hardly be expected to make any headway against the potent vested interests of a old-world feudalism. But, like the boy Akbar, the late Mikado—then in his teens—rose fully up to the heroism which such a situation demanded. And within an incredibly short time he had established himself thoroughly on his throne and in the confidence of his subjects, had consolidated his Empire—torn by the sanguinary civil wars of the all-powerful barons—and had started his country on that forward march of progress and of reform for which the radical semi-divine Mikado himself was more responsible than any other soul. Under the able pilotage of this gifted lad the Kingdom suffered itself to be invaded by Western social and political ideals, and absorbed them with such unqualified success that to-day Japan has been acknowledged by the greatest Powers of the modern World, to have "emerged into the forefront of the family of nations," as "a great naval and military Power with splendid record of stubborn, disciplined heroism." Richly did he deserve all posthumous compliments to his towering greatness of soul. In moral and intellectual advancement, in social and political reformation, in industrial and artistic regeneration Japan stands out pre-eminently alone as a model to all the Oriental, if not also to some of the Western countries. And it was the guiding spirit of Mutsu Hito by which the whole forward movement of Japan was actuated. No more eloquent testimony of this fact need be found than the matter-of-fact manner in which the great Admiral of Japan attributed his epoch-making destruction of the Russian fleet at Tsushima to "the virtue of the Emperor." The mass of his subjects also recognised the great services of the late Mikado to the Japanese nation by the intense reverence with which they anxiously crowded round the palace to hear the latest bulletin of his health and the overwhelming grief with which they received the final news of his death. The world can never outgrow the memory or reverence of a monarch who awakened the dormant potentialities of one of the greatest of modern nations.

WE HAVE been repeatedly hearing complaints of the unconstitutional methods adopted by the Deputy Commissioner of Sialkot in his dealings with the officers and Commissioners of the local Municipality.

Sialkot Municipality.

We had deliberately refrained from any expression of opinion on the subject, firstly, because we wanted to make thoroughly sure of the truth of the statements of our correspondents and, secondly, because we had hopes that matters would right themselves without any unnecessary advertisement of bureaucratic vagaries. But our hopes have been in vain. The scandal has assumed serious proportions, the whole city is greatly perturbed and the affair has evoked strong protests from the Panjab Press. After making thorough personal enquiries and carefully scrutinising all available papers, we are led to believe that the story as given by most of our Panjab contemporaries and our own correspondents is correct in its main outlines. Briefly, the facts of the case seem to be these. In September 1911, when Colonel Popham was permanently posted to the District, the Sialkot Municipality was in a most flourishing condition—the annual revenue having increased from Rs. 1,50,110 in 1908 to Rs. 2,08,003 in 1911-12, and its finances were freed of encumbrances. The men at the helm of the Municipal administration were recognised to be officers of undoubted ability and integrity, who commanded the perfect confidence of the public and had been repeatedly granted official testimonials and even Shahi Sanads testifying in the most unequivocal terms to their "distinct administrative ability," their "intelligence and impartial dealings with one and all," the signal services they had rendered to the State and the public in spheres of activity outside their official jurisdiction and, in short, to their possessing "every qualification requisite" for high Municipal posts. The Deputy Commissioner himself seems at first to have been thoroughly satisfied with them and their work. But he seems later to have fallen under the influence of certain self-seeking johookums who poisoned his mind against the Municipal authorities. The first step taken by Colonel Popham, presumably at the instigation of these disappointed or dismissed busybodies, was an attempt to bring a charge of peculation against a respectable Municipal Commissioner and the Municipal officers. But though no stone was left unturned and the account books of peaceful traders and residents were seized and searched, the charge could not be established and the proceedings were quashed by the Appellate Court after Rs. 1,300 of public money had been thus wasted. This failure seems to have exasperated the Deputy Commissioner, and, we are afraid, he allowed himself to forget that he was working in a civil capacity. Then followed a series of actions which, if not vindictive, must be classed as unduly vindictive. The victims of these proceedings are the Secretary, the Octroi Superintendant, and the Verifying Officer. After a perfunctory official enquiry, an informal meeting of Commissioners was called at his private bungalow in which the Colonel is said to have tried to intimidate the members into a finding of "guilty of serious dereliction of duty" against the officers. Many of the Commissioners at first refused to condemn any of the officers until any specific charges were proved against them, and reiterated their previous expressions of confidence in their ability and integrity. But the Colonel is reported to have taken the most prominent of the dissenting Commissioners to task for the independence of his views. This had the desired effect and the so-called Committee was brought to look at things eye to eye with their President, who himself proposed, and got seconded and carried, resolutions ordering the retirement of the Secretary and the suspension of the other two officers. While expressing our surprise at the unconstitutionality of these proceedings, we must also frankly express our grave doubts as to the fitness of the new officers whom Colonel Popham selected to take the place of the outgoing dignitaries. For, unless report lies utterly, the present Secretary of the Sialkot Municipality is a former Secretary of the Faizabad Municipality who had been forced to resign under very suspicious circumstances. The present Octroi Superintendant is a man who had been dismissed from the District Board of Lahore. And a new post has been specially created for the benefit of another worthy who was first expelled from the cavalry and later dismissed from the Court of Wards service on charges of peculation and bribery. This, in short, is the story so far as we have been able to investigate and we have no reason to doubt the bona fide or disinterestedness of our informants. If true, it hardly requires any comments from us. The bare facts are an eloquent testimony of the omnipotence of official satraps in outlying mofussil towns. Such divorce of patience, fairness, and commonsense from executive authority is perhaps a special feature of the Panjab. We would strongly impress upon the Provincial administration the need of a thorough investigation into this case. And we confidently hope to have an early occasion to report a restoration of peaceful and constitutional administration in the city of Sialkot. Colonel Popham has been promoted to a Commissionership; but we hope it is not meant as a broad hint that the mess he made of the Municipal affairs has been blessed by the provincial gods. The gallant Colonel was, we may readily admit, acting all along under a false alarm roused in his mind by some members of the lamihar tribe that infests the paths of power. The bated breath and whispering humbleness have a peculiarly thawing effect on the heaven-born, who has the further glory of having lived amidst the traditions of the parade-ground and the barrack. The Colonel felt something was wrong somewhere, and instead of looking within him or immediately around him, he looked in the direction of his nose—which appears to have been for the time being in others' hands—and bravely wanted to straighten things, as if by the flourish of the jackboot. We can only deplore the consequences of mistaken sense of duty and zeal for official purity when the official himself is so obviously at the mercy of any sneak with an oily tongue.

ONE of the staunchest friends of the Indian people has been lately taken away from amongst us by death.

A True "Friend of India." A man of high moral courage, sturdy independence of views and a humanity to which colour and creed were no bar, Mr. Allan Hume was one of those few high-souled I. C. S. men who devoted their life to selfless service for the people of this country and fearlessly championed the cause of its social and political regeneration at the ready sacrifice of official preferments and honours. But though denied official recognition, Mr. Hume's philanthropic activities for the uplifting of Indians gained for him a warm corner in Indian hearts. Everyone of his numerous Indian friends to whom he was always affectionate, sympathetic and hospitable, will carry about him all through life most pleasant memories of Mr. Hume. And so firm was his hold on the confidence of the Indian masses that even in the dark days of the Mutiny their thorough reliance on his justice and kindness was never shaken. Such a life should be a model for our modern Anglo-Indian officers. The worthy son of an illustrious Radical, Mr. Hume had inherited talents and instincts which stood him in good stead during his life of service for the Indian people. He was the officer first entrusted with the establishment of an Agricultural Department; and though this original scheme was a failure, India owes to Mr. Hume that growing official solicitude for Agricultural development which is now so prominent. But the magnum opus of Mr. Hume's life was the most conspicuous part he took in the political regeneration of India. His is the proud privilege of being called the father of the Indian Congress. Though a Civilian, just emerged from official duties, he could find time and energy to utilise the national commotion caused by the Ilbert Bill to awaken the political consciousness of the Indians and focus their activities in a central congress which would facilitate united action and the creation of a united India. He has always been one of the guiding spirits of the Indian movement for political regeneration, and in 1890 he went to England as a member of a strong deputation to appeal to the British public for a reform of the Indian Legislative Councils. He proved himself a remarkably fine speaker and a resourceful debater. Since 1893, however, failing health had compelled Mr. Hume to live in partial retirement in England; but his interest in the welfare of the Indians had never ceased or even flagged. Good men are seldom idealised in their lifetime; but coming generations of Indians will cherish the memory of Mr. Allan Hume as one of the greatest benefactors of India.

WE YIELD to none in our sympathy for the Domiciled or, as they are now officially styled, the Anglo-Indian Community in their aspirations for securing their rightful share of the educational facilities. But we must say that we cannot countenance any such outbursts of hysteria as were noticeable in the recent mass meeting of the Anglo-Indians at Calcutta. It is one thing for a community to wish for the advance of culture and education among its members; but it is quite a different thing when this desire leads it to demand from the common stock of educational facilities in India a share out of all proportion to its numerical strength, or political importance in the country. And we are quite confident that whatever "concession" the British administrators might have made to "popular clamour," they certainly are not so absolutely timorous as to be driven into any fantastic measures by the loud hysterics of a minority which it would require a million-magnifying power microscope to detect in the community of races in India. We cannot quite make up our mind whether we should be offended or amused at the presumption of the leaders of this Imperial Fraternity in giving such tall orders to the Indian Government as (1) the total exclusion of all but Anglo-Indian children from "European Schools"; (2) the taking of steps to ensure that every child of the Domiciled Community shall attend school; (3) the provision of the total cost of the highest education abroad of Anglo-Indian young men and women; and (4) also the provision of suitable employments for boys and girls of the Domiciled Community after their education is complete. The whole of this Imperial programme was rounded off with giving a carte blanche to the Indian Exchequer to finance this scheme of an Anglo-Indian millenium out of the Imperial Revenues. This sounds suspiciously like Sir Ali Baba's terse statement of the aspirations of the Domiciled Community when he said, "Let us ask the Eurasian what he wants. He says, 'Make me a Commissioner or give me a pension.'" We are afraid the Imperial Fraternity was led into this rather exaggerated notion of its prior claim on the Imperial Revenue by a delusive equivocality. But if, as it seems, it cannot make out for itself a better case than this, we would take the liberty to remind the Domiciled leaders that Mr. Lloyd George and not Mr. Gillan or Sir H. Butler is the proper Imperial dignitary whom they should look up to for the fruition of their extensive schemes. Nor can we see any point in the argument that "since compulsory education must come the experiment had best be begun immediately on the Domiciled Community which was ripe for it." It is good indeed to find the Domiciled leaders who opposed Mr. Gokhale's Bill recognising its inevitableness, but the prior claims of their Community to such education have yet to be established. If the extreme "indifference to education" and "the fact that among the Domiciled illiteracy tends to degradation and crime"—which even "the friends of India" admit—, are the symptoms of ripeness for compulsory free education in a community, we must confess to an utter innocence of the science (or art) of diagnosing the social condition of great (or microscopic) communities. We also fail to see any fair-play in drawing from the none too full pockets of destitute "natives" the funds which are to enable these "sons of Britishers" to "maintain their distinctive Europeanism" and to "uphold the British tone and character of the administration." Nor can we see things eye to eye with our "friends" when they adopt the facile logic of a difficulty in obtaining employment producing backwardness in education. For we firmly hold that, wherever they might or might not be fully represented, the Imperial Anglo-Indians most certainly cannot complain of any inadequate representation in various branches of the Public Service. We again repeat that we would never grudge "the backward" Domiciled Community every educational facility that they are in equity entitled to. But we were confident that the Indian Government would not catch from their obliging "cousins" the prevalent contagion of a bloated sense of the importance of these "distinctive European sons of Britishers." We, therefore, approve of the recent speech of the Member for Education delivered at the Conference for the education of the Domiciled. Sir H. Butler has hit the nail on the head by declaring that while he was prepared by quoting statistics to refute the charge of indifference on the part of the local Government, towards the educational needs of the Domiciled Community, he must, at the same time, make it quite plain that "the question of Indian education must be handled as a whole," and that "the British Government in India was equally interested in uplifting all the classes of the population." We are also in perfect agreement with Sir Harcourt Butler for his refusing to countenance any measure which would run counter to the "accepted policy of decentralisation," and "divorce the Local Governments from all concern in the education of the children of the Domiciled Community." Nor do we see anything to cavil at in his statement that "the extension of the principle of free elementary education applied to members of the Domiciled Community as well as to Indians." So far we are at one with the Member for Education; but after this we have to part company. For, though we warn the Government of the grave dangers that they would risk in constituting any particular section of the Indian population as a distinct and specially favoured community in the matter of the extension of elementary education, we at the same time reiterate our oft-repeated assertion that the whole of India is no longer unripe for the introduction of free and compulsory education. Things seem to be moving very rapidly towards an early consummation of our long cherished dream; and we might say, in Mr. Gokhale's language, that we "never spoke with a clearer vision of a bright future" when we say that free and compulsory education cannot very much longer be withheld from the Indian masses who are clamouring for it so earnestly. And inasmuch as their proceedings would strengthen the hands of Mr. Gokhale and his coadjutors in securing from the Government a voluntary "concession to this public clamour," we must say that all India is thankful to the Domiciled leaders for passing their resolution on free education in face of strong official opposition.

The Tears of Asif.

(IN MEMORY OF THE HYDERABAD FLOODS, 1908.)

Sweet is the balm of the dew-laden breeze,
And sweet the gracious bounty of the shower,
And rich as maiden's dreams the limpid dower
Of fleckless pearls ravished from virgin seas.
But sweeter, purer, rarer far than these,
Beyond the reach of Time's defeating power,
Shrined in a people's heart, the perfect flower
Of their most dear and poignant memories
Are the immortal tears of him who stood
Weeping as if his sad, great heart must break
Before the homeless tragic multitude!
The tears of royal Asif when he cried:

"Alas! my suffering children! For your sake,
To save you, would to God that I had died."

The Comrade.

The Moslem University and Affiliation.

LOYALTY in these days is very much like virtue, for it certainly seems to be its own reward. The Muhammadans of India have been made to feel this often enough during more than a year past, and the latest illustration of this was the innocent-looking Press communiqué issued by the Education Department, which stated that "it has been finally decided that the educational scope of a University at Aligarh or Benares should be limited to the locality in which it may be established." All those who have been working for the proposed Muhammadan University, and specially the members of its Constitution Committee, know well enough how far its chief promoters have gone to satisfy the demands of the Government. There is a not inconsiderable body of opinion in the community which considers that the promoters have, in some measure at least, sacrificed the interests of the community in their eagerness to meet the Government. The Constitution Committee itself has not escaped criticism of this nature and quite a large minority in its own ranks is not satisfied in certain important respects with the decisions of the majority which have given fairly large powers to Government in the Constitution. One at least expected that after all this Government would show some consideration for the feelings of the promoters of this University and of the Constitution Committee, which had used every means to ascertain the wishes of the Government before placing its final draft Constitution before the public for criticism and ultimate sanction. We do not know whether any intimation was given by the Government of the rejection of affiliation to the promoters of this University before the "final" decision was announced to the world at large; but we do know that the Constitution Committee was kept entirely in the dark and the bolt from the blue reached its members no earlier than any other readers of the daily newspapers. We dare say that the Government is by now used to the procedure of these ukases of the Czarism. But it takes long to cure the loyalists of their belief in the Government's kindly consideration, and we are sure we do not exaggerate when we say that the form which the announcement has taken has deeply wounded the feelings of the members of the Moslem University Constitution Committee. It is not inconceivable that the Honourable Member for Education could have included in his monsoon tour Aligarh or Lucknow, where he could have met the Committee. But if the tour programme of the Heads of Departments are arranged on a peculiar Olympian plan and cannot take heed of the convenience of ordinary mortality, after all Simla is not altogether inaccessible, and the members of the Committee could have gone up to the hills, as before, to learn all that was on the knees of the gods. Instead of that, the Education Department condescends to issue a Press communiqué of some two dozen words, the brevity of which is indeed the soul of autocracy.

We do not know how it was, but it certainly seems to have dawned upon the gods in their Olympian abode that Jove's thunderbolt had upset the equanimity of those on whom it had so unexpectedly fallen in the land of mere men. We are, therefore, treated to another Press communiqué a few days later, which stated that "in view of the recent announcement it is important to state that the decision in regard to the affiliation to the proposed Universities of Aligarh and Benares is the decision of the Secretary of State and that it is final." That is to say, the minor gods disclaim all responsibility for the destruction which has been caused among the hopes below and declare that this has been wholly the sport of the dii majores. That, however, is one of those secrets which, unlike the secret "booms" of Delhi, are the property of all before the sly Secretariat gave up its constructive possession. Aligarh must thank itself for this because

Man az begānān bargiz na nālam,
Ke bā man har che kard an āshnā kard.

(I bewail not against strangers for all that was done to me in the way of oppression was done by the friend of my bosom.) It is a well-known fact that Sir Theodore Morison does not favour the idea of affiliation, and Lord Crewe has not yet availed himself of the opportunities that he has had for showing that he has had reasons of his own for deciding as he has done, apart from those that have been whispered into his ears by his educational guide, philosopher and friend. His Lordship's entire power of speech seems to have been dedicated to squaring the circle of paragraph 3 of the famous Despatch.

Officials who enter on an official career somewhat late in life have some uneasy moments in the midst of power very much like those of the lady "with a past." Words uttered in the unfettered freedom of non-official days come to plague the speaker, and it would surprise nobody if Sir Theodore Morison learnt with a shock of surprise that a little more than a decade ago he held views on the subject of affiliation somewhat different from those that have evidently influenced the "final" decision of the Secretary of State. The Aligarh Institute Gazette very pertinently publishes an extract from the speech of Sir Theodore, delivered in December 1898, at Lahore, before the Muhammadan Educational Conference. In moving his well-known resolution in favour of the establishment of a Muhammadan University, he is stated to have said:—"My personal opinion is that the proposed University should be a residential one, that is, one whose degrees should be conferred not on day scholars but, like the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, only on those who may have kept a fixed number of terms by residence in the University. I do not mean that residence should be confined to Aligarh, but I include residence in the Boarding Houses attached to such other colleges also as accept the same degree of responsibility for the character, behaviour and training of their students as the central institution." These were the views of the Secretary of State's present educational adviser 13½ years ago. But the river has chosen another bed for itself and who shall stay the progress of the mighty waters in their sweeping course? Conservative Aligarh may still be where one of its "noble trio" left it at the time; but if its sluggish stream still drags itself on within the banks through which a greater flood swept on 13½ years ago, it is only a backwater which cannot attract the official voyager.

It is not at all difficult to prove that the sermons preached at Aligarh to-day are from the texts supplied by Sir Theodore Morrison in 1898. The Statutes of the proposed Moslem University as drafted by the Constitution Committee provide in Chapter XXIII as follows:—

1. The University may affiliate only such colleges and recognise only such schools as are conducted on the Residential system, on the principle and model of the University College (M.A.O. College, Aligarh) and have attained a standard of efficiency that may be deemed satisfactory in accordance with the Regulations.
2. All institutions situated outside Aligarh shall require for their affiliation the recommendation of the Senate and the sanction of the Chancellor [the Viceroy], to be obtained in accordance with the Regulations.

This is clear enough. The residential system remains intact but, in the apparently forgotten words of Sir Theodore Morrison, residence is not to be confined to Aligarh but includes residence in the Boarding Houses attached to such colleges also as accept the same degree of responsibility for the character, behaviour and training of their students as the central institution. In addition to residence, a college must satisfy the Senate and the Chancellor that it has attained a certain standard of efficiency laid down in the Regulations by the Senate and approved by the Chancellor.

If we turn to the Constitution Committee's draft of the Regulations themselves, we are assured still more insistently that the Members of the Committee are not desirous of cheapening the privilege of affiliation. Capital XXIII deals with "Affiliation and Disaffiliation of Colleges," and contains the following provisions:—

1. Colleges may be affiliated in one or more Faculties. The affiliation shall be given specifically for each separate subject.
2. No college shall be affiliated to a degree other than the Bachelor's Degree.
3. All applications for affiliation must be addressed to the Syndicate through the Vice-Chancellor.
4. A college applying for affiliation shall satisfy the Syndicate,
 - (a) that the college is to be under the control of a regularly constituted governing body;
 - (b) that the qualifications of the teaching staff and the conditions governing their tenure of office are such as to make due provision for the courses of instruction to be undertaken by the college;
 - (c) that the buildings in which the college is to be situated are suitable;
 - (d) that due provision has been made for a library;
 - (e) where affiliation is sought in any branch of experimental science, that arrangements have been made for imparting instruction in that branch of science in a properly equipped laboratory or museum;
 - (f) that the financial resources of the college are such as to make due provision for its continued maintenance;
 - (g) that the college is a residential college and provision has been made for the residence of the students, the Principal and at least for such members of the teaching staff as are in charge of the students' Hostels;
 - (h) that the Principal and at least one Professor will be Graduates of a European University;
 - (i) that the governing body of the college is willing to take two representatives of the Council as members;
 - (j) that the management of the college will be entrusted to a Committee consisting of—
 - (i) the Principal of the college;
 - (ii) two Professors of the college in charge of the Hostels;
 - (iii) two representatives of the Senate;
 - (iv) and such other members as the governing body of the college may appoint.

A residential college is one in which all the students reside in Hostels maintained or recognised by the college unless specially allowed by the Committee of Management to reside with their parents or guardians, who undertake and fulfil the conditions laid down by the Syndicate.

The application shall further contain an assurance that after the college is affiliated, any transference of management and all changes in the teaching staff shall be forthwith reported to the Syndicate.

The application shall further contain an assurance that, except with the special permission of the Syndicate, no college Professor or Lecturer will be allowed to lecture to a class or section of a class which has on its rolls more than 60 students.

5. On receipt of a letter of application under sub-section (1), the Syndicate shall,
 - (a) direct a local enquiry to be made by a commission of not less than three persons nominated by the Syndicate in this behalf, one of whom shall be a member of the Court;
 - (b) make such further enquiry as may appear to them to be necessary; and
 - (c) report to the Senate on the question whether the application should be granted or refused, either in whole or in part, embodying in such report the results of any inquiry under clauses (a) and (b).

And the Senate shall, after such further inquiry (if any) as may appear to them to be necessary, record their opinion on the matter.

6. The Vice-Chancellor shall submit the application and all proceedings of the Syndicate and Senate relating thereto to the Chancellor who, after such further inquiry as may appear to him necessary, shall grant or refuse the application or any part thereof.
7. Where a college desires to add to the courses of instruction in respect of which it is affiliated, the procedure prescribed by clause 4 shall, so far as may be, be followed.
8. The Syndicate shall cause every affiliated college to be inspected from time to time, by competent persons authorised by the Syndicate in this behalf, one of whom shall be a member of the Court.
9. The Syndicate may call upon any college so inspected to take, within a specified period, such action as may appear to them to be necessary in respect of any of the matters referred to in clause 4.
10. The Senate may, on the recommendation of the Syndicate, submit to the Council at any time a proposal for the withdrawal of the privileges of affiliation from any college.

The procedure shall be as follows:—

- (a) A member of the Syndicate who intends to move that the rights conferred on any college by affiliation be withdrawn, in whole or in part, shall give notice of his motion, and shall state in writing the grounds on which the motion is made.
- (b) Before taking the said motion into consideration, the Syndicate shall send a copy of the notice and written statement mentioned in (a) to the President of the Governing Body concerned, together with an intimation that any representation in writing, submitted within a period specified in such intimation on behalf of the college will be considered by the Syndicate; provided that the period so specified, may, if necessary, be extended, from time to time, by the Syndicate.
- (c) On receipt of the representation or on expiration of the period referred to in (b), the Syndicate, after considering the notice of motion, statement and representation, and after such inspection by any competent person authorised by the Syndicate in this behalf, and such further inquiry as may appear to them to be necessary, shall make a report to the Senate.
- (d) On receipt of the report under (c), the Senate shall, after such further inquiry (if any) as may appear to them to be necessary, record their opinion on the matter.
- (e) The Vice-Chancellor shall submit the proposal and all proceedings of the Syndicate and Senate relating thereto to the Council which after such further inquiry (if any) as may appear to it to be necessary, shall make such instructions as the circumstance may, in its opinion, require.
- (f) Where by an instruction made under (e) the rights conferred by affiliation are withdrawn in whole or in part, the ground for such withdrawal shall be stated.
11. Each affiliated college shall furnish such returns, reports and other information as the Syndicate may require, to enable them to judge of the efficiency of the College.
12. The Vice-Chancellor shall lay all recommendations of the Senate mentioned in clauses 5 and 10 before the Council who after such further inquiry as may appear to them to be necessary, shall record their opinion on the matter. The Vice-Chancellor shall submit the report of the Syndicate, the recommendations of the Senate and the opinion of the Council to the Chancellor for final sanction.

We offer no apology for publishing these long extracts from the draft Statutes and Regulations, for the Government of India have already been regularly acquainted with the draft Act and Statutes, and in a less regular manner with the Regulations. The only people who have hitherto been kept entirely in the dark, needlessly, and in view of the Government's Press communiqué, very unwisely, are the Mussalmans themselves. The Constitution Committee, however, authorised the publication of the revised drafts no less than two months ago, and when it is "finally" decided that a portion of the Act, the Statutes, and the Regulations shall be rejected by Government, it is time that somebody informed the bewildered community what shall be rejected. We are even prepared to publish the whole draft if the Honorary Secretary of the Constitution Committee is not prepared to carry out the clear instructions of the Committee.

Now, we should like to ask Sir Theodore Morrison and the Secretary of State what there is in all these provisions which indicates that affiliation will be easy for inefficient institutions. It may be said, perhaps, that these provisions would be treated as a dead letter and that an epidemic of affiliation would set in. In the first place, we are asked to believe that the Syndicate and the Senate would both lose their reason and that the Vice-Chancellor and other officers of the University would all of a sudden become maniacs. Everybody knows that any leniency in the exercise of powers conferred on the University in connection with affiliation is bound to lower the value of its degrees. Would two such bodies as the Syndicate and the Senate, composed presumably of sane people, ruin the chances, say, of a thousand undergraduates at Aligarh, in order to transfer the control of an inefficient College of 200 undergraduates from the Government Provincial University of Lahore or Bombay to the Moslem University at Aligarh. The temptation to risk so much must be inordinately strong, but what it is likely to be, we are not told and, we confess, we altogether fail to see.

In the next place, the Viceroy is to be the Chancellor—unless another Press communiqué is issued to announce that it is "finally" decided that this, too, shall not be. Would the Viceroy permit such an affiliation? We may be told that the Viceroy may find it difficult to reject the demand of the Syndicate and the Senate of the Moslem University, specially if it is strongly backed by the Moslem community. We do not know what there is in the present condition of India to indicate any such sensibility on the part of the head of the Government. As if Viceroys have never rejected demands strongly backed by the Moslem community, and as if demands strongly backed by the Moslem community have in recent times had much effect on Viceregal decisions.

It is clear that the Mussulmans believe too much in the advantages of the residential system to do away with it in colleges situated outside Aligarh, which may be affiliated to the Aligarh University. As a matter of fact, the draft regulations consider the residence of undergraduates even with their parents and guardians as an exceptional arrangement which is not likely to be easily accepted. We doubt if the proposed experiment of a residential University at Dacca would be tried on the same rigid lines as far as the residential system is concerned. What is, however, likely to be affected adversely, is the teaching aspect of the Moslem University. To provide as good a class of teachers for Mofussil Colleges as for the central institution would be extremely wasteful, and the Aligarh University is no more likely to insist on as excellent a teaching staff for the College at Lahore or Karachi as for the University College at Aligarh than the Calcutta University reproduces the Presidency College in the districts of Khulna or Chittagong.

But the Mussalman, while recognising this drawback, consider it a lesser evil than the divorce of the secular teaching in Muslim institutions outside Aligarh from the religious instruction which not only they condemn, but which has been severely commented upon by other critics of the present system of education from Lord Minto downwards. Moreover they are anxious to provide a course of studies which takes into account the alteration and importance of certain subjects for Muslim students. The Government of India have themselves suggested the inclusion of Islamic studies in the curriculum of the proposed Dacca University. But the Ides of March have not gone yet, and we have still to see how the courses of studies are adjusted at Dacca. The existing universities, however, are blind and colourless, and make no concession to the prejudices and predilections of a community of seventy millions. Above all, it requires no great astuteness to see that Aligarh cannot indefinitely be enlarged without detriment to the character of its education, even if there are no practical difficulties in the way of such expansion. Consequently it must be easy to understand that Aligarh alone cannot suffice for the needs of a population twice the number of the population of England. The best method of creating other universities for the Muhammadans on the model of Aligarh is to improve existing educational institutions of the Mussalman in various provinces, so that they could be affiliated to Aligarh, thereby becoming so many nuclei for other Muhammadan universities. This is not such an inconceivable dream altogether, when we consider that thirty seven years ago Aligarh consisted of eight little urchins and a thatched tumble-down bungalow in a deserted military station, while the Muslim world of India was ranged in irreconcilable hostility against the Athanasius who defied it and its social and religious environment. Given a reasonable flow of Muslim charity towards Aligarh, growing in volume and rapidity at a progressive rate, Aligarh would have in ten years more students than Oxford or Cambridge, and it would then be necessary to turn the course of the river towards the progressive Provincial Colleges in order to turn them into so many universities.

Not a single argument has been brought forward by the Secretary of State or the Government of India against this phalanx of reasons, and yet a "final" decision has been arrived at. Are we not then justified in suspecting that the Government does not desire the spread of the Aligarh Movement. If so, may we not ask what Aligarh has done to deserve this suspicion. It has not turned out Khudiram Boses and Kanhai Lal Dutts. It has produced no Dhilliras and no Savarkars. It has never necessitated the dismissal of a Tahsil chuprassi, let alone the resignation of the head of a local Government. Its teaching has been a byword for loyalty and the conduct of some of its Governors has even savoured of subservience. More than a generation of India's "Patriots" has taunted it on the score of trying the sweet uses of flattery. Yet the Government honors patriots and humiliates the subject of their jibes. Such is the statesmanship of to-day, and we shudder to think of the destination to which, in certain contingencies, it may lead the Mussalman of India. The Secretary of State lays down the law for the Mussalman and the Government of India insists in calling it "final." Should it surprise him and the Government of India if the Mussalman are reminded that it was a still greater Secretary of State who insisted on calling a far less objectionable decision a "settled fact"?

The Governance of India.

FRESH and buoyant as ever, Mr. Montagu discoursed on Indian affairs with a mind that abhors vacuum and scorns questionings. There can, of course, be no basis of comparison between a philosophic and broad-visioned statesman of Lord Morley's calibre and the smooth and brilliant Under-Secretary, who loves to paint lilies and gild refined gold. The one was impressed by the colossal nature of the task, its intricacies, the difficult turnings ahead, by the scale, the proportions, the elusive character of the problem. And his utterances revealed the hopes and fears of a mind that ranged over the whole field: paused and reflected, though never faltered. But the note of Mr. Montagu is of superb conviction. He never doubts, he almost never seems to reflect: he bursts forth into a series of bold imageries, brilliant and silver-edged, which are eminently stimulating. It is so difficult to quarrel with Mr. Montagu. He does not provoke criticism so much as he tickles, amuses or exasperates. His appeal is to the instincts that visualise and glorify.

In his Budget statement, Mr. Montagu travelled over the entire ground that he had had occasion to survey, in whole or in part, during the course of the last eventful year. The Durbar, the changes, the controversies that sprang up in their wake were solemnly wound up with a sense of finality; and Mr. Montagu seems to have breathed a sigh of relief. We doubt, however, if he would not be called up again to reassure an incredulous world and tell it once more that there were to be a new heaven and a new earth in a place called India, where the discords and the tumults of race and creed would be transmuted to divine, melodious tunes and the official lion would roar as gently as a sucking dove. Mr. Montagu saw the vision long ago and has ever since been rendering it into lusty language. But the Philistines smile incredulously. Perhaps they like so much to hear him think aloud and drop bright pictures from the giddy heights of self-immersion to the gaping crowds below. But whether his invisible audience in Calcutta will be satisfied with his old attitude that has been phrased anew, or not, he himself has no doubts; and though he does not want to risk the anger of his critics, he is not afraid to "reiterate" the belief that there is a growing spirit of nationality in India, the direct product of British rule. It would be futile to rake up the old controversy and measure the possibilities of the changes, the hopes they have awakened, the passions they have brought into play and the earnest doubts and fears to which they have given rise amongst certain sections of the people. They undoubtedly constitute a great transaction and have ushered in a new era in the government of the country. Whether the new era would be fruitful and lead to good results is still a matter of devout aspiration. And to some it may be more comforting to hope with Mr. Montagu and deck the future in purple and gold than to sit down moodily and sulk and moan in sackcloth and ashes.

One cannot, however, easily dismiss the hot memories of the fight that is scarcely yet over about the meaning of paragraph 3. Never have a few sentences, benevolently and perhaps grandiloquently framed, carried about hidden in themselves so many shrieking demons of angry declamation and debate. The paragraph was perhaps intended to define a pleasing attitude in order to mark the dignity of an extraordinary occasion. The fates were, however, spinning it for another use. Whatever may be the existing principles underlying the governance of India, the paragraph has dragged them into the light of day as nothing else had done before; and henceforth the aims and methods of the constitutional struggle in this country will not be shadowy or vague or lack in energy and vigour. No one can take Lord Crewe seriously when he begins to vouch for Mr. Montagu's innocence or utter apologies on behalf of the Government of India. But his hasty and nervous repudiations about "autonomy" and "self-government" we can understand. The latest ideal he has found out for his own satisfaction and for that of his Tory critics is worth considering. He says:

I reiterate that there is nothing in the teachings of history or of the recent conditions of the world which can make the dream of complete self-government for India within the British Empire even remotely probable. We have succeeded in weaving into the Empire two European races—the French in Canada and the Dutch in South Africa. We are now trying to solve with them the problems of general defence, giving component parts of the Empire a share in the shaping of Imperial policy. Can anybody conceive a similar solution of the Imperial problem for hundreds of millions of men of an altogether different race from our own? Is it conceivable that at any time an Indian Empire could exist on the lines of Australia and New Zealand, with no British officials or troops, no ties of creed or blood replacing those material bonds?

A self-governing India is inconceivable to Lord Crewe, because the Indian people are different from the British in race and religion and because British statesmen have no historical parallel to guide them in this case. The question simply resolves itself into a race issue and points to a violent solution at some distant time, for even Lord Crewe would not, we imagine, believe that physical force would become the cement of the Empire in the absence of common creed and common blood. Nor is it conceivable that India, grown to the full stature of a conscious and unified nationality, would not dream of self-government. Is it, then, wise, is it reasonable, is it even expedient to leave the solution of so great a question to the blind and mad conflict in a distant future, born of suppressed energy and moral impoverishment, of bitter racial egotisms, of irrepressible national will seeking its way to independence and self-expression? Lord Crewe may think that "it is only those who think less of service and more of distinction who would lose heart if they braced themselves to set aside this vision (self-governing India) altogether, and settle down to closer co-operation with this Western race for the moral bettering of the country to which they are so deeply attached and of which we are proud to be the Government." But he seems to be apparently indifferent as to how the necessary "bracing" can be had. Can "the moral bettering" without an aim and a goal be a great incentive to courage, devotion and sustained endeavour? Can the highest and the truly selfless instincts of service and patriotism be evoked by such meagre appeals as the "betterment" of the moral condition of the country, when there is no purpose for which this new equipment might be useful? It is not on husks such as this that a nation's hope and genius will depend for their sustenance. Something ampler, richer and more self-sufficing is needed if India is to rise in stature and sense of achievement. Sneaking references to race and creed do not simplify matters, nor have Asia and Europe, as symbols of unalterable fixity, any relevancy in an argument on India's future. England cannot keep India as a dependency for ever. Will India be allowed to grow through the necessary stages of evolution with England's help, or will she be condemned to perpetual babyhood? Those who recommend taking no thought of the morrow and only desire to sit tight, trusting they might by chance be able to ride the whirlwind and direct the storm, have never read their history nor have they any conception of the grave issues with which they are dallying. Either India is to attain autonomy or she is to remain a cripple for ever more. The latter alternative is abhorrent to every Indian who has become conscious of the place of his people in the scheme of things. The Autonomy is not only conceivable to him, it is also necessary for him as an ideal; and he would be beggared of everything that sweetens his toils, lightens his existing burdens and gives purpose to his drab existence if he ceases to think and work for a self-governing India. Mr. Montagu has a better conception of the task of India's rulers when he says that "the mighty mass of India is moving in response to our own stimulus and to try to force it back into sleep would be to force it into unwilling sleep. That could only be achieved by repression, which would be a calamity producing blunder."

The other important matters dealt with by Mr. Montagu in his speech are the Indian education and the inquiry into the Public Services which the Royal Commission recently constituted will undertake. Both these questions embrace a wide field and must be deferred for detailed treatment till our next. It may, however, be noted that the educational needs of the country are beginning to receive serious attention. We are glad a definite programme is being evolved for the improvement and spread of Indian education in all its branches. Compulsory primary education is yet a far cry, but we are afraid, even universal free education will take some time before becoming an object of well-organised official effort. All that is for the present intended is to increase the number of primary schools by 75 per cent. and to double the school-going population. The proposed increase in the pay of the primary school teachers to Rs. 12 per mensem as the minimum, and the making of their posts pensionable would bring about much-needed reforms in these directions.

The terms of reference of the Public Service Commission are comprehensive in their scope, and we shall have to say a good deal about the nature of the reforms that are necessary for bringing the administration into line with modern conditions. We are glad the personnel of the Commission has been selected with an unconventional freedom from the red-tape. It has on the whole met with approval throughout the country. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Sir Theodore Morison and Sir Valentine Chirol will bring new standpoints to the consideration of the Indian problems, and whatever may be their views, we may be sure they would not lack in freshness, vigour and common sense. Amongst the Indian members, the names of Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim will inspire public confidence, and there can be no doubt that the Indian standpoint will be represented with knowledge, ability and courage. A contemporary, recently commenting on the personnel of the Commission, referred to Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim as a representative of the Mussalmans. We believe no one can be a better exponent of the Moslem standpoint than Mr. Abdur Rahim and his appointment has been received with gratification by the community. But it is necessary to bear in mind that he is equally a good and representative Indian whose opinion would be as much entitled to weight as that of any other Indian on the Commission. He represents his country as a Mussalman just as the Hon. Mr. Gokhale or Mr. Chaubal represent it as Hindus. Mr. Montagu hopes much from the labours of the Commission and so does the whole of India. We hope the labours of so many competent men will be really fruitful and result in the better governance of the country.

CORRESPONDENCE

Mussulmans and the Public Service.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I send the following particulars about the appointments of Muhammadans in the Ajmer-Merwara commission and request you to be good enough to publish them in the columns of the Comrade. Ajmer-Merwara is a small province of British India lying in the centre of Rajputana. It comprises a total area of 2,711 square miles. It is a Chief Commissionership under the Foreign Department. The Chief Commissioner is also the Agent to the Governor-General for Rajputana and under him is a Commissioner who is also the District and Sessions Judge of Ajmer-Merwara. For Civil Justice, the whole of Ajmer-Merwara forms one district, but for Revenue Administration and Criminal Justice the province is subdivided into two districts:—Ajmer and Merwara. For civil justice there are five first class Indian Sub-Judges, in addition to the Assistant Commissioner and Cantonment Magistrate of Nasirabad, six Munsiffs and a Cantonment Magistrate at Deoli, the first class Sub-Judges being Magistrates of the first class and the Munsiffs, second and third class Magistrates. Under the Collector (Assistant Commissioner) there is one Extra Assistant Commissioner who exercises the powers of a Deputy Collector.

The population according to the last census of 1911 is as follows:—

Total population.	Hindus of all creeds.	Muhammadans.
501,395	389,436	81,035

The Muhammadans of Ajmer-Merwara are very backward in education and consequently they have suffered much in their political rights. In the Ajmer Municipality there is a fixed number of Muhammadan and Hindu Municipal Commissioners who are appointed by election. The appointments of some other members are made by nomination by the Local Government. Out of these nominated members, ever since the formation of the Municipality, not a single Muhammadan has been nominated. Similarly, on the District Board there is not a single nominated Muhammadan.

The following extract from the revised list of the posts of Ajmer-Merwara, open to Indians, will disclose the total inadequacy of Muhammadan representation in the higher grades of the public service:—

Salaries of the appointments.	Total No. of posts.	Hindus.	Muhammadans.	Parsis.
Ranging from Rs. 150 to 600	12	11	...	1
" " " 100 to 150	4	4
" " " 75 to 100	5	3	2	...
" " " 60 to 75	7	6	1	...
" " " below 60	12	12
Total appointments	40	36	3	1

There is not a single Muhammadan Judge or Magistrate. All the Superintendents of offices, the Head Clerks and Readers to Judges and Magistrates are Hindus.

In the lower grades of clerical service Muhammadans are not in any way better off. During the last 20 years Muhammadans have taken to education, and now some Muhammadans with high educational qualifications are forthcoming for public service. But in spite of several applications and representations they are not given any appointment owing to a clique formed against them. The existence of this clique is known to some of the European officers. For example, the Cantonment Magistrate, Deoli, remarked in one of his certificates to a Muhammadan clerk, "There is no chance for a Muhammadan in Ajmer-Merwara." Similarly the Cantonment Magistrate, Nasirabad, in a certificate has used expressions to the effect that there are cliques against Muhammadans in Ajmer-Merwara. Another certificate given to a Muhammadan by the then Assistant Commissioner of Ajmer has in it the words, "but he is one of a minority in an office where the cause of a clique is pressed without scruple." Persistent attempts have been made by the Moslem individuals and associations to represent their case to the highest officials, but though every assurance is given that the next chance will be given to a Muhammadan, nothing practical is done. Muhammadans often come to know about appointments when all the arrangements have been made.

A re-organization scheme for the Judicial Department will be introduced in Ajmer-Merwara from October 1912. The details of this scheme are now being worked out by the Commissioner of Ajmer-Merwara. I saw him the other day and brought to his notice the claims of Muhammadans and the necessity of giving them a more adequate representation in the Judicial Department. He promised to do so and assured me that "the question of appointing an adequate number of Muhammadans is one which the Chief Commissioner has constantly in mind." But from past experience I am led to doubt if these assurances will be realized in practical reality, and if the claims of Muhammadans will not be overlooked this time also. If this turns out to be true, there is no chance for any Muhammadan entering into the service for many years to come and all the posts will be again monopolised by the Hindus.

It is considered that an early publication of these facts and figures in the Comrade may turn out to be of some benefit.

The Moslem University.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—The facts that led to the necessity of founding a national University of our own are well known and need not be repeated here. The promptness with which the Moslems all over India responded to the appeals for necessary funds, amply justifies the fact that the principles on which the institution was to be worked were warmly and unanimously accepted by all. They found this the only solution of their educational problems. The idea was so fascinating and full of hope that our Hindu brethren followed our example and started a parallel movement for a Hindu University on exactly the same principles. One of these principles was to provide facilities for sound education, suited to the requirements of the community, all over the country. In such a vast country, this can only be accomplished by establishing schools and colleges in different provinces, controlled by the central institution at Aligarh.

It is too well known that in spite of the obvious advantages of the Aligarh College, parents prefer to educate their sons at local institutions and it is not surprising if they choose a non-Moslem institution for this purpose. The natural result is that they come out with such ideas as form the special feature of these institutions and quite ignorant of the principles of their religion. Thus the necessity of establishing residential colleges in different parts of the country becomes clear. This was one of the promising features of the scheme and without it most of its usefulness is lost.

A few days ago, the following press communiqué was issued by the Education Department:—"It has been finally decided that the educational scope of a University at Aligarh or Benares should be limited to the locality in which it may be established." Thus all our hopes have been crushed at a single blow. We hope that no Mussalman will be satisfied with a University that is shorn of affiliating powers. The M.A.O. College is already serving the purpose, for which it was founded, admirably and there seems to be no need for increasing the expenses by a mere alteration in the designation without excluding its field of action and usefulness. Our money and energies are too precious and we must think twice before we spend either of them. If carelessly wasted, the valuable bonds of confidence that happily exist between the leaders and the community will be lost for ever.

Let us see if we can spend our money and energies better. The future of India depends on her industrial development and the position and prosperity of the Moslems of India will be determined by their share in this great movement. In spite of this fact no effort has been made by our leaders in this direction. What we want, above all, is the establishment of a purely technical and industrial institution to train our young men to take a substantial share in the industrial uplifting of India. This idea has been put forward more than once in some form. A friend of mine told me that the Hon. Raja of Mahmudabad had similar views when H. H. The Aga Khan started the University scheme.

An Appeal for Starving Arabs.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—In compliance with the many requests that I should appeal to my brothers in Islam and in furtherance of the pitiful appeal so recently made by Capt. C. F. Dixon-Johnson of London, I ask you to allow me a little space, in which to try and reach the hearts of the Indian Moslems on behalf of the "British Red Crescent Society" which is doing such noble work on behalf of the Ottoman soldiers and of the Tripoli Fund for famine relief there.

Wherever I turn I am continually asked for the latest news of the war in Tripoli. The questioner, a Moslem, does not appear to take any interest beyond the results of the military encounters and the success of the Turkish arms. He sees not the starving women and children who, having been obliged to go into the desert with their only support, the Turkish soldiers, are now in a state of unutterable misery. We are told a little flour and oil is doled out daily to those who come for it, but doles are utterly insufficient. I would like to say a few words to my brothers of the faith in India. It is the women and children, your sisters and brothers, who are the sufferers. Think of it. Out in the desert in a blazing sun, without even sufficient water, not to speak of food or clothing. Have you answered this appeal from Capt. Dixon-Johnson? Has even a Christian to appeal to a Moslem for help for Moslem women and children? Has a kind-hearted Englishman to try to rouse your sense of duty to your brethren in trouble? I hope we have not come to such a pass that a Christian will appeal to Muhammadans in India. I hope an appeal on behalf of the victims of an unrighteous war—an appeal so touching, so heartrending will not remain unanswered.

You ask for news of the war? I will give it to you. The news is to-day, that your brothers are fighting in a righteous cause, fighting for their homes, their religion, their Caliph and their God, while you Muhammadans of India, their brothers, are silently allowing their women and children to perish of absolute starvation and in abject misery. Even so bad has it become, that Christians are calling on you from across the seas to help them to save their children. I hope you are not made of wood or stone. Open your eyes, your heart, and prove that they are open, by giving what you can spare in response to this great Duty Call. Capt. Dixon-Johnson reminds you in his appeal of the Arabian Proverb: "It is a thousand-fold better to give away your own dinner than that a hungry man should stand at the doorway."

In the name of Charity, the greatest duty of the Moslem, do I appeal to you, my brothers, and pray God to move your hearts and open your purses. Save these women and children whose bravery and silent suffering have moved the heart of Christians to their aid.

Send all subscriptions to Tripoli Famine Fund, British Red Crescent Society, Coutts Bank, Strand, London.

Anecdote.

SOMETHING LIKE A RUN.

"TALKIN' about runnin'," remarked the Hon. Ananias Munchausen, "about the finest bit of sprintin' I ever saw was up in Scotland the shootin' season before last. I'd been out all day deer-shootin', and had had most awful luck when I spied a whoppin' great buck about eighteen hundred yards away. Takin' a careful sight, I let fly. But, bless your soul, the instant my bullet touched him, and before it had time to penetrate his hide, that beast was off like a flash!

"I never saw two such evenly matched things as that deer and my bullet. For over half a mile they sped on together, neither gainin' on the other, the bullet just managin' to keep in touch with the deer's skin. At the end of a mile, however, the pace began to tell on the deer, and he faltered just for a moment. 'Twas fatal. The bullet sped on, and the poor beast keeled over. He deserved his freedom if ever an animal did. He'd have got it, too, if he could have stuck out for another twenty yards, for that's about as far as my rifle carries."

Persia.

News of the Week.

Sir Edward Grey in reply to a question in the House of Commons said he was sorry to say that the situation all over Persia remained most unsettled. Any arrangement for a further loan must depend on improvement.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES.")

July 6.

A Blue-book has been issued [Cd. 6264] containing further correspondence on the disturbances in Persia. The period covered by the correspondence, which fills more than 100 pages but contains no despatches of outstanding interest, extends from 25th December 1911 to 2nd April in the present year.

July 9.

Mr. Dillon (Mayo E., Nat.) asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the House of Commons whether he had any official information to the effect that the ex-Shah had again left Odessa for Vienna and Carlsbad; whether the Shah's allowance had been stopped; and whether the right honourable gentleman would communicate with the Russian Government with a view to the necessary measures being taken to secure that the ex-Shah should not again enter Persia and stir up civil war.

Sir E. Grey (Northumberland, Berwick).—The answers to points one and two are in the negative. I have already been in communication with the Russian Government respecting the movements of the ex-Shah, but I have up to the present received no official confirmation of his reported activity.

July 12.

Mr. Dillon asked whether Shuja-ed-Dowleh was still acting as Governor of Tabriz; and, if so, why the pledge contained in the despatch of Sir G. Buchanan, dated 14th February 1912, had not been carried out.

Sir E. Grey.—The answer to the first point in the honourable member's question is in the affirmative. As regards the second point, the telegram to which he refers mentions no pledge, but merely intimates the acquiescence of the Russian Government in the transfer of Shuja-ed-Dowleh to another post and the appointment of the Sipahdar as Governor General at Tabriz. Though the Sipahdar's departure for his post has been postponed his appointment has not been cancelled and it is hoped that he will soon leave Teheran.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Reuter's Teheran correspondent telegraphs:—One of the first tasks of the reconstituted Cabinet has been to consider the demand by Russia for the addition of seven hundred men and two Russian officers to the Persian Cossack brigade at Tabriz. In view of the opportunity thus provided for requesting the removal of the Russian force of occupation there, and also for giving a further proof of its goodwill towards Russia, the Persian Government's reply is expected to be favourable.

The Times correspondent telegraphs:—“The Government has decided to agree to the proposal made in a recent Russian Note for a new establishment of the Cossack brigade at Tabriz, with two Russian officers and four Russian non-commissioned officers.

The Russo-Indian Railway.

It has sometimes occurred to us to ask how the procedure in the House of Commons in a Foreign Office debate would differ from that which obtains to-day, if it were a mere Duma with restricted powers, or a Crown Colony Legislature. One question clearly stirs the House, and on that one question there is little difference of view among parties. The mass of educated opinion is alarmed by the project of a Russo-Indian railway, and there is only a difference of accent and motive among the protests which come from Radicals, Imperialists, and Anglo-Indians. When Mr. Ponsonby agrees with Sir John Rees and Lord Ronaldshay with Mr. Dillon, we may fairly conclude that the Foreign Office is pursuing a course of which the country disapproves. Sir Edward Grey answered his critics. He showed the perfection of that kind of tact which is rather a social instinct than a conscious political strategy; but on the main point he conceded nothing, and we may add that he answered nothing. The project will go on. The Société d'Etudes, formed under Russo-British auspices, will continue its work in Paris. Our Minister will continue to give it his backing in Teheran. If, as we think likely, it will have to demand a subsidy from the British and Russian Governments, the House of Commons will have a nominal opportunity of defeating the Cabinet (and incidentally of destroying Home Rule, Free Trade, and Social Reform) before the obligation is actually incurred. But, save for this meaningless undertaking, Sir Edward Grey's speech was, in substance, a defiance of his critics, which lost nothing of its gravity because it was couched in a form suave, inoffensive, and almost deferential. A Russian Minister executing the same manoeuvre from the tribune of the Duma would have insulted the majority, taunted them with their impotence, and somewhere interpolated an aside to the effect that he thanked God that Russia has no Constitution. The British manner is vastly more decorous, and it is also from the standpoint of a bureaucracy determined to have its way, immensely more successful.

To a candid mind which wishes to understand the case for its opponents, this Trans-Persian railway presents the most baffling problem in all our recollection. It is baffling because the very persons who affect to despise the military danger latent in this railway are precisely those who beat the alarm drums at the bare suggestion of a Channel Tunnel, and even shook their heads over the Baghdad Railway. But what is there to be said for the line? No one imagines that our trade with India is going to desert the sea-route for the sake of a costly land transit. It is even admitted with the utmost candor that the line is never likely to earn a profit, and must be heavily subsidised. The Russian traders in Moscow are hostile to it from their own commercial standpoint. Our own traders are equally clear that their requirements call rather for a line running into the interior from the sea, from Mohammera at the head of the Gulf to Ispahan. What was true of that similar African megalomania, the Cape to Cairo line, is true also of this Asiatic project. The utility of railways to trade in such cases is not in furnishing a through route, but rather in providing roads by which sea-borne goods can be carried from the ports into the interior. The most exhaustive discussion has so far disclosed only one advantage which this line may be supposed to offer. It will save four or five days in the transit of mails and passengers to India, as compared with the Suez Canal route. But even this service all but vanishes, when we recollect that, as compared with the Baghdad route, the saving in time will be only one day. We will not do the Foreign Office the injustice of supposing that a consideration so frivolous as this could weigh with it in inducing it to give its support to the railway. The case against it neither gains nor loses by discussion. It is so obvious that the least expert civilian grasps it as readily as the soldier, and so incontrovertible that no single military authority has yet come forward to dispute it. Neither by breaks of gauge nor by diversion of route can the fact be altered that it will abolish the central desert zone of Persia which is now the chief protection of India against Russian invasion, make our frontiers continuous with a great military Empire, and force us in the end to reconsider our whole military problem, and to assume with the risks at the same time the burdens of a great land power. The more the defenders of the scheme accumulate useless safeguards, the nearer do they come to admitting the danger.

The explanation of this scheme is, we suppose, the explanation of our whole ruinous Persian policy. Our Foreign Office is still pursuing its ingenuous purpose of buying Russia's friendship and support, by the simple process of yielding to her at every turn. We are now about to show our child-like confidence in her by building the road by which she can advance on India. The idea is, we suppose, that if by all our acts and words we proclaim our hope that Russia will be for all time our friend, and our partner in the game of the Balance of Power, she will, for very shame, find herself compelled to live up to our touching belief in her. We are treating the Russian autocracy as the Greeks used to treat the Fumenes. There would be less of this pathetic self-delusion if our press did its duty more honestly in reproducing the real facts about the policy of Russia in the Concert. The remarkable leading article in which the Novoe Vremya welcomed the meeting of the Tsar and the Kaiser has been translated by the Manchester Guardian, and carefully ignored by the Times. It is a vehement and entirely candid plea for the ranging of Russia by the side of Germany in the European balance. It is, we think, the general opinion of instructed Frenchmen that Russia, straddling with great dexterity between the two groups to her vast profit, is now rather more definitely in the Germany than in the Franco-British camp. The Novoe Vremya speaks for the dominant reactionary tendencies in Russia, and it is always the mouthpiece of someone at the Foreign Office. It seems to foreshadow a Russo-German effort to challenge British supremacy at sea, and it commits itself to the illuminating statement that “only the loss of India by England, from whatever cause, would establish permanent peace between us and her.” The “cause” is as likely to be this trans-Persian railway as another. We desire “permanent peace” with Russia, but the idea of pursuing it by way of the loss of India is not within the avowed purposes of any British school of thought. To go on with this railway in the face of such warnings as these is a folly so colossal that we risk it only from our inability to believe that it is imminent. Mr. Ponsonby's word, “madness,” is a mild and moderate epithet. Once more Sir Edward Grey committed himself to his old obsession of European “groups.” Once more it is apparent that he is building on a foundation of sand. The “groups” are so fluid that they offer security neither for a balance of power nor yet for elementary security. The policy has ruinously failed, and the statesmanship which refuses to face the facts is incurring the gravest responsibility in the history of our Empire.—The Nation.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Baghdad on 29th July:—The Governor General has turned the first sod of the Baghdad-Mosul section of the Baghdad Railway.

Reuter's advices from Bagdad report that the site for the railway station there has been definitely chosen on the right bank of the river Tigris. The scheme includes a harbour and Custom House on the river bank with a siding to the station, which is to be about a quarter of a mile from the river.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—A tumult was caused in the Chamber on 25th July by the President reading a letter bearing the seal of the Military League ordering him to retire and dissolve the Chamber within forty-eight hours.

The situation at Constantinople is full of explosive elements, but it is hoped that the new Cabinet which is composed of strong conciliatory men will succeed in tiding over the dangerous period. The Cabinet recognises the necessity for dissolving the Chamber, but desires to proceed constitutionally and will endeavour to dissuade the Military League from resorting to violent measures.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—Opinion is divided on the subject of the letter to the President of the Chamber, bearing the seal of the Military League, ordering dissolution of the Chamber.

Some believe that it is a fabrication emanating from the enemies of the Military League with the purpose of discrediting the League.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 28th July:—Hitherto there has been no sign of attempt to execute the threat to dissolve the Chamber forcibly and its sitting has not been disturbed.

The Government has submitted to the Sultan a list of persons exiled and imprisoned by the late Court-Martial with a view to securing amnesty.

A Times message from Athens states that General Ameglio, visiting Kalymnos, made a speech in which he declared that the Aegean Islands would not be restored to Turkey.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 28th July:—The Cabinet has decided to secure the dissolution of the Chamber by legal means.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—In the Chamber, on 31st, July the Grand Vizier read the Government programme. He said they were resolved to continue the war till they had obtained all the conditions compatible with the rights of Turkey.

The Chamber passed a vote of confidence in the Government by 113 votes to 45.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 2nd August:—An Trade has been issued granting amnesty to 130 exiles, including all the dignitaries of the old regime. The Government has submitted to the Chamber a resolution modifying the Constitution so as to enable the Sultan to dissolve the Chamber without the assent of the Senate.

The Times states that the conviction is gaining ground that some sort of definite understanding, or even alliance, has been effected between Bulgaria and Serbia and Bulgaria and Greece.

THE Press Association learns from a source in London closely associated with Egyptian affairs and the Khedival Court that negotiations are on foot which may lead to the Mariout Railway changing hands. The Khedive has been approached recently by various foreign groups of financiers with reference to the railway, and negotiations are proceeding, but with what prospect is at present unknown. It is also believed that fourparlers have been taking place between the Khedive and the Egyptian Government, but have not proceeded beyond the initial stage. It is contended that considerations of military strategy render it important that the railway, sooner or later, should be acquired by the Egyptian Government, and it is suggested that it would be of advantage that the Government should purchase it from the Khedive himself rather than allow it to pass under foreign control.

The railway, which is a narrow gauge, runs from Alexandria through Mariout towards the Tripolitan frontier. The construction of the railway was started by the Khedive at his own cost some years ago, and it has from time to time been extended, so that at present it measures 235 kilometres in length, and the terminus is 250 kilometres from the Tripolitan frontier.

(FROM THE "BIRMINGHAM POST.")

July 2.

According to a telegram which has been received in a prominent quarter here from Antwerp, a very large consignment of arms and ammunition, originally purchased by Turkish agents, has safely been delivered, partly in Salonica and partly to the Ottoman forces in Tripoli. Much of the material, it is said, has been manufactured by British firms to Belgian order, and considerable satisfaction is being expressed by those concerned in the operation at the success of the means adopted for its safe transport, not only from England to the Continent, but particularly from Belgian territory, to the Turkish forces opposed to the Italians in Tripoli.

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, July 7.

It was rumoured yesterday in political circles, and especially on the Bourse, that the declaration of an armistice by Italy and Turkey might be expected in a very few days. No confirmation of the rumour has been received either from Rome or Constantinople, and the Turkish Ambassador at Berlin declares that he has received no communication whatever on the subject of the possibility of an armistice being agreed to. On the other hand, inquiries in authoritative quarters have elicited the statement that it is not considered advisable to describe the rumour as unfounded. It is known that the Turco-Italian War has been one of the main topics of conversation between the Kaiser and the Tsar and their Ministers at Baltic Port, but exact and full details of the conferences and their results have not yet reached Berlin. All that is known definitely is that it has been ascertained that the two Governments are at one on the basis of a policy whose aim is the maintenance of peace. It is apparently regarded as being within the bounds of possibility that some common ground has been discovered by the monarchs and their advisers from which the two Governments can direct their effort to restore peace between Italy and Turkey. I may mention that the officials in attendance noted that the two Emperors conversed alone at Baltic Port much more frequently, and for a much longer time, than is usual at such meetings.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 10.

The Minister of War resigned at last night's Cabinet Council. His resignation has been accepted. Hurshid Pasha, Minister of Marine, will act temporarily as his successor.

In the letter of resignation which he has addressed to the Grand Vizier Mahmud Shevket Pasha gives the following explanation of his retirement:—

"The Bill which I prepared as an annex to the military penal code in consequence of the necessity which has recently become manifest for the legal interdiction of political activity on the part of members of the Imperial Army has been adopted by the Chamber and has been voted also by the Senate and will shortly come into operation.

"Having been for three years Minister of War, I feel it to be preferable that the execution of the new law should be entrusted to a new Minister.

"For this reason, and on account of the extreme fatigue from which I am suffering in consequence of the great recent stress of work, I tender you my resignation."

The ex-Minister has been appointed a Senator as a reward for his meritorious services.

LATER.

The Grand Vizier telegraphed to-day to Torgut Shevket Pasha offering him the Portfolio of War. The General refused. Army feeling outside Committee circles appears to desire the appointment either of Abdallah Pasha, commander of the forces in Smyrna, or of Ibrahim Pasha, an ex-commandant in Tripoli, to fill the vacancy, although Nazim Pasha's name is also mentioned. The Council of Ministers, which is still sitting, has been in constant telegraphic communication with Smyrna, Salonika and Damascus.

Hadi Pasha, Chief of the General Staff, a cousin of Mahmud Shevket Pasha, has resigned.

There is reason to believe that one of the causes of Mahmud Shevket's resignation was news of an anti-Government demonstration organized by the officers of the Damascus garrison. It is also reported that a number of officers of the Constantinople garrison have protested against the Court-martial's suspension of the Opposition Journal Ipham.

Vienna, July 10.

The resignation of Mahmud Shevket Pasha creates here the impression that the situation in Turkey is approaching a climax. The details of recent developments are too little known to justify the expression of positive opinions, but it is felt that something has snapped in Turkey, and that, though the tension may be relieved for the moment, there is nothing to show whether the retirement of the War Minister will mark the end or only the beginning of the struggle between the Army and the Government.

July 11.

Mahmud Shevket's resignation may not point to an immediate crisis in Turkey, but it is hard to interpret it in any sense favourable to the prospects of the Young Turks. The recent military mutinies, none the less dangerous in tendency because on a small scale, have no doubt been directed to a certain extent against Mahmud himself. On the other hand, any successor to the late Minister for War will have at least equal difficulties and less influence. The present régime seems incapable of pacifying Albania, and in the end peace with Italy will have to be concluded on terms which, however sensible in essence, will be a bitter disappointment by comparison with the illusory hopes so long excited. Mahmud Shevket may well think himself well out of it at present. But he will be heard of again.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

July 12.

Reuter's Agency learns in the diplomatic quarters most closely concerned that the reports of an approaching termination of the Turco-Italian war occasion surprise owing to the fact that "neither officially nor unofficially is anything known in London, nor has any information come from Rome or Constantinople, indicating any change in the attitude of the two Governments." Both Powers would welcome the termination of the hostilities.

Suggestions that the present crisis in Turkey may be due to a change of attitude on the part of the Government with regard to the war are declared to be incorrect. Mahmud Shevket's resignation of the War Ministry has no connection with any disagreement with the Government on the subject of the war and his withdrawal will not affect the Cabinet generally.

As regards mediation, both sides declare that it is as far off as ever, none of the friendly Powers having yet been able to discover a basis on which they can act in concert.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

The Turkish papers state that an English personage, whose name is not given, has given £129 in favour of the families of the sailors who lost their lives in the bombardment of Beirut.

A Paris telegram to the Agence Ottomane says it is believed that French political circles consider there is no reason to cast a doubt on the repeated Italian declarations that the occupation of islands in the Aegean is only provisional. It is feared, however, that it will be necessary to grant certain guarantees to the inhabitants of the islands.

Lieutenant Yahnou and Herr Rentzel, two aviators engaged by the Turkish Government in Germany as instructors for the Army, left Berlin yesterday for Constantinople. They will remain in Constantinople for some time in order to teach the Turkish officers how to handle the Harlau monoplane. Later on they will be sent to the seat of war.

The Rome correspondent of the Temps reports that in political circles the military situation is considered as having greatly improved during the past month. Decisive operations may be expected for the autumn.

All the points which have been occupied in Tripoli have now been fortified and this has allowed a slight reduction in the army of occupation. The troops thus liberated have been transferred to the Aegean Islands, where there are now sufficient troops to meet all eventualities. Satisfaction is also expressed in Rome at the naval operations in the Red Sea and the success of the revolt led by Sidi Idriss in the Yemen.

Dr. Dillon, who has been cruising among the islands, writes to the Daily Telegraph that the impecuniosity caused by the utter stagnation of trade and industry is beginning to border on distress among the population of the islands. The tanneries of Chios are closed, and the export and import business is almost at a standstill. Telegraphic communication is disorganized. Telegrams take four or five days to traverse thirty miles from island to island. The Italians cut the cable belonging to the European Company in two places, assuming that they were cutting two separate cables, whereas they left the one which the Turks had rented.

Italian schemes in Rhodes are enveloped in dense mystery. No journalists are allowed to land on the island, and even Italy's own official dragoman from Chios, when expelled from Turkey, was refused authorization to reside in Rhodes or even to visit it.

DURING the recent fighting near Homs the Italian troops captured in Turkish lines a European woman who had remained near her wounded horse. She had a rifle and 100 rounds of ammunition. The woman is being treated as a prisoner of war. She declines to give any information as to her identity.

News from Turkish Sources.

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade.")

Derna, July 1.

THE Almoyyed correspondent wires from the field of battle:—Two new war correspondents have arrived here—Monsieur Jobart for a well-known Austrian free-press paper and Monsieur Mollier for the "Teigebillet" of Germany.

Benghazi, July 2.

The European Powers are ransacking their brains to find out some way of bringing about a treaty, under the mistaken notion that this is possible on certain conditions. But they are in utter ignorance of the public opinion here. The other day I wired the resolution of the Arab conference. To-day I have been entrusted with a message for publication in the Almoyyed which runs as follows: "All the Arabs collected in the Turkish camp and unanimously swore by placing their hands on the Koran. 'Even if the war continued for 1,000 years we will never lay down the sword until our land has been purified from the profaning touch of Italian feet. Whatever negotiation the European Powers might carry on with the Sublime Porte and whatever treaties the Porte might sign with them will have absolutely no validity for us and we will utterly ignore them.'"

All the heads of the Sennusi monasteries, and the leaders of the Arab tribes, 1,000 of whom fully armed, are present in Benghazi alone, give notice through the columns of the Almoyyed that "there are only two possible solutions to the Tripoli problem and there is no third. Either Italy must conquer the whole of Tripoli by the sword or she must finally accept a defeat and call back all their soldiers from here. All of us, Arabs, desired that the whole Moslem Press should make this resolution of ours quite plain to the public all over the world and particularly in Constantinople and the capitals of all great kingdoms: so that the Powers may not waste their time in vain negotiations for peace."

Yesterday again the Italians, as is usual with them, fired 140 shells into the village Kowifa which is situated near the coast, but no damage was done except to a few dilapidated straw-huts and not a single man was killed. On the same day they fired many harmless shots on the coasts of Talunga and Togara.

The Arabs are swarming all along the coast and Arab tents can be seen hardly half an hour's walk from the sea. This fact has such a deterrent effect on the enemy that not a single soldier has the courage to land although a powerful Italian naval force is stationed in all the ports.

Baghag, July 7.

Nowadays the Italians have thrown all the burden of danger on the poor negroes and never come out in the night without sending some negroes ahead of them. In Masoo the Italians have organised a regiment of Nubians and always put them in the front whenever they have to fight the Arabs.

Ten Arabs have routed a whole battalion of Italian soldiers.

Benghazi, July 9.

A small company of Arabs had been lying in ambush for the Italians. But after waiting for some time they lost all patience and 10 of them charged right into a regiment of Italians. The Arabs were on foot and their Italian opponents were cavalry men, but even here they maintained the prestige of Islam and succeeded in killing seven Italians and coming back laden with captured weapons. The Italians have been so impressed by the heroism of the Arabs that they are in constant dread of them, so that when they saw the 10 Arabs charging their whole regiment they took fright and supposed that this must be the advance guard of an advancing company of Arabs. The Italians lost their head and in great confusion began to fire indiscriminately in all directions, with the result that many of their own number were killed, while not a single of the Arabs was even wounded.

Baghag, July 10.

For some time the Italians had stopped using the aeroplanes, because the Turkish guns had injured the aeroplanists far more than the damage they had caused to the Turks. But latterly they have begun to fly in the darkness of nights, thinking that they would be safe. But now they have again found out their mistake. Towards the last part of last night an Italian aeroplane ascended in Fiza, navigating by the help of electric light. But the Turks soon sighted them and turning up the mouths of the guns they fired two or three shots at the aeroplane. The aeroplane at once slowed down and turned round and flew away towards the Italian camp and never again ventured over the Turkish camp. When retreating it threw seven shells, but all of them fell harmlessly outside the Turkish camp and no one was injured.

Derna, July 12.

Monsieur Koiera, the proprietor of the Nile to-day started on his return journey to Cairo. But his wife is still engaged in the heroic work of the Red Crescent Society and will still remain in Tripoli.

Baghag, July 13.

Another correspondent, Monsieur Docar Shylle, who has been sent out by a leading journal of Frankfort, has just arrived in the Turkish camp. The first thing he has done after coming here is to go round inspecting all the Red Crescent Hospitals in company with the other German correspondents. He greatly admired the excellent work done by them and was specially impressed by the organisation of the Egyptian Red Crescent Society.

Baghag, July 14.

To-day three more soldiers from the Italian camp at Benghazi have deserted and come and joined the Turks. They report that epidemics are raging in the Italian camp at Benghazi and deaths are very frequent, and that the town is in great distress and destitution.

The Albanian Situation.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 3.

According to the Osmanischer Lloyd, the officers of the Salonika, Uskub, Adrianople, and Kirk Kilise garrisons have formally condemned the action of the Monastir mutineers under Tayer Bey and rejected their demands. At a meeting of officers held at Salonika on Sunday even the members of the semi-political secret society of officers, called the Irshadie, voted with their comrades against Tayer Bey's manifesto. The bulk of the Monastir garrison is said to be loyal to the present régime.

It is believed that Djavid Pasha, formerly in command of the Uskub Division, will succeed Fethi Pasha at Monastir.

Vienna, July 3.

A semi-official Note in the Neue Freie Presse says that it is undeniable that practically the whole corps of the Turkish officers takes a very lenient view of the mutiny at Monastir, because the mutineers' motives are entirely patriotic. According to the same source a change of Cabinet or changes in the composition of the Cabinet are very probable, but it is improbable that the present War Minister, Mahmud Shevket Pasha, will become Grand Vizier.

Zekki Pasha, the Army inspector, reports that a large number of sheikhs and Arabians have joined the mutineers.

Constantinople, July 5.

The Tanin categorically denies the rumour that the Government is prepared to accept all or any of the demands of the Monastir mutineers. Another deserting officer and a number of soldiers are reported to have been captured.

Constantinople, July 2.

It is not easy as yet to determine the extent or the exact character of the mutiny that has taken place at Monastir. Constantinople has been full of the wildest rumours, many of which have found eager credence in the neighbouring Balkan States. The Athenian newspapers represent the movement as comparable to the Young Turkish rebellion of 1908, and picture the present Young Turkish Government as sullenly anticipating the march of the mutineers on Constantinople, and as doggedly determined to carry the State with them to ruin rather than yield to the demands of a new Revolutionary Army. The Bulgarian Nationalist Press has not been behindhand, and the most sensational rumours have been magnified and elaborated with a force of luridly suggestive appeal that would surely have brought the whole Bulgarian population over the mountains into Macedonia, were the Bulgarians not too hard-headed to take their Press very seriously.

In Constantinople the Opposition Press—what is left of it—has not in its reports ventured a step beyond fully authorised official communications. Other journals have contented themselves with reprinting the reports published in the Salonika Press. Generally speaking, the information available in Constantinople is of a meagre character, and the fact, now clearly established, that the mutiny was due to the agitation of a secret Revolutionary Committee has stimulated the free play of fancy, and made it possible for fear and hope to fill in the details that are lacking.

What is now known of the movement with a tolerable approach to certainty is the following. There does exist, or did exist until last week, a secret political organisation under the name of Hyys-i-Vatan which may be translated as the National Defence League. The objects of this League are the overthrow of the Committee of Union and Progress and of the Government, the dissolution of Parliament, and the deposition of the Sultan, Mehmed V. The League made its appeal to the feeling of discontent aroused by the abuses committed during the last elections, but its chief aim was to bring about a return to theocratic absolutism. The idea of its promoters was that the Caliph should have about him a military staff, and that all orders should proceed directly from him. Proclamations explaining this idea were distributed in Serres. The agitation of the League was, however, apparently unsuccessful in the Serres and Constantinople garrisons, and also in Salonika. Agitation was carried on with greater success in Monastir and at certain points in Albania. The mutiny in Monastir led to a premature disclosure of the organisation, and many of those officers who were inclined to sympathise with its aims have once more declared themselves ardent supporters of the present régime. The total number of members of the League is said not to exceed 200. In its general character the League resembles the Islamic Fraternity which was organised shortly before the coup d'état of 1909.

The movement has been checked, and this, probably, before it had assumed very serious proportions. Otherwise the Government would hardly have decided on so demonstrative a measure as the introduction into Parliament of a Bill to prohibit military men taking part in politics. But the moral effect of the mutiny at Monastir has been out of all proportion to the numbers of the mutineers. The mutiny was an alarm-signal. It was perhaps the sharpest of the many reminders that the Young Turkish Party has received this year that the work of genuine administrative reform must be hastened and that the good work begun by Hadji Adil Bey in Macedonia and Albania must be rapidly and effectively continued in all parts of the Empire.

The discussion on the War Minister's Bill in the Chamber constituted an interesting test of the capacity and temper of the new Parliament. There was rather less "Hurrah patriotism" than might have been expected. The speech in which Mahmud Shevket Pasha attempted to reconcile the principle of the Bill with the conduct of the Army on the occasion of the proclamation of the Constitution, and at the time of the famous march on Constantinople in 1909, was not very warmly applauded. On the other hand, the references of the Opposition deputy, Ali Ghalib Bey, a retired colonel, and a slow, stubborn, and persistent speaker, to the part played by officers in maintaining the Young Turkish régime, caused a most unseemly uproar, in which the great majority of the deputies took part. One could not, however, help wondering at the comparative equanimity with which, at such a moment, the Parliament found it possible frankly to discuss the details of so delicate a question. And perhaps this openness and comparative calm were the most convincing indications that for the moment this particular danger was over.

Vienna, July 5.

The news from Turkey is becoming more and more confused. The report published in Constantinople that the mutineers have been severely defeated by the Turkish troops is not confirmed by any rumour that has reached Vienna. The latest reports current here are to the effect that desertions continue, and that the bulk of the mutineers are concentrated near Argyrocastro, where they are supported by the population and are constantly receiving reinforcements. The arrival of General Djavid Pasha at Monastir to make a last attempt to persuade the mutineers to capitulate is thought to be a sign that the Government means to use force. General Djavid is hated by the Albanians because of the cruel measures he adopted in 1910 to crush the rising in North-East Albania. It is expected here that events will now assume a critical character.

Commenting on the situation, the Neue Freie Presse, which has hitherto always been a pro-Committee organ, says that the news shows that the discontent among the officers, especially at Monastir, is much deeper than is officially admitted. Eighty per cent. of the officers, it says, oppose the Committee and sympathise with Colonel Sadik Bey. Deputations of officers from Uskub, Adrianople and Smyrna have, it is further stated, arrived in Constantinople to support the demands of the mutineers. The Committee, which owes its power to the Army, cannot refuse concessions if the Army insists on them. It would be madness, concludes the Neue Freie Presse, to risk civil war for party motives.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, July 4.

The despatch of troops to Monastir has continued all day. Four battalions under Kiazim Bey have been sent in pursuit of the mutineers and their Albanian associates now at Argyrocastro, where they are assured of abundant sympathy on the part of the population. The departure of this pursuing force has created a painful impression among the officers of the Monastir garrison, but there is every reason to suppose that the troops will refuse to fire on their comrades. The only argument that seems to have met with any success in avoiding a more forcible declaration of sympathy with the deserters has been that in view of the war with Italy the present is not a proper time to provoke internal strife. It is, however, impossible to tell what the day may bring forth. The Albanians of Basella, Tyran and Mat have taken up arms and gone to the mountains. They threaten a general rising. Two battalions from Merkez and one from Kirciova have been sent to the disturbed districts.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 5.

The situation has, apparently, improved in the last 48 hours, and the Government organs now deny that the authorities have entered into any pourparlers with the mutineers, who will be leniently treated if they surrender, but will be treated with the utmost severity if they remain obdurate. Details are still lacking, however, as to the state of affairs in Western Macedonia.

The Dibra correspondent of the Yeni Asir reports that a captain and ten men were killed in a recent fight with Mat tribesmen. The troops eventually ceased fire in order to "abstain from inflicting unnecessary losses on the insurgents" and are reported "under all reserve" to have left a machine gun in the hands of the latter.

Constantinople, July 9.

Djavid Pasha, who commanded the Turkish forces in the Lyuma operations in 1909, has been appointed acting commandant of the Monastir Army Corps. The appointment of a general known to be a strict disciplinarian has its advantages, but they are outweighed, according to certain critics, by the fact that he is intensely unpopular with the Albanians on account of the severity with which he is said to have conducted the Lyuma campaign.

Vienna, July 7.

A Turkish account of the fighting reported to have taken place between the Albanians under Isa Boletinat and the troops under Fadil Pasha near Vuchitrn states that Fadil Pasha attacked the Albanians with six battalions of infantry, three batteries of artillery and several Maxims. The Albanians, who numbered about 1,000, were dislodged from their positions, chiefly by Maxim fire, and took refuge in the nearest buildings. These were then demolished by the artillery. The Albanians lost heavily and retreated. Fadil Pasha, who had directed the operations in person, then returned to his headquarters after having ordered a pursuit. Isa Boletinat escaped.

This account of the fighting naturally requires confirmation. Some Austrian journals express regret that force should have been used at all against the Albanians at this juncture, when much may depend upon a pacific settlement with them and with the mutineers. Indeed, a somewhat alarmist note is being struck in Vienna, particularly by the Neue Freie Presse, which adjures the Committee of Union and Progress not to resist the movement in the Army, but to make any sacrifice of persons, and even of résumé, in order to save Turkey from a catastrophe. The same journal predicts grave developments during the next few days, but seeks consolation in the argument that, though the Committee may fall, Italy will be no nearer to peace because the opponents of the Committee are more bellicose than the Committee itself.

Whatever the feelings of the opponents of the Committee may be, it is certain that, should they prevail, they would not find themselves in a position as difficult as that of the Committee, which, being responsible for the war, cannot afford to make peace lest it be destroyed by popular indignation. A new regime might have a freer hand and be able justly to lay at the door of the Committee the blame for the losses now in viewable.

It is noteworthy that in the manifesto of the Albanian leaders published at Salonika no specific reference is made to the war. It says:—

"If the Albanians have raised the standard of revolution, the Turks must know that it is not only a question of Albania, but of saving the Ottoman State from an abyss that threatens to swallow it up. The Albanians were compelled to take up arms by the deplorable policy of the Young Turkish Government, a policy criticized by the whole civilized world and bound to lead sooner or later to the invasion of the Fatherland by its enemies and to the destruction, in consequence of the errors of a handful of braggarts, of the Ottoman Empire that has stood for six centuries."

This manifesto is signed by 18 leading Albanians from Djakova, Prizrend, Vuchitrn, Prishtina, and Mitrovitza. It appears to have been drafted in agreement with leaders of the military movement, whose programme it strongly resembles.

Vienna, July 9.

The efforts of the Turkish Government to crush the Albanian revolution by force of arms inspire serious misgivings here. Either, it is argued, the troops will succeed in establishing order by dint of military preponderance, in which case Turkey will require to keep a large army mobilized in Albania and Macedonia for months to come, or the bloodshed will accentuate the movement in the Army and bring Turkey within sight of the civil war which she has every reason to avoid. In neither case will the outlook be reassuring.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, July 8.

The situation created by the mutiny at Monastir has been robbed of much of its gravity by the failure of the garrison to join the movement. Zeki Pasha appears to have acted with considerable diplomatic skill and by amicable counsels to have prevented a general outbreak, which at one time was undoubtedly threatened. The negotiations with Tair Bey have, however, made no further progress. The regiments chiefly compromised in the rising are being transferred to other districts.

Heavy fighting has occurred at Aktchehissar, where the garrison was besieged by a strong force of Albanians. Reinforcements hurried from Elbasan were successful in driving off the rebels.

The Preveza authorities have captured a sailing ship containing 150 Mannlichers and 15,000 cartridges. Two Albanians have been arrested in connexion with the affair. The contraband had arrived from Arta and was intended to assist the rising in Southern Albania.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, July 8.

The latest intelligence from Salonika and Constantinople appears to conflict with the more optimistic view of the military crisis that prevailed last week in Turkish official quarters. The War Minister has ordered all preparations to be made for the immediate mobilization of 12 Redif brigades in the Salonika, Monastir and Kossovo army corps, in case the Albanian revolutionary movement should assume a graver aspect. This measure is attributed to the reported failure of the negotiations with the mutineer leaders, who have not only refused to return to their garrisons, but have declined to answer the Government proposals. The revolutionary movement is extending in the region round Elbasan and Durazzo. The Government has declared a state of siege in the district of Kroja.

Private messages from Constantinople suggest that the crisis may soon be solved or postponed by changes in the composition of the Cabinet, especially by the retirement of the War Minister, Mahmud Shevket Pasha. For the moment there is no positive indication that a change of this kind would bring about a marked improvement.

Constantinople, July 8.

It is believed that the principal obstacle, at least to a temporary settlement of the Monastir problem, is the natural reluctance of the Government, which decided to find extenuating circumstances for the misconduct of the rank and file, to grant a complete amnesty to Tair Bey and his fellow-officers who deserted the colours.

According to letters from Albania, there seems to have been a slight revival of insurgent activity at Kossovo during the last few days. On the other hand, the Albanians who recently cut up a convoy on the Mat River have been dispersed by a column from Durazzo. There were no Mirdites among them. Letters received from Northern Epirus to-day depict the situation at Argyrocastro and in the neighbouring districts in rather alarming colours.

Salonika, July 9.

Djavid Pasha, who has been appointed to succeed Fethi Pasha in the command at Monastir, entered upon his duties to-day. The situation at Monastir is unchanged, but trustworthy information shows that a spirit of mutiny and antagonism to the Committee of Union and Progress is apparent among the troops at Uskub and in Fadil Pasha's Albanian army. The Uskub company of the Mountain Artillery categorically refused to set out in pursuit of a body of rebels which appeared in that district, while orders to renew the attack on Isa Boletinat remain unexecuted because of the refusal of the troops to fight against co-religionists. This is direct confirmation of the report that at the recent Albanian reunion at Kaise between Tosks and Ghegs it was decided to propagate similar ideas among the troops.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

It has been rumoured that the Government had entered into pourparlers with the deserters from Monastir and it has even been alleged, says the Tanin, that some of their demands had been accepted and that the deserters were returning to their garrisons.

The Tanin learns that these rumours are groundless. There was never any question of the Government entering into negotiations with the insurgents. Not only has it not accepted any of their demands, but it has refused to pardon those who surrender unconditionally.

General Said Pasha, Commander of the Fifth Army Corps, said in the course of an interview with a correspondent of the Yeni Asir that as a soldier he does not wish to deal with politics and that consequently he should not make any statement concerning the Monastir incident. He did not however, look upon the incident as a political question as it concerns the army and interests the whole nation.

The importance of the incident had been exaggerated. In all societies there are elements who formulate demands at an inopportune moment and such demands are not taken into consideration. Whatever the nature of the demands of the officers who deserted from Monastir, they were made at the wrong moment. The Officers' Corps unanimously condemns the action of the deserters and demands their severe punishment. This suffices to show up in their true light the publications of the foreign press and the manifestos published in Bulgaria.

The deserters have already repented and are willing to surrender. The Government, however, will not let them go unpunished.

The Roumelie learns that the officers who deserted from Monastir are in the caza of Goritza in Southern Albania. The same journal believes that there exists an accord between them and the leaders of the Albanian revolt.

According to information from other sources these officers have abandoned the soldiers who followed them. These soldiers are said to be now in great misery.

The Salonika papers report that the commander of the forces in Albania will shortly issue a proclamation inviting the insurgents to surrender and to give up their arms to the authorities within three days.

If the insurgents continue to resist their strongholds will be destroyed, their families will be deported and their property will be confiscated.

The members of the councils of elders and the mukhtars who refuse to denounce the insurgents will be severely punished.

Mahmud Shevket Pasha.

MAHMUD SHEVKET PASHA first attracted the attention of Europe in April, 1909, when as commander of the Third Army Corps at Salonika he organised the march on Constantinople which overthrew Abdul Hamid. At the time of the first revolution in July, 1908, Mahmud Shevket was Vali of Kosovo. He took no prominent part in the events of that time, but the victorious Committee, recognising his ability, transferred him to the Salonika command. When the counter-revolution broke out, and the enemies of the Committee triumphed at Constantinople, Mahmud Shevket quickly transferred his troops to the capital, and within a week the reactionaries were in flight, Sultan was a helpless prisoner, and the Young Turks were again at the head of affairs.

Mahmud Shevket's achievement was brilliant, and his power was immense, but he showed no inclination to make himself dictator, and quietly awaited the decision of the statesmen. He became Minister of War, and held the office through all changes of Ministry up to yesterday, devoting himself with all his energy to the task of reorganising the Turkish army. He has shown himself somewhat too impatient of Treasury control, but that was, apparently, due solely to his passionate determination to perfect and strengthen the army, which had sunk into a terrible state under Abdul Hamid, and he seems to have had no ambition for excessive personal power. He has been a Moltke, not a Cromwell.

Mahmud Shevket was born in 1857 and is partly of Arab descent. He has lived and studied abroad, in France, and especially in Germany, and he is probably the best pupil of the German instructor of the Turkish army, Marshal von der Goltz Pasha.

Mahmud Shevket's Fall.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, July 11.

It is still impossible to gauge the situation in Turkey. In Austria, where Ottoman affairs are watched with keen attention, the only definite impression is that, as one journal phrases it, Mahmud Shevket's fall removes "the cornerstone of the tottering edifice" erected by the Committee of Union and Progress, and that the edifice itself is not likely long to outlast him. This impression may be accurate, but before accepting it unreservedly it would be requisite to know exactly why Mahmud Shevket fell. Hilmi Pasha is credited with the statement—corroborated from another quarter—that a threatened interpellation by Carasso Effendi of Salonika on alleged mal-administration in the commissariat of the Army was the determining cause of the resignation. But Carasso Effendi and his friend Rahmi are not likely to have acted against the wishes of Ministers like Djavid and Talaat Beys. The question, therefore, arises whether the men of Salonika drove the War Minister from office in the hope of propitiating military opinion and saving themselves for a while, or whether they arranged an attack upon him in order to prepare the way for a temporary eclipse of the Committee while someone else, preferably Kiamil Pasha, and his friends take over the management of affairs and fritter away their prestige in attempting to deal with an immature situation.

A singular feature of the comment upon the outlook in some Austrian and German organs is the complacency with which the advent of an "Anglophil" regime under Kiamil Pasha or Tewfik Pasha is predicted. It appears almost to be desired that England should now "walk in front," like Mr. Thomas Atkins in Kipling's famous poem. Even the Neues Wiener Tageblatt, in an article of semi-official flavour, points out the great value of British protection for Turkey at the present moment. England, it writes, saved Turkey from the forcing of the Dardanelles by Italy and from the raising of the Straits question by Russia.

"Besides, British favour is valuable for Turkey in the domain of internal politics, because people in Constantinople expect from it protection against the Balkan Committee, against the English partisans of Albanian autonomy, and against Armenian outrages in Asia Minor. Indeed, in the hope of bringing with British help the Greek Islands again under Ottoman rule, people in Constantinople are now negotiating for the establishment of a kind of British administrative control."

In vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird. England is not responsible for the troubles of Turkey, and it was not the British Ambassador, but, rather, a diplomatist now accredited to the Court of St. James' who assured the Turkish Government that Italy would never venture to touch Tripoli. It is not at a moment when the Turks themselves are striving to remedy in part the blunders of the Committee of Union and Progress that England or any foreign Power can hope to play the part of mentor without incurring odium and generating enmity. The Albanians have now resolved to take the offensive, Greek and Bulgarian bands are displaying marked activity, a patriotic religious movement is beginning in Asia Minor and the temper of a large part of the Army is uncertain. If the Powers were unselfish enough to think solely of the interests of the Ottoman Empire collective intervention at the opportune moment might possibly achieve some good results, but suggestions that one of them should act as warden while the others stand by and criticize is somewhat too ingenuous to command entire adhesion.

Chances of Peace.

(BY DR. E. J. DILLON.)

July 1.

WHEN may Europe hope to see the war terminated and peace restored? I put this question first to the highest representatives of Italy, and they replied, in substance: "Ask the Foreign Ministers of the Great Powers. On them it ultimately depends. We have done our part. We have beaten Turkey. True, she refuses to draw the practical consequences from her defeat, not because she is more stoical than her neighbours but because she is more presumptuous. Her exceptional position in Europe warrants her in the belief that she can do as she lists. And now it is the neutrals whom she is involving in her disaster. Europe, therefore, who is now beginning to suffer, is the arbiter of peace." I have just propounded the same question to the principal members of the Ottoman Government, and they say: "Only the Italians can answer you authoritatively. It depends on them. Whenever they desist from striking us we shall cease to parry their strokes. For that is all we are doing. And we should not be a nation nor, indeed, a community, if we did less. Our desire is for peace. We have proved it. We are ready to prove it again. If Italy, by repealing the decree of annexation, renders pourparlers possible, we are ready to talk things over with her in a broad spirit of give and take. And we are certain then to strike up an understanding, which, like all such compromises, without fully gratifying either side, will serve the best interests of both."

In Constantinople I debated this matter in all its bearings with the most influential members of the Cabinet and the most prominent chiefs of the Opposition. And in essentials they all agree. Turkey, they argue, "is but defending herself against a common highwayman. In this she is exercising an indefeasible right which Europe cannot call in question unless, indeed, the Powers be minded to break up the Empire and partition its territory. She only seeks to hold her own, which Italy vainly tries to wrest from her. Yet Italy has great odds in her favour. The possession of a navy as well as an army renders her, so to say, amphibious, whereas Turkey's movements are confined to land, and, as ill luck wills it, to land where the enemy is unwilling to show himself. On the water Turkey can do nothing. She has to look helplessly on at operations against herself which, when carried out without opposition, are magnified into signal victories. But Italy is striving to grasp what she cannot even span, and she has therefore to look to the Powers for assistance. Unhappily, not all of them are unwilling to grant it. Hence the history of the latest phases of the war is the story of the various devices by which the Consulta has striven to cajole the Powers or to intimidate them."

The organiser of Turkey's defences, Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, who is Minister of War, spoke very frankly with me on the subject. And say what one may about his political views, he is an eminent military authority, whose defence of Tripoli commands admiration and whose opinion on the question of war and peace carries weight. "It is the Italians who are waging war," he said, "not we. Defence is our rôle and we mean to keep to it as long as the attack continues. That is my answer to your question. Our attitude is right and reasonable. It clashes with nothing but Italy's greed of territory and contempt of international law. That is what we all feel about it in Turkey." "Yes, I know," I remarked; "but what I should like you to tell me is how the situation is affected by the capture of the islands?" "Nowise," he promptly rejoined. "The spirit of our people is fired more intensely than before. They are firmer than ever on the subject. But the situation is unaffected. You have seen and talked with our representative men. How many among them appeared discouraged by the occupation of the islands? How many talked of throwing up the sponge?" I answered "None." "The enemy is unable to wrest the coveted territory," continued the War Minister. "Everybody perceives that for he has given up military operations in Africa as a hopeless job. That is why he is exerting himself to obtain the territory from third parties. Do you suggest, does Europe suggest that we should hand it over to him? And, if so, on what grounds?"

"Many Europeans," I objected, "with just the same facts before them, set them in a different light. They argue that, without ships, you will never be able to purge Tripoli of the Italians. Consequently, the Italians have gone thither to stay. And as the war will not always continue, it must end with the establishment of Italy's domination in the country." The Minister said: "Yes, that is one way of putting it, but it is not mine. Consider the facts. Italy is not established in Tripoli at all. Her artillery enables a number of her troops to stay there now within the range of their guns. That's all. But this way of keeping them is costly, and therefore temporary. When the cash is exhausted with which the arrangement is being paid for, this artificial and provisional occupation of a strip of the coast will necessarily go with it, and 'Lybia' will become Tripoli, Cyrenaica, and Turkish again. That is how I contemplate it." "And you really expect a satisfactory ending to your plan of defence?" "Certainly I do."

From the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of the Interior and others I received similar statements. All seem absolute, all seem buoyant, all seem hopeful. And yet my impression runs counter to those assurances. And it is much more than an impression, for it has filtered into my mind through layers of words and acts which ought to have convinced me that what I saw and heard proved that nothing was changed. Much has been modified by recent events and episodes. Not that the loss of the islands makes much difference to the duration of the campaign. Probably none. But, all the same, it is a momentous factor in the international situation. With that new element I hope to deal later on.

"Don't you think that the capture of Rhodes and the other islands alters the outlook generally, and, therefore, peace prospects in particular?" I inquired of Cabinet Ministers. But their answers were to the effect that it did not make the Ottoman Government or people in the slightest degree less uncompromising on the subject of the African provinces. "It has intensified the spirit of resistance. That is all. In ready money it involves a loss of only some 24,000 English pounds a year. In the international situation it certainly does make a difference, which Italy will not relish." "But suppose Smyrna is bombarded, troops are landed, the city taken, its Customs revenue expropriated. What then?" "Better ask what will happen before then. We are ready for the enemy. Our troops are watching and waiting in and about Smyrna and if he lands we will receive him as we ought. You shall see."

Accordingly, I have come to Smyrna to see. But since my arrival here a week ago there has been nothing more exciting to chronicle than the appearance of an airship over the city one evening, the prevalence of sensational and groundless rumours among the Greeks about Italian warships, and the continual arrival of Turkish troops by rail, goods traffic being suspended in favour of the transport of soldiers. The Turks are in buoyant spirits. They are hoping to get a square fight with the enemy on equal terms, or even giving odds to the Italians. Officers and men are both in glee at the prospect. But I am unable to share their hopes. Italy, if she include Smyrna in her programme, will be content to bombard its old castle. She may even take the town. But her troops, even if they land, will hardly venture out from under cover of her artillery. Why should they? To run the risk of a serious defeat, of the undoing of Signor Giolitti's work, of the frustration of Italy's plans?

I had more than one interesting talk with General Abdullah Pasha on the subject, which confirmed me in my opinion. Abdullah Pasha is the commander of the troops here, whose duty it is to organise the defence of Smyrna. I met him in Constantinople before he came to Smyrna. He is a sensible, well balanced man, who sees things as nearly as possible as they are, and strives to make the best of them. He is distributing his troops among the various commanding positions as fast as they come, apportioning munitions of war among them, and exhibiting perfect calm the while. There is no hurry anywhere. Whithersoever I move, there are soldiers. On the side of the hill between Boudjah and Paradise (the name of the village next to Boudjah), down at the base of it, on the railway line, everywhere you pass encampments of soldiers, the white tents pitched, the horses resting under the shade of fig-trees or acacias or pomegranates, the soldiers smoking cigarettes or musing placidly. That is one side of the picture. There is another, which is not visible—the scenes of enlistment, which are less idyllic, sometimes indeed tragic. Numbers of Christians called to the colours are fleeing the country and emigrating to America for good. That, however, is another story. Abdullah Pasha is conducting his defence on the principle of thoroughness and, as he told me to-day, if the Italians come, he will accord them a warm reception, but will not be responsible for the consequences to Smyrna.

To come back to the main question, the duration of the war. I venture to submit certain reflections of my own based upon a study of the data, some of which have not, to my knowledge, been yet put forward in the Press.

Italy's resolve to annex "Lybia" is a task for the land army, and can be achieved only by the action of her troops in the provinces to be annexed. No ricochet of the billiard ball from the field of diplomacy to that of the battle will accomplish the feat. Italy may worst Turkey at sea, with manifold consequences to both. But among these consequences with the conquest and incorporation of "Lybia" will not be included. Nay, even if peace were formally signed, and the longed-for territory handed over to King Victor Emmanuel's Government, the outlook would still remain substantially the same; resistance would go on hardly the less vigorously on the part of the Arabs. It may be objected that the Arab defenders are common hirelings acting on the principle of "no piasters, no military service," and that peace once signed, the flow of gold would cease, and with it the Arabs' doughty deeds. But this argument is unconvincing. For even if money were the motive power that produces such heroism in the desert, we may be sure that there would be no lack of it after the Porte had signed the peace treaty. Private sources, as abundant as those of the State, would be put at the service of the dauntless Moslems. And if we ascribe the marvellous deeds of prowess accomplished by the defenders to fanaticism we may be certain that fanaticism would be fanned to still fiercer flame by the "defection of the Caliph." Consequently, happen what may, Italy having done her best or her worst in South-Eastern Europe will still have to return to Africa to face the warlike music there.

But the incorporation of Tripoli is one thing and the termination of the war with Turkey is another thing. The two contingencies stand in no casual relation to each other. And I venture to think that, leaving out of account an intervention on the part of the Powers, which would, of course, upset all calculations, hostilities may cease in one of the following ways: By Turkey destroying some of the units of the Italian navy, whether in the Dardanelles or elsewhere, by the use of submarines or aeroplanes; by one land army defeating the other in a decisive encounter; by the seizure of Mecca, or else by financial exhaustion. So far as one can now see, that exhausts the list of issues, always, of course, assuming that the Powers will hold aloof. Moreover, some of these potentialities must be eliminated at once as outside the range of the practical. Thus, after my talk with the War Minister, Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, I understand that there is not the faintest likelihood of Turkey investing money in an attempt to blow up any Italian warship outside the Dardanelles. The Minister has made, he told me, a thorough study of the subject, and come to the conclusion that as things are now the experiment is not worth making. Others think differently, but his decision is final.

Again, a serious rencontre between Italy and Turkey on land, without being wholly eliminated from the list of contingencies, is improbable. Signor Giolitti, who directs the campaign on the principle of administering occasional stimulants to the Italian nation, will not readily run big risks; and this would be one of the biggest. The Turks desire nothing more ardently than that the Italians should attack Smyrna and land troops there, advancing beyond the cover of their guns. That would soon bring things to a head. It would stake the success of Italy's Colonial enterprise on the fortune of war, and that is precisely what the Turks are longing for. It is obvious that they have far more incentives to heroism than the soldiers of King Victor Emmanuel. They are fired by religious zeal, by patriotic ardour, and, above all, by a hatred of Italy and the Italians which will endow them with uncommon strength. During my conversations with General Abdullah Pasha, the Commander of the forces defending Smyrna, and with some of his officers, I could remark and appreciate the impatience of the Turks to have a good stand-up fight with the invaders. But I do not think that they can hope for such a piece of luck.

A march on the Holy Places would be less risky in the abstract; but for the Italians to attack Mecca would in truth be a daring enterprise. Still, if it were successful it would end the war and attain the aim in view. For it would strike a vital—perhaps the most vital—part of the Turkish Empire. Mecca in danger would be Islam in fever. No ransom would be too high to redeem the sacred places. "Lybia" would be but as dust in the balance by comparison. No Cabinet in Constantinople, no public opinion in Egypt or elsewhere in Islam would hesitate to sacrifice the coveted provinces for the holy sites. But is the feat possible? I have discussed it with most competent men of all religions in and out of Turkey, and their answer is in the affirmative "Quite possible," said one of these, "as are many other enterprises in this curious campaign which Italy will neither accomplish nor attempt. This," he added bitterly, "is not a war, it is a series of naval operations, against undefended places, reinforced by diplomatic strategy against a Power whose 'friends' are few and lukewarm."

There is no doubt, however, that the Holy Places of Islam could be seized by a military State at war with Turkey and desirous of dealing a decisive blow, for they are inadequately defended, as every military man knows. The number of Ottoman troops there is small, far too small, to discharge the duty now imposed on them by circumstance. And it cannot be increased. The War Ministry would gladly despatch reinforcements thither if it could, but the centre is cut off from all the commanding positions. The Red Sea—the one route over which military detachments were heretofore sent—is blocked by Italian warships, and the Turkish military status quo there must remain unimproved. The troops which happen to be there to-day are thrown upon their own resources. They must do the best they can under most unfavourable conditions. The overland route traverses a desert which would become the cemetery of any large body of troops that ventured to march across it towards Mecca. Thus the Holy Places are insecure. And it is not as though all this talk of danger were fantastical. There is already an enemy of Turkey in the far distant country which the hostile fleet has cut off from Constantinople. His name is Seid Idris, he commands a number of native troops, and he is become a subsidised ally of Italy.

Seid Idris is a Muhammadan, but his religion sits lightly on him. He might therefore be tempted by the Italians to seize Mecca "in the interests of Islam," as he and they understand them. But I must confess that even if he were, and if he yielded to the temptation, I should not anticipate momentous results from it. His rival, the Inam Yahya (who has made peace with the Porte, and is now receiving £1,100 a month from Constantinople), would co-operate with the Turkish troops, easily bar his way, and drive him back. But if Italy herself were to despatch a large and well-provisioned body of her best troops against the Holy Places, the upshot might be different. One could then say that the end of the war was in sight. Italy, however, is not likely to run any such risks. "Bloodless victories," Signor Ciolitti calls for, and the nation will be satisfied with nothing else. Hence, prudence will continue to be regarded by Italy's commanding generals as the better part of valour.

The Turks are wide awake to the peril that hangs over them in Mecca. But they are also aware of how the wind is tempered to the shorn lamb. A Cabinet Council was recently convoked, and the subject brought to its knowledge. The discussion elicited the impossibility of adding to the number of troops so long as the war lasts. Meanwhile, it is possible to set about extending the Hedjaz Railway in the direction of Mecca. And the Cabinet Council resolved that if ever anything was urgent in this measure of defence. The line must be made. There must be no delay. This very year 100 kilometres of it must and shall be constructed at all costs. This line will enable the Government to convey soldiers to within a reasonable distance of the Holy Places, and to dread no surprises there. Meanwhile, Mecca is in danger because until the railway is built, Turkey could not succour the troops there if they were attacked.

Other troubles in the interior of Turkey of a sufficiently grave character to affect the war materially are improbable. No doubt Albania is a sore spot, and will continue to give trouble, and to warrant grave and ever graver misgivings until thorough reforms have been substituted for hollow promises. If the central authorities could take broad views and act in a business-like way all might be well yet. I have had a talk on the subject—a straight talk—with the Minister of the Interior, Hadji Adil Bey, who has just been travelling in the country and ascertaining the wishes of the people. He is a man of common sense and admirable intentions. And if his programme be carried out, the acuteness of the Albanian crisis will have been blunted. If. But in no case will the Albanian difficulty end the war.

To sum up. The Turks will not attempt to injure the Italian warships unless these enter the Dardanelles; the Italians will not face the Turks without the protection of their naval artillery, neither will they attempt to capture Mecca. Consequently, the only other hope of terminating the war lies in exhaustion, financial and moral.

And with that contingency, which may be regarded as the most probable of all, I will deal in another article.

The Daily Telegraph.

Story of an Italian Retreat.

The Cairo correspondent of the Allahabad Pioneer, writing on 3rd June, quotes from the Egyptian Gazette's correspondent in the Turkish camp at Derna an interesting account of the position there, from which we make the following extracts:—

It would appear that the Italian reports of victorious actions are far from true. The most advanced points of the Italian defences at Derna are but one kilometre (three-fifths of a mile) distant from the sea, and their efforts to protect themselves from the attacks of the Arabs have proved unavailing, for night after night the latter have managed to get into their lines and inflict great injury on them.

By far the most interesting part of the Gazette's despatch is in reference to the engagement of 3rd March at Derna. The lie direct is given to the Italian version published by the Neue Freie Presse. The correspondent writes:—"According to him (the Vienna reporter) the Italians fought from morning to night with the greatest determination, several times charging the enemy with fixed bayonets, and chasing him from position to position. Now, as a matter of fact up till about noon only our outposts were engaged. . . . the attack begun by the outposts was later developed, and a general attack on that flank was ordered. . . . We saw whole battalions rushing up en masse to the support of the enemy's firing line, which was being most effectually kept in check by a handful of Arabs. No advance in the true sense of the word was made throughout the day; they certainly threw out an additional flank firing line, and, of course, its supporting and reserve lines, but they were the only troops who may have been said to have advanced in any direction, and then only to lie down and do nothing at the first opportunity on reaching the danger zone. . . . As for the bayonets, I don't think I saw even the gleam of one the whole day, and no Italian did anything with one I am quite certain. In mid-afternoon they were so hard pressed that a movement rearwards was noticeable, but again receiving reinforcements they stood their ground for a little time, urged on the while by their officers.

"Towards nightfall, or about 5 p.m., the most amazing retreat I have ever imagined could be perpetrated by trained European troops began. The post they had been occupying, and which had been the bone of contention all day, is about a kilometre from their big fortress. Along this route, which appeared to us as a horizon, we could see the Italian troops running in companies, in fours, en masse, and en bloc, in the utmost disorder towards this nightly shelter. Had we had more troops at our command at the time, that disgraceful retreat would have been converted into such a defeat and utter disaster for the Italians that I doubt if 1,000 men of the division in action would have returned to their walls. The Italian report admits 150 casualties, and adds that the following day hundreds of bodies were found. Bodies, yes; but they do not say that they were Italian bodies, nor do they admit the loss of some 100 rifles thrown away, and, which were that night brought back into camp. The bodies of seven officers were also found by us, but Italian officers. . . . The Italian account also states that hundreds of the enemy were killed. The facts are 31 killed, 55 wounded."

According to this correspondent, during the past few months the Italians have little by little been vacating the advanced posts held by them. The position which was the scene of the fight on 3rd March and which they had been in the habit of holding in the daytime, was definitely abandoned by them at the end of the same month, and since then they have not ventured out of their lines. The Arabs, whilst they admire the Italian officers for their pluck, have the greatest contempt for the soldiers, who appear to be completely demoralised.

The Arab Resistance in Tripoli.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE Italian press is much exercised over an article which Field Marshal von der Goltz published on 29th June in the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna. The Field Marshal is still in the active service of the German army, and his utterances on that account are regarded in Italy as an unfriendly act involving the responsibility of the German Government. The following are the concluding passages from the article in question, which is entitled "Turkey and Peace":

"Turkish statesmen know as well as the European politicians who try to prove it to them that Turkish interests in Persia, the security of the frontiers in the Balkan Peninsula, the restoration of order in Macedonia and Albania, above all the building up of a good administration and the strengthening and better organisation of the army and navy and the defence against Russia, are more important for the future of the Turks than the possession of Tripoli. Yet they are unable to follow the advice of those who counsel them to yield. Elementary forces are often more powerful than diplomatic wisdom. A surrender would mean the surrender of all respect and authority in the Turks' own country, since neither the Arabs nor even the Turkish masses would realise the inevitableness of such a step and would regard it as a dishonour and shame. Let those who do not share this view try to persuade the masses to look at things differently.

"Nor must we under-rate the intensification which the self-consciousness of the Arabs has undergone in the process of their present resistance to the enemy. . . . This is a new phenomenon and a new achievement. There can be no doubt that the Arab population of Tripoli must now be judged differently from what it appeared but a year ago. It has (morally) gained considerably through the war, and must not be left in the lurch, if but for the reason that it would feel the betrayal now much more acutely than before. This must be borne in mind in all attempts at mediation if the situation is not to be jeopardised but improved by them. Had there been no annexation decree of 5th November 1911, in existence a solution of the quarrel might perhaps have been found in the autonomy of the province, with a native head but under the paramount influence of Italy, accompanied by the recognition of the more ideally than practically important supreme authority of the Sultan, which would have reconciled Moslem pride. This solution is now, however, impossible, and a new one must be found. But that may undoubtedly be best left to time and the two contending parties."

Trading with Tripoli.

(FROM THE "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, June 28.

The Vossische Zeitung publishes a despatch from a Tunis resident, who states he has been studying on the spot the organisation for supplying the Turks with food and war material. He says that the organisation is working so successfully that the war may continue for years, even if Turkey formally signs a peace.

The French Government declared that it could not prevent the supplying of the Hinterland of Tripoli with food from the Hinterland of Tunisia, as the Tripolitan tribes were always fed in that way. This trade since the war has increased largely; and the surplus is going to the Turks and Arab combatants. The trade has grown so great that once unknown settlements near the frontier have grown into flourishing trading towns. In particular that is true of Ben Gardan and Meninin. This trade is not concealed. The trade in arms and ammunition is an open secret. Everyone knows the dealers, their business, and when they start. Sometimes arms are despatched in automobiles from the town of Tunis itself; sometimes from Sfax, Gabes, and other coast places. The ammunition and arms caravans sometimes number 4,000 camels. Small Tunisian coast towns, where it was formerly not worthwhile for steamers to call, have now constant traffic. One line of steamers running from Tunis to El Biban, near the frontier, has begun to make a profit for the first time.

In addition, the Turks are beginning to get supplies direct from the Tripoli coast. Since the operations in the Aegean, the coast has been laxly watched. A fortnight ago several guns were landed thus meeting one of the greatest needs of the Turks, who are saving their artillery for the decisive battle they expect when the Italians are weakened.

The smuggling from Tunis is due to the unfriendliness of the Tunisian population and officials to Italians, who are regarded as cheap competitors. The Italian Government is well aware of the smuggling, and accepts it as a painful fact, knowing that no instructions from Paris would put an end to it.

The Italian Prisoners.

THE Berliner Tageblatt publishes a letter from its correspondent (Herr Max Müller) at Sidi Barrani dealing with the treatment of prisoners. He states that the Arabs kill all Italian prisoners who fall into their hands as an act of revenge for the massacres of the Arabs by the Italians at various times. The Turkish authorities are doing their best to stop this practice and have raised the price for every prisoner brought to them alive from 50 francs to £20 for a common soldier and £40 for an officer.

On one occasion, says the correspondent, at Derna a solitary living prisoner was brought into the camp, whose rifle, moreover, showed that in the course of the preceding action, which lasted several hours, he had not fired a single shot. While the Arabs were discussing this curious phenomenon a Turkish non-commissioned officer went up to the condemned man and, throwing his arms round his body, exclaimed: "You can only shoot this man by shooting me!" The brave act of the Turk had its effect and the prisoner was spared. But such incidents are naturally rare, and in spite of the tempting reward offered by the authorities, the Arabs kill the prisoners without compunction. The correspondent tells of a wounded Italian soldier who was being taken by a Turkish officer to the Red Crescent hospital, and was clubbed to death by a party of Arabs who caught sight of him. Another time, the correspondent relates, an Arab got hold of a wounded Italian and began speaking to him in an admonitory tone: "Ah, you are an Italian! You have at home a large, beautiful country, full of fruit and cattle, women and children, and everything you want in abundance. And now you have come here to take away from us our land, to steal our fruits and cattle, to carry off as slaves our women and children. But you will not succeed." And with this he gave the prisoner—who naturally had not understood a word of what he said—a blow from which he died.

The correspondent, however, adds that there is no mutilation of bodies or torture of prisoners, as the Italians allege and regards the well-known photographs of crucified Bersaglieri as "clumsy forgeries." He also says that the Italians are doing precisely the same as the Arabs, and at Derna have even hanged regular Turkish soldiers, using as a pretext the fact that the prisoners did not wear uniforms. The correspondent, however, explains that owing to the lack of uniforms the Turkish military authorities have duly introduced certain distinguishing marks and that Enver Bey himself wears no uniform.

The Future in Turkey.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, June 22.

THE word "Europe" has, on the ears of many Ottomans, a menacing sound. It is reminiscent of a historic antagonism. It is symbolic of a power bent on the final destruction of a religious and political organism that at one time seemed capable of blotting out the fair promise of a modern European civilisation. A great deal has been said and written here lately about the Cross and the Crescent, about the Italian war being a phase in the struggle between East and West, between Christianity and Islam. A great many bitter words have been uttered about the perfidy or the cynical indifference of the Great Powers, and it has been frequently assumed that Europe as a whole is by its very nature hostile to Turkey and to all that Turkey represents. There has been a tendency to lean back in consequence on Oriental tradition, and to call to mind the solidarity of Islam. Yet, at the same time, the sense of an indissoluble connection between Turkey and Europe has been growing. The feeling that the only way to evade the European menace is to adopt European principles of government has gained in strength. And this feeling predominates at present over all feelings of resentment against Europe, is perhaps stimulated by them. One hears far less now of general phrases about Islamic solidarity, about Ottomanism or any of the other "isms" with which national feeling has been stimulated. Patriotism is still strong, but it is less Chauvinistic in character. It is chastened. It looks to Europe with anxiety and with foreboding, but also with expectancy.

During the last fortnight the Turkish Press has been discussing the relations between Turkey and Europe, the question of alliances, and more especially the question of relations with England. The Tanin and the Sabah, reviewing the various suggestions that have been made for an alliance with one or other of the European groups of Powers, come to rather mournful conclusions. They point out that the question of an alliance would in any case be difficult to solve. Turkey would hardly ally herself with the group that includes Italy, and on the other hand, it would be very difficult for her, in view of Russia's present attitude, to enter into a combination which included the Muscovite Empire. But, adds the Tanin, there is one circumstance that for the moment effectually disposes of the question of an alliance, and that is that neither group has any use for Turkey, for in her present condition she would not be a help to, but a drag on, any Power with which she might be allied. The prosaic and humbling conclusion is that Turkey must set herself very diligently and very seriously to the work of reform.

This train of reasoning is not mere beating of the air. It is closely connected with a strong Anglophile tendency that has been manifesting itself lately in various forms. The origin of this tendency it is not easy to determine. Perhaps it has always existed, but was obscured for a year or two by a temporary revival of German influence. The Italian attack on Tripoli was a serious blow to German influence in Turkey, and a renewal of sympathy for England was in the circumstances only a question of time. The attitude taken up by the British Government on the occasion of the closure of the Dardanelles gave the very liveliest satisfaction in Constantinople, and every hint of goodwill towards Turkey contained in English public utterances is now seized upon with eager gratitude. The importance to Turkey of English support is keenly realised. England, at any rate, seems to be the most disinterested of all the European Powers, whose tortuous movements, whose cryptic utterances are now a matter of grave concern to the Ottoman Empire. The friendship of England is accordingly the most valuable at the present juncture. Observation shows that English sympathy for Turkey has declined because the promise of reform has not been fulfilled. Clearly, therefore, the only way to win back English sympathy is to make haste with reform, and, as the Tanin urges, the most effective proof that the Young Turkish Government can give of its earnestness in the work of reform is to invite the aid of foreign advisers. And there the question stands at present, as far as practical proposals are concerned.

That a warm feeling of goodwill for England exists is evident at every turn. Civilians have throughout been friendly towards England, but military men, under the influence of German training, have hitherto inclined towards Germany, and although the collapse of the Hamidian regime injured German prestige, the fact that military men played the leading part in the Revolution made possible a continuation of German influence, even under the new regime. It is, as has been pointed out, the Tripolitan War that has thrust German influence, for the time being, into the background and has allowed Anglophile sentiment full play. England is, in fact, so popular at the present moment that, as one Young Turkish leader remarked, she has only to give the sign, and she could have her way in Turkey. It is the moral prestige of England that is influencing Turkey now. It is the name of England, as representing a tradition of civilisation, liberty, and justice, that is now so popular. And that is why this pro-English sentiment is so closely bound up with that keen consciousness of the urgent necessity for reform which has found expression in the articles of the Tanin and other papers.

It must be admitted that Turks know comparatively little about England, and one finds remarkably few traces of direct English influence in Turkish public life. There exist many translations of French novels and poems, and French literature has powerfully influenced the newer Turkish literature. English literature is hardly known. A few of Shakespeare's plays have been translated by Abdullah Jevdet Bey—not directly from English, but on the basis of French and German versions—and "Hamlet" was recently performed by a Turkish theatrical company. English influence is very clearly to be discerned in the novels and stories of Halide Hamun, who received her education in the American Girls' College at Scutari. The Hakk is now publishing a series of articles on English poets by Mehmed Rauf Bey, a naval officer and a well-known novelist. One or two newspapers have correspondents in London who occasionally write articles descriptive of English political and social life. A knowledge of the English language is not widely disseminated amongst the Turks as it is, for instance, among the Armenians. English is not taught in the Government High Schools, but there is an English lecturer in the University, whose classes are, I believe, well attended. English is also taught in the Naval College at Halki, and a number of the cadets speak the language fairly well. But, on the whole, it may be said that in Turkey a beginning has barely been made in the study of English literature and civilisation.

Yet English influence is strong, and might easily be made much stronger. It rests on a firm traditional basis. It draws nourishment from memories of the aid given by England to Turkey, during the last century, and from the circumstance that the idea of a Turkish Constitution was brought by Reshid Pasha from England, and by him transmitted to Midhat Pasha. Moreover, Turks have received a favourable impression of the general fair dealing of Englishmen in the Near East. If the Turks do not know England and English civilisation as a whole, they, at any rate, know Englishmen, and perhaps that is why the Tanin intimates, in hardly veiled terms, a desire that the specialists to be invited to aid in the work of reform should be first and foremost Englishmen.

Interview with a Leader.

(FROM THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE.")

July 4.

THE latest news received from Turkey shows that the military movement which originated at Monastir is seriously threatening the continuation in power of the Committee of Union and Progress. Ismail Kemal Bey, the Albanian leader, who in the time of Abdul Hamid was Governor of Tripoli, and during the last few years has vigorously opposed the Jacobinism of the new regime, is at present in London, and we are indebted to him for the following details of the origin and the aims of the revolt now in progress:—

The cause of the whole trouble is to be found in the political conceptions of the Committee. Up to the present time Turkey has been a confederation of communities and groups, each of them having a strong individuality of itself, either ethnically, nationally, or religiously, and being at liberty to develop its particular character under the supremacy and leading of Othman's successors. Brought up in the tradition of Western Radicalism, the men of the new regime have started with the idea of absorbing into a highly centralised State all those particularisms. They have only succeeded in breaking up the Empire, since they are severing the bond of tradition and common interest that holds together the different pieces of the fabric.

Among the groups within Turkey, none is more fond of its ancient privileges than the Albanian. With Abdul Hamid, who, as a rule, was very careful not to interfere with the interests of the national and religious bodies in his dominions, they were real favourites. The change has been all the more unbearable for them, since from Constantinople so-called reforms have been pressed upon them: the taking of a census, the imposition of new taxes, the establishment of a sort of compulsory service, as a consequence of which they have been sent at times to far distant Arabia, the destruction of the kulchs, or fortified houses, and so forth.

Having opposed the new policy, they have been made the victims of three punitive expeditions during the last three years. Repressive laws have been passed, such as the law of 1909, whereby it is stipulated (Art. 30) that "if a band, after having attacked either the regular army or a section of the population, enters a village, the cottagers are bound to report to the authorities. Failing that, they become individually liable to a fine from £10 to £100." Art. 31 enacts that every family of which a member has joined a band shall be sent into exile. Such is the situation.

There are no regular means in existence for obtaining redress. Parliamentary elections have become a farce. In the former Chamber an Opposition group of about sixty was to be found. As a result of the last elections—they have taken place in many districts under martial law—this has been annihilated. The recent tour of inspection undertaken through Macedonia and Albania by Hadji Halil Bey, the Home Secretary, was hailed as pointing to the adoption of a more friendly policy. The outcome has been sadly disappointing. To the Albanians nothing has been offered beyond new military roads, Turkish schools, and the formation of 280 bodies of gendarmes.

To-day, with a view to retaining European sympathies while changing nothing in their drastic methods, the Turkish ministers are taking steps to secure the appointment of a distinguished English official—Mr. Robert Graves—as Inspector-General in Macedonia. The significance of this will be clear to all who remember that the present regime owes its very existence to the protestation that arose in Turkey when the Anglo-Russian programme, including among other items the appointment of a foreigner as Inspector-General, was made known. It amounts to a plain avowal of failure.

The only way left open is the way of battle. The Albanians, up till now divided between themselves and separated in rival clans, have united in face of the common foe. They will not disarm before a measure of large provincial autonomy allowing of their development on national lines has been conceded to them. Their programme was drafted in June, 1911, at a great assembly of leaders that gathered at Gertche. There is no question of a secession from Turkey, and Ismail Kemal Bey wants the point to be strongly emphasised. He goes even so far as to consider that the Albanian nation has a safer future before it if it continues inside the Empire than if it is left outside, exposed to the danger of European competition. However, by the Gertche programme the Albanians will stand and fall. In a few days' time important decisions will be taken by representatives of Northern and Southern Albania, who will gather at Cettinge and Corfu respectively.

What raises hope at the present time is that around them are rallying all the victims of the present regime, and that the army is more and more adopting a sympathetic attitude. About two months ago sixteen Albanian officers belonging to the garrison of Constantinople started a league of which every member has sworn not to take part in any campaign directed against the Albanians and their just claims. From the fact that a few days ago Abdullah Roba Pasha, who holds command over 40,000 men at Smyrna, refused to obey the orders to go to Albania wired from Constantinople it appears that the sixteen officers' league has wonderfully extended its branches.

The fact ought not to be wondered at. For a long time dissatisfaction has been rife in the army. Following upon the abortive counter-resolution of April, 1909, the Young Turks have dismissed from the army every officer suspected of being hostile to the Committee, trying at the same time to soothe them by granting a pension of a higher amount than the pay they were in receipt of for active service. On another hand, the truth about the state of the military preparations in Tripoli at the time of the Italian attack is spreading at last. It is known that the garrison in the vilayet was 480 strong, whereas in the time of the ex-Sultan it was never less than 20,000 men.

It is known that in spite of the numerous petitions sent to Parliament from Tripoli itself the compulsory service law has never been carried out in Africa. It is known, too, that, when the blow came, a chief accountant was acting as general governor and a major was in command of the troops. In short, the vilayet had been practically evacuated. All those facts are drawn from the report drafted by the acting Governor himself and handed by him on his arrival at Malta to the Ottoman Consul there.

All these details account for the military revolt that has originated at Monastir. Captain Teyar Bey, the leader, it may be noted, was serving with the Salonika Rifles in 1909, and revolted with them against the Committee. That detail is sufficient by itself to put the situation in its true light.

The Dardanelles Raid.

THE raid perpetrated by Italian torpedo boats, though it has been hailed with delirious exultation in the Italian newspapers, will not advance the reputation of Italy as a combatant. It is beyond dispute that the Turkish Government, after closing the Dardanelles, opened the straits in deference to the wishes of the Powers, whose trade was put to great inconvenience. To take advantage of this concession on the part of the Porte can scarcely be regarded as a chivalrous proceeding, and it is difficult to understand on what grounds the Italian journals declare that the persons who thus violated the comity of nations are heroes who "have written the most glorious page in the naval history of the world." The Italian press should reserve some epithets for their first bit of real naval warfare, which has still to come. Meanwhile the Powers are bound to take some notice of the extraordinary behaviour of Italy, which has placed them in a false position.—The Statesman.

One regrets the lack of a certain amount of the sporting spirit in the Italians. Up to now the Turks have generally allowed the invaders in Tripoli and elsewhere to report the killing of several hundred defenders with comparatively no losses on their side without publishing a series of contradictions. When the Ottomans got in first with the news of the raid on the Dardanelles and the sinking of two torpedo boats, the Italians might have permitted them that little victory. But no; they vigorously deny any damage to their vessels and also cast reflections upon the bad marksmanship of their foes. The good effect of the latter portion of the message is, however, rather lost when one realises that the Italian Commander practically confesses that it was by good luck rather than anything else that his squadron escaped. It appears that the "No Change" war has not yet exhausted its possibilities of amusement for the world at large.—The Empire.

The Mediterranean.

MR. LUCIEN WOLF, writing in the Daily Graphic, says:—The conclusions arrived at by the Prime Minister and the First Lord during their cruise of investigation in the Mediterranean a month ago are still an impenetrable secret. Lord Cromer last week in his otherwise very enigmatic speech in the House of Lords gave us a broad hint that something would be done to secure British interests. Whether that "something" will take an exclusively diplomatic or naval form or that of a combination of both cannot yet be stated. So much, however, may be averred—the question on its diplomatic side has been very fully considered by the Foreign Office, and it has already been decided to take steps for the negotiation of a new status quo agreement to which it is intended that Great Britain, France and Italy shall be parties. The scheme originated in Paris, and was under discussion even before Mr. Asquith and Mr. Winston Churchill returned from Malta, I believe, indeed, that I am correct in stating that it was settled in principle between Sir Edward Grey and M. Cambon on 5th June. Later on the opinion of the Cabinet was taken, and, this proving favourable, the necessary instructions were given to our Ambassador in Rome to bring the matter to the notice of the Italian Government.

As the proposals now stand the status quo to which they relate comprises the recognition of the Italian annexation of Tripoli, but excludes any further territorial changes, such as for example, the alienation from Turkey of the Aegean Islands even in a modified form. But, of course, it cannot take effect until Italy has obtained a legal right to Tripoli through the consent of the Ottoman Government. The reason why the negotiations have been set on foot now is that it is feared that unless the chief Mediterranean Powers come to an early agreement with Italy he may be compelled to look elsewhere for support, and in that case the result may be that new elements of a necessarily disturbing nature would be introduced into the Mediterranean problem.

During the last twenty-five years we have had two such agreements, and they have both proved useless. One was negotiated with Italy in 1887 and was virtually repudiated by her in 1901. The other, signed in 1907, was a triangular arrangement between ourselves and Spain on the one hand and France and Spain on the other, and lasted rather less than four years.

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

The Week.

The Ministry.

THE Times of August 5th states that there is reason to believe that changes in the Ministry are pending, involving a by-election in Scotland. The rumours that the Master of Elibank is relinquishing his duties have been revived. It is possible that Lord Gladstone, who has just arrived in England, may not return to South Africa.

The alleged impending changes in the Cabinet are the chief topic of conversation. The changes are said to be based on two certainties, namely, the retirement of Lord Morley and the return of Lord Gladstone to England. It is also believed that Lord Crewe is feeling the strain of the India Office and it would cause no surprise if he succeeded Lord Morley, while the name of the Master of Elibank is coupled with the Governor-Generalship of South Africa. Other reports are that Mr. Birrell will go to the Lords with a less exacting post, and that Mr. Herbert Samuel will succeed to the Irish Secretaryship.

Reuter's Agency is authorised to say that there is no foundation for the rumours in the press with regard to the Master of Elibank. The Colonial Office denies the report of the resignation of Lord Gladstone, who, it is stated, intends to return to South Africa in October. Mr. Birrell likewise has issued a denial of the rumour in connection with himself.

However, in spite of these denials Cabinet changes are undoubtedly expected prior to the meeting of Parliament in October, but a definite announcement will probably be deferred until after the holiday's. The papers of August 6th are busy Cabinet-making. They concur that the Master of Elibank will shortly be promoted and that Lord Morley will remain till the Home Rule Bill has been passed. The Daily Chronicle states that the Master of Elibank will succeed Lord Crewe, who may become Lord Privy Seal. The Daily News says that Earl Beauchamp may become Secretary of State for India.

It is officially stated on August 7th that the Master of Elibank has been raised to the Peerage and that Mr. Illingworth will succeed him.

In a letter to his constituents the Master of Elibank regrets his resignation but says that relaxation is imperative after the strain of recent years. The cause of Liberalism, he continues, is nearest his heart and his retirement from the position of Whip is not due to difference on any part of the policy of the party for which he will continue to work.

The Times says there is a very general feeling that the Master of Elibank's gifts should be utilised in an Ambassadorship.

The Master of Elibank has become Managing Director of Messrs. Weetman Pearson, Limited.

Franco-Russian Alliance.

M. POINCARÉ, the French Premier, starts for Russia on the 4th instant.

It is announced in Paris that there have been conversations between the chiefs of the French and the Russian staffs with the object of placing on a more precise basis the Military Convention of 1892, by extending it to the Navy in view of the modified naval situation.

The French newspapers applaud the conclusion of the naval convention with Russia, regarding it as a natural corollary of the existing military convention. They recognise that it cannot become operative for some time, inasmuch as the Russian fleet is still in the course of construction. They insist that it will conduce to the interests of peace.

Consequent on the Franco-Russian Naval Convention which has recently formed the subject of conversations between the French and Russian staffs rumour is crystallising into the speculation as to how it affects the Mediterranean and whether it provides for the co-operation of the Russian Black Sea Fleet in certain eventualities.

The Austrian press discusses the possibility of the establishment of Russian, French, and Italian naval bases in the Ægean in which case Austria would certainly submit a similar claim.

The Times correspondent in Paris says that there are good reasons for believing that exchange of views between the British and French naval authorities preceded the conclusion of the Convention.

China.

Reuter wires from Peking on August 4th :—China has agreed to the Russian demands for compensation in the case of the killing of Said Effendi, a Russian Mussulman in Khotan. The Prefect and Magistrate have been dismissed and an officer will be responsible for the trial in open court. The Russian Consul at Kashgar and local officials will fix the amount of the compensation.

Dr. Morrison, says the Times correspondent in Peking, has accepted the post of Political Adviser to the President of the Chinese Republic for a period of five years. He begins his duties in October.

Afghanistan.

A deputation of tribal headmen from the Khost Valley is proceeding to Kabul to receive from the Amir a "firman" confirming the settlement recently made by General Nadir Khan with Mangal and Ghilzai Maliks. It is reported from Peshawar that the annual visit of certain Afridi jirgahs to Kabul will take place this month.

With a view to securing a line of communication between Logar and Khost the Amir has ordered a chain of posts to be established and reserved supplies to be placed in them. This will facilitate the movement of troops from Kabul in case of trouble at any future time with the Mangals and other local tribesmen.

Mr. Montagu.

At a meeting at Cambridge, on August 3rd Mr. Montagu confirmed the report that he would visit India for the opening of the new Council.

MR. MONTAGU, accompanied by his brother Lionel, embarks on the Malaja on the 4th. October. He will proceed to Delhi, after which the brothers will tour through all parts of India. They will probably spend Christmas as the guests of the Maharaja Scindia of Gwalior. They will visit Burma and leave for England early in February. The tour will be entirely unofficial.

Indian Council Chamber.

In the House of Commons, on the 7th August, Captain Arthur Murray complained that the Imperial Legislative Council in India would not have its own building in New Delhi but would be obliged to meet in the wing of the Viceroy's building.

Mr. Montagu replied that though under the same roof, the rooms of the Legislative Council would be completely separated from the Viceroy's residence.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

THE Times of August 2nd, discussing the Indian Budget statement, which it generally approves, suggests that Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's appointment to the Indian Public Services Commission be reconsidered. The paper strongly condemns the appointment of Mr. Mallet as Secretary for Indian students which it regards as an indefensible departure, as was the appointment of Mr. Clark, from the principles usually supposed to govern the choice of public servants.

The Times of August 3rd publishes prominently a letter signed "Imperialist," drawing attention to the remarks made by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald in the discussion on the Indian Budget about persons who went to India and got sun-baked and were not good for anything, although they thought they knew everything. They reproduced in the end all the vices of the Western and Oriental worlds, and showed very few of the virtues of either. "Imperialist" says these remarks applied to His Majesty's public servants in India, and asks whether Mr. Macdonald is a proper person to hold a place on the Indian Commission.

The Daily Chronicle of August 3rd strongly resents what it describes as "the unwarrantable attack" on Mr. Ramsay Macdonald in the Times, especially the suggestion that his appointment to the Indian Commission should be reconsidered. The paper criticises "Imperialist's" anonymity, and says it is gross unfairness to detach a single sentence from a long and able speech. It says that Mr. Macdonald did not cover the whole Civil Service in the sentence quoted; but anyhow Mr. Macdonald has closely studied perplexing problems in India and is fully entitled to express his opinions. The paper concludes that the public at large certainly regards the inclusion of a Labour member both as justified and necessary.

Mr. Asquith in reply to Sir Henry Craik in the House of Commons, on the 6th August, said that he declined to reconsider Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's appointment to the Indian Commission. He said he was convinced that Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, like the rest of his colleagues, would not fail to show the necessary impartiality.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald thereupon rose to make an explanation of the speech which he made during the debate on the Indian Budget. He complained that a wrong construction had been placed on his remarks with regard to the "persons who went to India and got sun-baked," etc. He said he did not intend these remarks to apply to the Service generally but only to individuals. He believed that his written fair criticisms were not resented by the Service. He had always endorsed the just praise of the Service.

Public Service Commission.

No appointment as co-opted members to the Islington Commission had been made up to August 5th.

A similar experiment was made with the last Police Commission and some of the co-opted members, prominent among them Sir Robert Carlyle did useful work. As soon as the Secretary's appointment is settled the preliminary arrangement will begin and possibly each department will take steps to do some spade work for the Commission in which the members who are in India, particularly Mr. Sly, can co-operate as was done by Sir William Meyer for the Decentralisation Commission.

The United Provinces Congress Committee have appointed a Sub-Committee to draw up a representation to be submitted to the Secretary of State and the Viceroy expressing their disappointment at the constitution of the Public Service Commission, and in the meanwhile have sent a cable to Lord Crewe on the subject praying for the appointment of at least two more Congress members.

It is understood that the Royal Commission on Indian Services will begin its sittings in next January and will leave for England in April and then return to India in the following cold weather.

The Khan of Hoti.

MR. MACCALLUM SCOTT in the House of Commons on the 6th August put a series of questions with reference to the Khan of Hoti Mardan.

Mr. Montagu replied that Lord Crewe was presenting papers from the Government of India immediately. He said that apart from the Khan's guilt or innocence, Lord Crewe fully concurred with the Government of India in thinking that the prima facie evidence in the case justified the action of the North-West Province authorities in arresting the Khan, who, he declared, was treated with all possible consideration. Lord Crewe had satisfied himself that the allegations against Sir George Roos-Keppel were absolutely baseless. The various earlier incidents connected with the Khan had no connection whatever with his arrest and trial.

Mr. MacCallum Scott persisted in making references to the matter defying the Speaker's summons to sit down. He was thereupon suspended for the remainder of the session, including the autumn.

In the House of Commons a statement by Mr. MacCallum Scott was read on the 7th August unreservedly regretting his disrespect towards the Speaker who accepted the apology. Mr. Asquith intimated that he would move that the suspension be rescinded when Parliament re-assembled.

Indian Educational Service.

The following communiqué was issued by the Education Department on August 6th:—The Government of India had last year decided to address the Secretary of State regarding the pay and prospects of the Indian and Provincial Educational Services. In view of the probability of the formation of a Royal Commission on the public services in India the communications were delayed. Pending the results of the Commission's enquiries no further action is possible.

The London Moslem League.

The annual report of the All India Moslem League at London was presented at a general meeting on the 9th August. It says that the course of events in Tripoli and Persia implying pressure of strong nations on weak, European or Asiatic, is doing a great deal to create a solidarity of interest and sentiment among the different nationalities of India.

Fresh efforts for a Hindu-Moslem modus vivendi should be made and the report suggests the formation of a representative joint board at which questions affecting the general interests of the country be discussed and afterwards placed before representative associations. It suggests also the interchange of delegates between the Congress and the League as a means of educating people gradually to fuller co-operation. The success of the scheme depends not merely upon the spirit of amity and toleration on both sides but also on the full recognition of the principle of co-ordination.

The report suggests a mutual and purely voluntary arrangement for avoiding where Muhammadans are in a minority the sacrifice of kine out of regard for Hindu sentiment and the substitution of goats and sheep, Hindus on their part abandoning the proscription and disparagement of the Urdu language, and allowing Muhammadans peaceably to enjoy the constitutional privileges accorded to them and the participation on equal terms of the benefits of the British Rule.

Presiding at the meeting of the Moslem League at London on the 7th August Mr. Ameer Ali, referring to Lord Macdonnell's criticisms, said Moslem organisations were much less exotic than many similar bodies. They came into existence without outside impulse and worked without outside inspiration. He strongly depreciated the attack on Indian civilians, who were loyally devoted to their duty and sympathetic to the people. If the commission evolved a system attaching less importance to examinalational aptitude than to training, decision of character and breeding, it would do real good.

The Hon. Mr. Sarbadhikary, seconding the report, said that after the extension of the right hand of fellowship to Hindus as demonstrated in the Report, it would be unpardonable if progress were not made towards mutual good-will and co-operation.

Mr. Harold Cox said that the most important work of the League for many years would be in London in forming and influencing public opinion.

Haj Pilgrims.

THE following Press communiqué is issued by the Punjab Government on the 8th August:—All pilgrims proceeding to the Hedjaz are advised to purchase their passages to Jeddah at the port of embarkation through a broker licensed by Government and not through an unauthorised broker who may take advantage of a pilgrim's ignorance. As all licensed brokers are subjected to certain rules and to the supervision of Government officers, pilgrims applying to them can be certain of benefitting to the fullest extent by the reductions to which the rates for passages to Jeddah are liable owing to the competition of rival steamship companies engaged in the pilgrim traffic. The benefit of these fluctuations is likely to be lost to pilgrims who are induced possibly by entirely misleading announcements to purchase their passages from a single agency in advance and at a centre remote from the play of competition. Pilgrims are further advised that the only recognized protectors of pilgrims are the officers appointed by Government at the ports of Bombay and Karachi.

Moslem Education.

DELEGATES from important cities in the Deccan were present at the Islamia School where the annual Muhammadan Educational Conference began on the 7th August. His Excellency Sir George Clarke opened the Conference and a number of European gentlemen including the Hon. Mr. Claud Hill, General Sir Arthur Barrett, the Hon. Mr. Prior and Mr. Justice Shah Din of the Punjab Chief Court were present.

The Hon. Moulvi Rafiuddin Ahmed, Secretary to the Conference, in welcoming His Excellency said this was their fourth Conference the objects of which were first, to bring together annually the wise heads of their community to take counsel together regarding Muhammadan education; and, secondly, to bring to the notice of the Government the educational requirements of their community. He trusted the presence of so many distinguished statesmen there that day was an earnest of the sympathy of Government with the cause of Muhammadan education.

His Excellency Sir George Clarke in addressing the Conference said, he noted with pleasure that the Muhammadan community had made notable advances during the four years he had been in India. There had been a visible awakening to the needs of education which should lead in the direction they wished to move and they possessed a Moslem organisation which, if directed consistently on sound lines, must go far in uplifting the Muhammadans of India and winning for them their rightful place in the nation that is still to be born. From his point of view the awakening of the spirit of a new life was of infinitely greater importance than anything which Government had done or could have done for them. What had Government done for the Parsis but given them law and order where chaos once reigned? The moral was plain for them to read. If the Muhammadans had dropped back in the race they could regain all and more than they had lost by adapting themselves to the age. This Conference was a favourable omen. His Excellency spoke of the efforts to establish a Muhammadan University and of the munificent contributions of Sir Currimbhoy Ibrahim to the Royal Institute of Science and his thoughtful provision for special scholarships which would prove of immense value to Muhammadan students. His Excellency strongly advised his hearers to have nothing to do with compulsion at the present premature stage in the development of education and concluded with words of well-meant advice.

Mr. Justice Shah Din after the departure of His Excellency delivered his presidential address.

The Muhammadan Educational Conference, Mr. Justice Shah Din presiding, passed resolutions on August 8th urging, (1) extension of education amongst girls; (2) raising the Poona camp school to the status of a high school; (3) establishment of a separate Government inspecting agency under an educational Inspector for Urdu Schools in the divisions of the Bombay Presidency not so provided; (4) establishment of an Urdu Training College for the Bombay Presidency; (5) allowing all first grade Urdu schools to teach English up to the third standard; (6) increasing the number of Muhammadan members of the Text-Book Committee and (7) prescription of an Urdu course for all Middle High Schools with Urdu teachers.

REUTER'S messages from Constantinople, though not sufficiently clear, disclose, nevertheless, a very grave and disquieting state of affairs in Turkey. Until we get more detailed and authentic information, it is obviously difficult to gauge the trend of events and estimate the strength of the rival forces that render the situation so full of peril. As we noted in our survey of the situation a fortnight ago, the new Ministry has begun its career with a decisive and radical change of aim and policy. The fact was bound to react on the internal situation. Albania is still unpacified; Bulgar bands are active again with fresh virulence; disturbing incidents have occurred on the Montenegrin frontier; Bulgaria is growing bellicose; Parliament has been dissolved; and a state of siege has again been proclaimed in Constantinople. The Government seems to be pursuing a campaign of active hostility against the Committee of Union and Progress. This is very unfortunate. The Committee is the most powerful and, with all its faults, the most patriotic and active organisation in the country. Any attempt to break its power would inevitably lead to a bitter war of faction and imperil the safety of the Empire. We trust, however, the sense of responsibility and patriotism of the Government will help it to speedily rise above petty personal rivalries and antagonism of aim and method and restore peace, order, and harmony in the affairs of the Empire. The internal crisis is grave; the foreign situation is full of menace. The task of Ottoman statesmanship was never heavier than it is to-day. The whole Islamic world is watching the disquieting events with deep anxiety and concern. We believe the Ottoman statesmen realise their responsibilities and will make every needful effort and sacrifice to close their ranks and achieve a unity of aim and purpose and present a united front to the enemy who has twice knocked at the gates of the capital. The situation, though grave, is by no means hopeless or irremediable. There is no reason to believe all what the alarmist telegrams portend and there is no occasion for despair. Such crises are by no means uncommon in the affairs of a State undergoing constitutional adjustment and reconstruction. The outlook would have indeed been hopeless if the Turkish leaders were men lacking in patriotism, grit, and resolution. We shall deal with the whole subject later on when the situation clears a little and the contending forces emerge in feature and outline.

We are extremely gratified to find that the Government of India has declared its approval of the principles of the Bill which the Hon. Mr. Bhurgri introduced, some time ago, in the Bombay Legislative Council for the levying of a cess for the promotion of Moslem education in Sind. We believe this is the first occasion on which a section of the Indian people has voluntarily come forward with a proposal for being taxed for its educational needs. We are in perfect sympathy with the Sind Moslems in the commendable attempts they are making to realise their aspirations for intellectual and moral progress, and we wish them the fullest measure of success. The Hon. Mr. Bhurgri, in introducing the Bill, made out a very strong case for the measure. The statistics bearing on the state of Moslem education in Sind reveal a state of affairs which should be immediately remedied. It is to be deeply regretted that in a province where they represent more than 75 per cent. of the population, the Mussalmans should be the most backward community "in all departments of social and political life and in all the arts and activities of civilisation." We are in perfect agreement with Mr. Bhurgri in thinking that "the main reason for this is the Mussalman's lack of education." It is this educational backwardness which is responsible not only for "that lack of initiative and stolid, fatuous conservatism" which gives birth to "a positive hostility of the Muhammadans to modern methods and implements in agriculture," but also for "the hopeless thriftlessness and improvidence which places them at the mercy of rapacious money lenders." In reviewing the present condition of Moslem education in Sind, Mr. Bhurgri first deplored the extremely unsatisfactory nature of the mektebs which absorbed a considerable portion of the Moslem children of school going age. He quoted the opinion of an educational inspector to prove that these mektebs were "a fraudulent farce" which tended to "no mental, moral or physical development" and in which nothing was taught beyond an unintelligent memorising of the Koran. The students "could not even sign their own names." The Hon. Mr. Bhurgri, again, quoted statistics to prove the frightful backwardness of the Moslems in primary education and showed that the actual number of Moslem boys in primary schools was only from 29 to 34 per cent. As regards the secondary education, the state of things was "even more deplorable." In higher education the Mussalmans approach an almost vanishing point, for "with a population of over 2½ millions in Sind there are to be found in that province hardly more than a dozen and a half Muhammadan graduates." Mr. Bhurgri attributed this great educational backwardness to the fact that the Muhammadans, the bulk of whom were agriculturists living in distant villages, were unable to attend the educational institutions, which were "few and far between," and that the majority of them were too poor to pay the heavy tuition fees and the expenses "of making special arrangements for board and lodging in far off educational centres." Self-taxation was, under attendant circumstances, the only possible remedy. The Hon. Mr. Bhurgri assured the Council that the Sind Moslems had welcomed the Bill with alacrity. It was circulated to 4,000 landholders, and their verdict was almost unanimously "in favour of the measure." The main object of the Bill is to provide an annual recurring revenue of Rs. 1,25,000 by "empowering the Government to levy on all Sind Mussalman landholders a cess of a quarter of an anna on every rupee assessable to ordinary land revenue." The ordinary official machinery for the realisation of the land revenue is to be utilised in the collection of this cess; and the cost of collection, which would else be prohibitive, is to be thus avoided. The recurring revenue thus realised is to be used for "creating a sufficient number of scholarships for secondary and higher education, for opening new primary and secondary schools where urgently required, for improving the mektebs and bringing them up to the standard which the Government schools maintain, for introducing elementary instruction in agricultural subjects, for providing hostels wherever there are efficient Government and private schools and for making arrangements for religious instruction in them." The objects set forth above are worthy of all sacrifice and endeavour. Every sincere well-wisher of the community will rejoice at the admirable example of self-help shown by the Sind Moslems and will be thankful to the Government for accepting the principles of the Bill. We have, however, observed with surprise, not unmixed with amusement, that the "nationalist" press has been actively opposing the passage of this Bill into Law. We fail to see how the efforts of the Sind Moslems for self-amelioration can be hurtful to "nationalist" aspirations, unless, indeed, an ignorant and helpless Moslem community is necessary for the growth of swaraj. Our only consolation is that the objects of the Bill are absolutely harmless and beneficial and cannot be easily covered by the facile cry of "separation."

IN AN earlier issue we had noted with satisfaction that H. H. the Aga Khan and the Right Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali were taking the necessary steps to establish Red Crescent Society as a permanent institution and secure for it the recognition of the Hague Tribunal. It may be noted in this connection that the All-India Moslem League had some time ago passed a resolution on the subject. The League had requested Mr. Ameer Ali "to take measures for the establishment of the British Red Crescent Society as a permanent institution, thus ensuring its recognition by the Hague Tribunal." We trust the Provincial Leagues will also express their views on the matter at an early date and submit them for information to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The ultimate success of the plan depends on the active sympathy and help of the British Foreign Office. We have every reason to think that Sir Edward Grey will gladly render assistance in the attainment of an object so obviously beneficent and humane.

THE Secretary of the Moslem University Constitution Committee has, it seems, hit upon the convenient method of issuing occasional bulletins to justify his inactivity. The community has been waiting for months past to know what sort of Regulations and Bye-Laws have been framed by the Constitution Committee. The Secretary takes a number of vernacular papers into his confidence every fortnight and elaborately explains why the draft Regulations and Bye-Laws have not been published. The latest bulletin seems to make a grievance of the insistent public demand, and the Secretary protests innocence almost with a groan. He seems to say:—"I have prepared the draft Regulations. They are so far incomplete because the Bye-Laws have not yet been framed. How cruel, therefore, to blame me for the delay for which the Bye-Laws Sub-Committee alone is responsible." Very true and very reasonable! Only the Mussalmans must still remain in ignorance of what the constitution of their university is to be. The spectacle of pots accusing pans may be a not unedifying relief to a whole community weary of waiting in the dark. Perhaps another ukase of the Education Department is needed to move the officials of the Constitution Committee out of their ruts.

WE ARE glad to note that the Mussalmans of India are making steady and continuous efforts to send material help to their suffering brethren in Tripoli. Moslem sympathy for the victims of the Italian aggression is widespread in this country, and contributions to the Relief Fund are being collected even in distant villages and out-of-the-way places. Only recently the "Imam" of a small village mosque in the United Provinces raised some money from amongst the small Moslem community of his place and sent it to the Imperial Ottoman Ambassador in London. In acknowledgment of this act of sympathy the Imam has received the following letter from the Counsellor of the Embassy:—"I beg to acknowledge receipt of a money-order for four pounds eight shillings and eight pence enclosed in your letter of 25th June and to present to you and the other Muslim contributors the sincere thanks of the Imperial Ottoman Government for their generous donation, which will be sent at once to our suffering brothers in Africa. The Ambassador has asked me to convey to you the great satisfaction he has felt at this fresh proof of the deep attachment of our Muslim brethren of India to the Caliphate and the cause of Islam."

WE PUBLISHED in our last issue a letter from a correspondent in Ajmere-Merwara, complaining of the treatment which is being meted out to the Moslems of the province in the matter of their representation in the public services. The correspondent has shown by a comparison of actual figures that the Mussalmans do not receive their fair share of public appointments. Surely, things must be in a rather bad way when out of 40 appointments with salaries ranging from Rs. 600 to Rs. 600 per mensem, the Mussalmans hold only three posts in the lowest grades. Representations have been repeatedly made, but nothing tangible seems to have so far resulted from them. We understand the Judicial Department of the province is about to be re-organised. We trust the provincial authorities will make some effort to redress the balance and remove the just grievances of the Mussalmans. The existing state of affairs is obviously unfair. The Mussalmans represent nearly 25 per cent. of the total population of Ajmere-Merwara, while their proportion in provincial appointments is 8 per cent. and that, too, in the lowest grades of the service. Moslem candidates of requisite capacity can be had in abundance, only the silent but formidable opposition of the monopolist stands in their way.

THIS week we are forwarding along with the Comrade a copy of the appeal issued by the authorities of the Calcutta Muhammadan Orphanage, which we had noticed in our columns some weeks ago. Subsequently we had announced that Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal had, with her characteristic generosity, made a munificent annual donation in response to this appeal. We need not reiterate all that we have said about the extreme urgency of the needs which have dictated this appeal or of the duty of the Muhammadans all over India to contribute liberally in helping the Orphanage authorities to continue their philanthropic work, which they have hitherto been doing in face of so many difficulties. We hope this appeal will be responded to very heartily all over India. We have already received several letters asking for information as to the address to which contributions are to be sent. The requisite information is contained in the closing passage of the appeal.

DESPITE the optimism affected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the assurance given, only the other day, by Mr. Asquith in his statement in the Imperial Defence Committee that "our relations with the great German Empire are relations of amity and good-will," the only impression left on the mind, after reading the reports of the Supplementary Naval Estimates debate, is that the two great Powers are breathlessly engaged in active rivalry for naval supremacy. That such feverish preparations to meet the possible eventuality of a deadly struggle in no distant future are suddenly taken in hand at a time when extensive schemes of far-reaching social reforms are being launched, gives a rude shock to the snug self-complacency of the international pacifists who failed to see in these "exigencies of certain places" any "need for panic or alarm." We can safely dismiss Mr. Churchill's subsequent explanation of the drastic measures as flimsy official apologies. It seems to us a very faulty logic to say that the Mediterranean squadron was "useless because of the presence of new and more efficient ships" of other Powers. That, if any thing, should be the very reason why, instead of crippling the naval power in the Mediterranean, it should have been greatly strengthened—the more so in view of "the vital importance," as the Earl of Selborne put it, "of the Mediterranean as our shortest and most direct route to India." The Mediterranean is, just at the present moment, the scene of a great international convulsion which threatens imminently to embroil several European Powers with one another. The only acceptable explanation of this forced temporary neglect "in safeguarding vital interests in the Mediterranean," was given by Mr. Asquith when he said that "the redistribution was necessitated by a shifting of the naval centre of gravity" to Home waters. This seems to be thoroughly borne out by the whole tone and language of Mr. Churchill's pronouncement, made while introducing the Supplementary Estimates. The new German Navy law is responsible for that "remarkable constant and instant readiness for war," which, by Mr. Churchill's own admission, "finds no example in the previous practice of modern naval Powers." To what "goal" this closely competitive policy of naval expansion of the two great rival Powers is "marching unswervingly," it is not difficult to surmise. But we are confident there is no adequate reason for all this flutter in the British Diplomatic dovecot. After all, the desire for colonial expansion is very natural on the part of Germany, which is universally admitted to have passed beyond that "margin of cultivation" after which no national expansion is possible within the limits of a country. And we have more pity than sympathy for that nervousness and suspicion which characterises the attitude of the British public towards Germany. However, according to Lord Charles Beresford, "for Britain the one bright spot in the outlook" seems to consist in the growing earnest desire of the Dominions to be "conscious partners in the burden and the right of the Empire." In fact, this was by far the most important feature of the whole debate and constitutes a turning point in the history of the British Empire. Mr. Borden gave an unmistakable exposition of the attitude of Canada towards the Mother-country; and the Premier made a ready "response to this obviously reasonable appeal to be heard in the determination of the Empire's policy and the direction of its affairs."

The Comrade.

Hindu-Moslem Relations.

THE vain, self-complacent and irrepressibly busy type of public man, who admirably contrives to keep himself in the limelight as "communal patriot", is a product of a complex environment. Like many other things that are a little difficult to account for in India's problem, he is sometimes described as a creature of the British rule. That does not, however, explain him as he should be explained if we are to get a correct measure of the race antagonism he represents in Indian politics. He is a concrete, a visible symbol of the vital forces of creed and history that divide the Indian communities into rival camps. He has been abused and maligned with, perhaps, a little too much show of righteousness. The invective has not killed him, and he still bestrides the situation as a colossal riddle. An effort to understand him and enter into his skin would be more effective if he is to be dislodged from his position of immense prestige and power than the thousand-horse-power phrases with which he has hitherto been bombarded.

How does India justify her "communal patriots"? The "nationalist" of the Congress school would swear by "nationality" and "patriotism" and vehemently deny that any such monster could exist in his ranks, and point, with a mild, deprecating gesture, to "Moslem Leagues" and their cries for "separate electorates." The Mussalman would hold forth on the woes of "minorities," the imperative duty of self-preservation and the aggressive spirit and character of Hindu "nationalism." These self-righteous attitudes prove not only that the problem is not even half-understood, but also that the "patriotism" in vogue in this country is exclusively Hindu or Mussalman. Discussions on this subject have seldom been inspired by intellectual honesty and courage. Much of the "patriotic" literature is fumbling, shallow and jejune. Not only it lacks sincerity and breadth of outlook, but it also betrays inordinate fondness for crude subterfuges and cheap claptrap with a view to secure some paltry advantage in the struggle for race ascendancy. The "communal patriot" only reflects in his inadequacy, narrowness and fanaticism the temper of his people. Without attempting a detailed analysis of the factors that hamper the growth of a truly Indian patriotism, it may be worth while studying how the communal fanatic has been evolved. Many centuries of Moslem rule in India had given the Hindus an immense power of adaptability to varying political conditions. They readily availed themselves of the facilities for education and material progress which British rule brought within their reach, because they were not burdened like the Mussalmans with a pride of race and powerful traditions of empire. Western literature gave them a free access to ideas of political freedom and democracy; and they naturally and justly began to dream of self-government and organised national existence. They looked back and searched for fresh inspiration, but the oracles of the past were dumb. Before them lay a boundless sea of hope, aspiration and experiment. If the past could not offer a chart and a compass for the new voyage, clearly the fault lay with the Mussalmans who had viciously strayed into Bharat and demolished its political features and landmarks. Instead of accepting philosophically what could not be undone, they began to quarrel with history. This attitude speedily produced amongst the majority of the educated Hindus the unfortunate habit of ignoring the one great reality of the Indian situation—the existence of about 70 million Mussalmans who had made a permanent home in this country. Whatever may be the inspiration of Hinduism as a religious creed, the educated Hindus made it a rallying symbol for political unity. The aspiration for self-government arrested all movements for social reform, which the early impulse towards liberalism had called forth amongst the educated Hindus. Past history was ransacked for new political formulas; and by a natural and inevitable process "nationality" and "patriotism" began to be associated with Hinduism. The Hindu "communal patriot" sprang into existence with "swaraj" as his war-cry. He refuses to give quarter to the Mussalman unless the latter quietly shuffles off his individuality and becomes completely hinduised. He knows, of course, the use of the words like "India" and "territorial nationality", and they form an important part of his vocabulary. But the Mussalmans weigh on his consciousness, all the same, as a troublesome irrelevance; and he would thank his stars if some great exodus or even a geological cataclysm could give him riddance.

The Moslem "communal patriot" owes his origin to a very different set of circumstances. His community lagged behind in the race by moodily sulking in its tents and declining, for a considerable time, to avail itself of the facilities for intellectual and material progress. When it made up its mind to accept the inevitable and move with the times, it suddenly found itself face to face with a community vastly superior to it, in number, in wealth, in education, in political organisation and power, in a word, a united community uttering new accents and pulsating with new hope. The spectacle of a go-ahead Hinduism, dreaming of self-government and produced by our repeatedly reminding a certain well-known Calcutta clique of self-constituted representatives of the Mussalmans of the universe that the public at large is not quite prepared to take them at their own valuation as patriots, politicians, prophets, and law-givers. The presumption, which some time back dictated the tall order to the Caliph of all true believers to "cede Dar-ul-Islam to Christendom without bloodshed," though by no means annihilated, seems to have been considerably tamed. It is at least some consolation to find that these self-advertising gentry have realised that the responsibility of representing the Moslems of the whole universe is a little too heavy even for their audacious shoulders. As it is, this time they contented themselves in the recent Calcutta mass (thin) meeting with putting forward the very modest claim of being the mouthpiece of only the "Indian Moslems." They have even deigned to stoop to a disreputable "respectfulness for the benevolent personal influence of His Majesty the Amir-ul-M-mineen" and seem to have adopted "the watchword of 'hope'", which His Britannic Majesty lately gave us, as a variant to break the monotony of constantly "expecting" the Ottoman Empire, the Moslem world, and the Universe in general to accept as gospel truth whatever falls from their august lips. It is sweet to see these "Lords of humankind" fall on their knees and implore "all Ottoman parties, civil and military, to sink differences and make every sacrifice to protect the Caliphate" and bow implicitly to the "veteran leadership of new Grand Vizier Field-Marshal Mukhtaar Pasha." What makes these periodical solemn farces really deplorable is that the Red Crescent Society, of all institutions, is the organisation which is used as a tool for this self-laudation. So far as we know, the Calcutta R. C. S. "representatives" have not yet made public any accounts of their financial dealings. However, we trust these "leaders" of the Calcutta Moslems would give up the questionable procedure of utilising the situation in Turkey as a stepping stone to popularity and fame. It is nothing short of stark madness to presume to dictate "counsels of perfection" to "veteran leaders" and Grand Viziers of a far-off kingdom. And we would strongly counsel our Indo-Ottoman lawgivers to spend more of their time and energies in justifying their existence in the land they live in and less in these occasional outbursts which must very much discredit Moslem political sagacity in the eyes of their neighbours.

playing with its ancient gods clad in the vesture of democracy, dazed the conservative Mussalman, who was just shaking himself free from the paralysing grip of the past. He realised that the spirit of the fight had changed. The weapons were new and so were the ways to use those weapons. He felt as if he was being treated as an alien, as a meddling freak, who had wantonly interfered with the course of Indian History. Strange incidents were raked up from his long and eventful career, which he was called upon to justify. He had come as a conqueror and had freely given to India the best that was in him. With the loss of empire he felt as if he were to lose his self-respect as well. The "communal patriots" amongst the Hindus treated him as a prisoner in the dock, and loudly complained of him as an impossible factor in the scheme of India's future. Then, again, the new conditions of political success alarmed him. It was to him a painful education to learn that wisdom consisted in lung-power multiplied by the millions and political strength lay in the counting of the heads. His community was small in numbers, ignorant and poor. He was a negligible quantity in the visions of the Hindu "patriot." His religion and history had given him an individuality which he was very loth to lose. As a consequence he drew within his shell and nursed ideals of communal patriotism. He has been scared into this attitude in self-defence. The Hindu "communal patriot" has an advantage over him in the choice of his formulas. While the former boldly walks at road in the garb of India's champion, the latter, less mobile and more unfortunate, formulates even his unimpeachable right to live in terms of apology.

This is, in broad outline, the atmosphere in which the Hindu-Moslem problem has taken its rise. The race antagonism owes its virulence mainly to a false reading of history. The past has flung out its dead hand to paralyse the present. Practical issues of politics are swayed by the foolish but eminently real resentment of the Hindu "patriot" at the political domination of the Mussalman in a bygone period of Indian history and by the equally foolish yet powerful sentiment of the Mussalman about his vanished power and prestige and empire. The temper of the "communal patriots" has grown aggressive and bellicose on the one hand and suspicious, sensitive and irritable on the other. The Hindu tries to ignore the Mussalman; the latter retaliates by assuming that all "nationalist" desires are a snare, if not a delusion. Yet the fiction is industriously kept up about the identity of interests, and the organs of Hindu "nationalism" use facile phrases about Indian unity, as if there existed no vital differences of feeling, temper, ideals and standpoints. The first step towards the solution of the problem is to recognise honestly and courageously that the problem in all its magnitude and many-sided aspects exists. We must clearly recognise that the Hindus and the Mussalmans dwell apart in thought and sentiment, that the Hindu "patriot" is, at times, intolerant and grasping, that he dreams of the India that is to be as a modern shrine he is going to build for his gods, that the Mussalman is getting a little too clannish, that he is only dimly aware of what it means to feel a generous enthusiasm for such great secular causes as self government and nationality, and that he broods over his loss and moves about in a world of unsubstantial shadows. It is when we have recognised all this that any progress in the direction of Hindu-Moslem rapprochement will become possible. The Mussalman who imagines his community to be entirely free of blame is either a man of simple texture or a politician of a very complex type. The Hindu who talks of his community as wholly innocent must be talking with his tongue in his cheeks.

Let us look at the facts. To take an important instance, separate representation of the Mussalmans in the legislative chambers of the country has been denounced with a vehemence that must have struck even the Hindu "communal patriots" themselves as a little tactless and crude. With the existing state of racial feeling, the cry for mixed electorates cannot but alarm the Mussalmans and create in their minds a strong suspicion of Hindu motives. Surely, the cant about the interests being identical has grown too barefaced even to serve as a tag for newspaper "patriotism." It is because the immediate, the practical issues of the day divide the Hindus and the Mussalmans that communal representation has become a cardinal feature in the political evolution of the country. If the Hindu "patriot" is not thinking of an exclusively Hindu India, if he wants the Mussalmans to exercise their due influence on Indian affairs, his demand for the mixed electorates is an insoluble riddle. The temper that inspires this demand has many facets; and it is when we study all the facets together in their right perspective that the Hindu attitude becomes intelligible and, indeed, alarming. Let us take another question which is said to have been a powerful factor in the growth of racial bitterness. Cows have been responsible for many riots in the country and many riotous campaigns in the Press. If only the Mussalman gave up eating beef, we are told by many well-meaning persons, the Hindu-Moslem relations would grow in goodwill and cordiality at a bound. Professor Hamersham Cox has made an appeal to the Mussalmans in the latest issue of the Modern Review to give up the use of beef for the sake of their Hindu neighbours. The appeal is inspired by sincerity and by Professor Cox's anxiety for the welfare of the Indian people. We thoroughly appreciate the motive, though we are constrained to say that the learned writer has not taken note of all the elements that constitute this curious problem. Let us allow at once that the cow is sacred in the eyes of the Hindu and that the killing of the animal causes him considerable distress and pain. And it is because we accept these facts in their fullest import, that we regard any wanton offence caused by a Mussalman to Hindu sentiment as a social crime. But it is possible, at the same time, to try to make the problem appear more grave and portentous than it is, or ought to be. It is sometimes forgotten that to a non-Hindu a cow is an ordinary quadruped and no more. A Mussalman who eats beef does so on the score of its comparative cheapness. Is it not possible that the Hindu, while retaining all his reverence for the animal, should leave others to their own notions of its utility, as long as they are not wantonly offensive? The educated Hindu who assures us that cow-killing lies at the root of racial bitterness makes rather a large demand on our credulity. India may be in varying stages of development from the twelfth century onward, but the sense of proportion of her educated sons is surely quite abreast of the twentieth's.

We need not multiply instances to show how the attitude of the Hindu "communal patriots" has alarmed the Mussalmans and driven them into a comparative isolation. The walls of separation can be broken down only if a radical change takes place in the conceptions of communal duty and patriotism. The responsibility of the Hindus is much greater in the matter, because they are more powerful and have sometimes used their strength with strange disregard to consequences. The Mussalmans stand aloof because they are afraid of being completely swallowed up. Any true patriot of India working for the evolution of Indian nationality will have to accept the communal individuality of the Mussalmans as the basis of his constructive effort. This is the irreducible factor of the situation, and the politician who ignores it has no conception of the task that awaits India's statesmen. People talk sometimes of the need of the Mussalmans joining hands with the Hindus, because some incidents in contemporary history have not been exactly to their liking. They conceive of Moslem "policy" as something wholly apart from Moslem interests, entirely unrelated to contemporary facts and past history, something necessary for a bargain, a toy that one might have for the mere fun of politics. Soft-headed and some self-advertising folk have gone about proclaiming that the Mussalmans should join the Congress because the Government had revoked the Partition of Bengal or because Persia and Turkey are in trouble. We were simply amused at this irresponsible fatuity. But when a responsible body like the London Branch of the All-India Moslem League talks of closer co-operation between the Hindus and Mussalmans because the Mussalmans of Tripoli and Persia have been the victims of European aggression, we realize for the first time that even sane and level-headed men can run off at a tangent and confuse the issues. What has the Moslem situation abroad to do with the condition of the Indian Mussalmans? Either their interests come actually into conflict with those of the Hindus, or they have been all along guilty of a great political meanness and hypocrisy. Has the Indian situation undergone a change? Are the Hindu "communal patriots" less militant to-day and have they grown more considerate and careful about Moslem sentiments? Have the questions that really divide the two communities lost their force and meaning? If not, then the problem remains exactly where it was at any time in recent Indian history. Boards of arbitration, peace syndicates and solemn pacts about cows cannot solve it any more than we can, by a spell of occult words control the winds and the tides. The communal sentiment and temper must change, and interests must grow identical before the Hindus and the Moslems can be welded into a united nationality. The problem is great, in fact, one of the greatest known to history. None, however, need despair, as the influences of education, and the levelling, liberalising tendencies of the times are bound to succeed in creating political individuality out of the diversity of creed and race. Any attempt to impose artificial unity is sure to end in failure, if not in disaster.

Education in India.

LIKE every people newly roused to a sense of their inadequacy, the Indians have been chasing one mirage after another with a hope that has sometimes amounted to religion. The failure of stark enthusiasm to wrest from a universe of false appearances the secret of national well-being has in itself been a liberal education. The Indians have at last been taught to feel that panaceas do not exist, that it is possible to mistake a consequence for a cause, that a full-grown national life is like a tree bursting into leaf and flower and fruit and not a house upholstered to order. To the awakening mind of India the first sight of European democracies was a dazzling experience. The political institutions of those democracies appeared as the open sesame to a life of beauty, joy, and power. Politics, therefore, became the first love of Young India. The intoxication of effort, the desire to possess a thing that looked so delightful and fair, the self-confidence that comes from inexperience, inspired the early generations of educated Indians with a hope of easy victory. Politics, however, is a jealous and heartless muse. Gradually it began to be realised that the path to success was steep and weary, that politics was not the whole thing and that it was doubtful even if it was the most necessary thing. Millennium was not to be had by importing institutions ready made.

The disillusionment has, nevertheless, been fruitful of good results. Educated Indians are fast acquiring a true sense of proportion. Political grievances of the people have ceased to be the only theme of public discussion. A knowledge of their true needs and limitations is growing apace, and the activities of public men are attaining the necessary balance and direction. It is being recognised at last that the Indian people must get a thorough training and preparation for a full-grown national life. The problem of preparation is difficult beyond measure, and years of patient work and co-ordinated endeavour will have to be devoted to its study before a way can be found to a sure solution. An ancient society in a process of dissolution, with a past offering little guidance for future, with great differences, of creed and race, of culture, ideal and aspiration, can work but slowly to a new and complete synthesis. The first thing needful under the circumstances is to prepare a rallying centre for the best intellectual and moral impulses of Young India and create facilities for the growth of collective mind. In other words, it is in the highest degree important to organise a process of training that would eventually lead to the development of a unified system of national education. The teacher is the supreme need of the present and the future, not only the professional teacher of schools and colleges, but every thinker who can throw out a fresh idea, every speaker who can influence large masses of men to fresh purpose, every writer and poet and artist whose book and song and art can furnish men with new glimpses into life and new aspiration for a better future. The supreme need is to create an atmosphere for the birth of collective mind and conscience.

It is pleasant to see that the best minds of the country are concentrating their energy and attention on the task of training and educating the people. The Government, too, is at last beginning to feel that the education of India is a great imperial concern. Mr. Montagu, in the course of his Budget statement in Parliament, outlined a programme which the Indian Government would pursue for the organisation and development of Indian education. The programme, though not ideally perfect, covers an extensive area and would lead to good results, if worked out with energy and vigour. The principles underlying State education in India have been shaped by expediency and a sort of low utilitarianism. The main idea of Government has been to train men for the ministerial posts in the public services; and naturally enough, the type of public instruction hitherto in vogue in this country has provided a mere mechanical training of a few intellectual faculties. It has absolutely failed to train personality because it has been innocent of ideals, has been inspired by no collective will and has consequently failed to touch character and mind with a unifying purpose. Public education organised and directed by a foreign government cannot become national in the broad sense of the term. It may produce useful and clever men. After immense labour and expense it may even produce men with highly trained faculties and initiative to strike out new lines of career, men who may succeed in business enterprise or become captains of industry. But it will rarely give birth to men of large purposes and great ideas, who would sum up in their personality the hopes and the intellectual and moral possibilities of the race and would in turn enlarge the scope of those possibilities and enrich the common life with new hopes. Only a national education can evolve this virile, ample and gracious type. And yet, a truly national education for India are a remote possibility; and all plans for the training of the younger generations are at present to be in the nature of compromise. For, it cannot be too often repeated that the only efficient instrument for the organisation of modern education is the State. Decentralisation may be good for some administrative purposes, but the vast problem of education can be treated satisfactorily only on wholesale principles. This is specially true of elementary education. A person without elementary knowledge of the things necessary for a purposeful existence cannot be a good citizen. The contrivance of civilisation for a rapid circulation of ideas and the despatch of the work of daily life, which the knowledge of the three R's represents, is as much necessary for the purposes of efficient citizenship as the organisation of the social services and the apparatus of public justice. Every recognised duty of the State means, in a sense, a corresponding surrender of individual right. Public law implies compulsion. The State in its modern sense is an instrument of social readjustment according to the varying needs of the community. It has already assailed some of the most intimate personal prerogatives of the parent. Collective will and mind, as expressed through State organisation, have been declared to be far better fitted to look after the training of the younger generation than the caprice, the inadequate will and imperfect intelligence of the individual. Elementary education, therefore, is one of the primary duties of a modern State, and the Indian Government can never enjoy an easy conscience as long as that duty remains undischarged.

As regards Secondary and Higher Education, we think the highest results can be attained only if its organisation and control are in the hands of the Indians themselves. The only key to the solution of this aspect of the problem is to encourage private enterprise. Indian Government, by its very character and constitution, can only be a very clumsy instrument in evoking the collective mind of India. The State schools and colleges and universities, however efficient and well-equipped, cannot train character and personality on national lines. It is only a Hindu or a Moslem University that can furnish the necessary ground for the germination of the people's genius. The restriction of the scope of these Universities, from the standpoint of India's collective educational needs, is the most short-sighted blunder committed by the Secretary of State. The impulses for wholesome national life, which a contact with Western culture has called forth amongst the Indian mind, want a home for a full, many-sided expression. The decision recently announced in regard to the scope of the Hindu and Moslem University Schemes, would choke those impulses and retard the development of Indian education on right lines. Mr. Montagu is satisfied to think that "the Government might be proud of their record, and if their educational ideals were realised, they would have laid the foundation of a national system of education by a network of really valuable schools, colleges, and universities, so that Indian students would be able to qualify themselves in India for the highest position in every walk of life." The last ideal may be realised, but "a national system of education" can only be evolved on "national" lines and in accordance with the inspiration of "national" hopes and genius. The control and direction of higher education must be in the hands of the Indians themselves if India is to grow through unity of purpose and training to a vigorous and complete national life.

CORRESPONDENCE

An Unjustifiable Attack.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I happened to read the other day a speech by Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, Editor of the Zamindar, published in his paper. It was a rather lengthy discourse covering a variety of subjects; and, among other things, it dealt with a book called "Islam and Rationalism" written by Mr. Zarif, M.A., of the Imperial Record Office. I would not like to say anything against the spirit that inspired the speaker in his rough criticism, though one might reasonably expect a responsible critic like the Editor of the Zamindar to deliver an estimate of the book rather than of the author. Mr. Zarif, if I understand aright, repudiates the fundamental creed of Islam; and to try to hold him up to public ridicule and derision as a "Mussalman" uttering heresies would, therefore, be so much breath wasted away. But I need not say anything on this score. My object in writing this letter is to clear a misrepresentation contained in the speech. The speaker told his audience that Mr. Zarif was dismissed from the service of the Aligarh College on account of his religious views. Now, I happen to know something of the circumstances under which Mr. Zarif left his post of Assistant Professor at Aligarh, and I am, therefore, in a position to say that there is no ground whatever for the serious allegation made by the Editor of the Zamindar. As a matter of fact, Mr. Zarif gave up his post at Aligarh because he found a better one elsewhere, and he gave it up of his free and deliberate choice. I hold no brief for Mr. Zarif. In fact, I hold in scant esteem the thesis he has evolved. But one must be fair and should not in his zeal play fast and loose with facts. I doubt if Islam would best be served by an indiscriminate abuse of its critics.

I hope, Sir, that you will, in common fairness, give these lines a space in your esteemed journal.

FAIRPLAY.

The Moslem University and Affiliation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Since the publication of the official communiqué by the Education Department there has been a considerable show of uneasiness on the part of both the sister communities of India. The hope of getting powers of affiliation, actively countenanced by the Hon. the Education Member, was, it seems, the last valuable asset of national aspirations. All along the development of the Moslem University Scheme, the independence of Moslem control was being curtailed piecemeal. Some points the framers of the Draft Constitution themselves meekly dropped as being "too much to ask for," while the little that remained has been taken away by the recent coup-de-grâce. The promoters of the cause are simply taken aback to see the turn which matters have taken. Their expectations—all legitimate and perfectly reasonable—have been for the time being "finally" falsified; the Mussalmans are in a disappointed mood; and the masses feel miserable for having parted with their precious pies for nothing. The situation is, indeed, one of peculiar difficulty. The leaders are on the horns of a dilemma: if they take the named University, they incur the odium of their people, and if they forego the idea, they lose the one possibility of intellectual emancipation. Either course is equally unpleasant. The only satisfactory way would seem to be to approach the Government with a strong request to reconsider the question of affiliation. It yet remains to be seen that the Government would fail to recognise the reasonableness of the demand.

The power of affiliation has from the first been believed to be the essential part of the scheme of the Moslem University. India is not England: their physical as well as economic conditions vastly vary; and, therefore, we should never expect Aligarh or Benares to grow into a veritable Oxford or Cambridge. What India needs is that both the Universities—Hindu and Muslim—by exercising their healthy influence over the length and breadth of the Indian continent, should harmonise the growth of educational ideals, and lead the people safely on in the hurried march of intellectual advancement. Once confine these Universities within local limits and you will see that their utility would be gone; large sections of the public not finding a practical interest in the central institution will fall off; and communal aims will cease to grow in unison. It is, therefore, one of the basic considerations, that the Universities should be given powers of affiliation under reasonable conditions to guard against the deterioration of the standard. It is earnestly hoped that the Government will be pleased to respect the popular feelings, and thus increase the value of their gift a hundred fold.

MOHD. AHMAD KHAN.

The McCormick Case.

Mr. Hamlyn: Who examined the little girl in your Court for the purposes of the case?

Witness: I examined her.

Mr. Hamlyn: There were no advocates representing the complainants at all?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: And the complainants are examined in Malay? Do you understand Malay?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Have you an interpreter in your Court?

Witness: No, when I want one I send down to Victoria Point. I have never had a Malay interpreter except on this occasion.

Mr. Hamlyn: Who acted as interpreter on this occasion.

Witness: Moosajee. He was a man from Victoria Point. He was formerly a clerk in the Customs.

Mr. Hamlyn: At that time he was in the employ of McCormick.

Witness: I did not know it until I saw it in the papers.

Mr. Hamlyn: Is that false or true? You have not tried to find out that this man was a paid servant of McCormick. Since then have you tried to ascertain the fact?

Witness: No, I have not.

Mr. Rutledge to the Court: Your Honour, the suggestion is that at the time of the trial Moosajee was the paid servant of McCormick. I would like that recorded Your Honour. It is very important, Sir."

Mr. Hamlyn: Mr. Andrew, I understand you were trying this case in camera.

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Were the doors closed?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you swear it?

Witness: I swear it.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you swear that the people were not kept out from coming in.

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: You had durwans.

Witness: I had some chaprassies. The Sub-divisional Officer brought all the witnesses into the Court. I then called their names and sent them all out and called them in one by one as required. My bench clerk called them.

Mr. Hamlyn: Besides yourself there were present the interpreter Moosajee, McCormick and McCormick's advocate, Maung Shwe Yun, and the particular witnesses under examination, the Inspector of Police and the bench clerk—these were the sum total?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: There was no one in Court representing the complainants?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you say no objections were made to Moosajee being interpreter?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you know that Fatima, the mother of the child, said that what he was interpreting was "lies, lies."

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : You have no Government Prosecutor in Mergui ?

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : Who generally prosecutes ?

Witness : Maung Shwe Yun has been employed—I won't say that we generally employed him—he was employed in two or three cases.

Mr. Hamlyn : Who else have you employed as Government Prosecutor during your term of office down at Mergui ?

Witness : I don't think anybody else.

Mr. Hamlyn : Who is employed in the other Court ?

Witness : The Police Officer.

Mr. Hamlyn : The Police officer is employed in the Court sometimes ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Why was not the Police Officer in your Court employed in this case ? It was his business to examine the witnesses. You took it out of his hands. He did not examine them.

Witness : No, I often do that.

Mr. Hamlyn : They wanted an advocate very much ?

Witness : I don't know about that.

Mr. Hamlyn : Will you kindly think and answer my question ?

Witness : Well, as they did not bring an advocate, I thought they wanted an advocate at some one else's expense.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did they not want and try to get Maung Shwe Yun, the man whom McCormick engaged ?

Witness : I tried to get him for them. I tried to get sanction to engage an advocate for them.

Mr. Hamlyn : And Maung Shwe Yun was the particular advocate they wanted ?

Witness : They selected him. Yes. I offered them the choice of two, one was a barrister Maung Lat and the other was Maung Shwe Yun, and they, after some delay, wired back, Maung Shwe Yun.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then you did know that they wanted an advocate ?

Witness : I knew that they were willing to accept an advocate.

Mr. Hamlyn : You said a little while ago that you did not know. And you know now that they wanted this particular man. Do you know that McCormick engaged him for Rs. 500 ?

Witness : I know that he appeared for McCormick. I don't know what fee he got.

Mr. Hamlyn : And the other advocate was Maung Lat, a Burman gentleman, who is quite a new barrister ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : He was not employed ?

Witness : No, I was only empowered to engage an advocate on certain conditions.

Mr. Hamlyn : Well, Maung Lat was not employed ?

Witness : I was not allowed to employ an advocate by the Commissioner except on certain conditions.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did the Commissioner give you such orders ?

Witness : I started with a formal letter, a demi-official, then I sent a wire asking for instructions.

Mr. Rutledge : Is this a copy of your letter to the Commissioner ? Is that the one where you mention about an advocate ?

Witness : The 4th August, the official letter asking the Commissioner for sanction.

Mr. Hamlyn to Mr. Rutledge : Are you to put in that letter for me or will you allow me to conduct my own case ?

The Court to Mr. Hamlyn : You asked for the letter, well here it is.

Mr. Hamlyn : Very well you wrote to the Commissioner on the 4th August and the complainants were urging the necessity of having an advocate.

Mr. Rutledge interrupted and Mr. Hamlyn objected to the interruption.

The Court to Mr. Rutledge : I think Mr. Rutledge, you had better not interrupt.

Mr. Hamlyn : As early as the 4th of August they were urging upon you the necessity of having an advocate and a good advocate ?

Witness : I do not know. I took these steps on my own initiative.

Mr. Hamlyn : The next letter is dated the 10th August and then an S. O. wire reading. "My numbers 4865D 4th August asked for Mahomed Ayoob, Second Grade Advocate, who asks a fee of Rs. 500. I consider this reasonable, kindly reply, as Mahomed Ayoob (Maung Shwe Yun) has been approached by the defence." Then you knew on the 10th that they were very anxious to engage an advocate ?

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then you received a telegram from the Commissioner of the Tenasserim Division ?

The Court to the witness : You say that your first letter of the 4th August was sent on your own initiative ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then on the 10th of August you acknowledged that they wanted Mahomed Ayoob (Maung Shwe Yun), Mr. Andrew did you not ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then you say that Mohamed Ayoob (Maung Shwe Yun) had been approached by the defence ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Was he engaged by the defence ?

Witness : I asked him to keep himself open until I got final orders from the Commissioner. There was a man by the name of Green, who I understand was an engineer in a boat running there, who came to me and told me that he had been asked to engage Mohamed Ayoob for the defence of McCormick. I told him that I had an arrangement with Mahomed Ayoob, a lien on his services, until I had settled the matter with the Commissioner, as to whether or not I could engage an advocate.

Mr. Hamlyn : How came Green to volunteer that information to you ?

Witness : I presume that Green had been to Mahomed Ayoob and Mahomed Ayoob told him what the position was.

Mr. Hamlyn : You had a lien on Mahomed Ayoob's services. Did you tell Mr. Green that ?

Witness : Yes, I told Mr. Green that I would let Mahomed Ayoob know as soon as ever I received a wire from the Commissioner to say whether I could engage an advocate or not.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then you received this on the 11th August, I see, from the Commissioner—"If after perusing Police papers believe charge of rape to be false..... wire whether you are engaging pleader or not." Did you read the Police papers ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you believe the charge of rape to be false from reading those papers ?

Witness : See my telegram.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then on the 11th August you sent a telegram—"Don't think charge of rape can be substantiated. Charge of abduction remains. Complainants ignorant—peoples—require assistance. Then you had come to the conclusion that only a prima facie case of abduction had been made out ?

Witness : Well, I say that an enquiry should be made. I say that the rape charge could not be substantiated, the charge of abduction remains. I should like to say besides that I thought the question should be gone into before a Magistrate.

Mr. Hamlyn : I put it to you that you were of opinion that a prima facie case of abduction had been made out ?

Witness : I considered that the question should be investigated by a Magistrate.

Mr. Hamlyn : You thought that there was a prima facie case.

Witness : Yes, I thought that there was a prima facie case in the face of the facts.

Mr. Hamlyn : The complainants were ignorant people and required assistance ; you said that ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : You recognised when you entered upon this trial that the complainants were at a great disadvantage in not being represented by an advocate ?

Witness : No, I would not say so.

Mr. Hamlyn : You are urging the Commissioner all the while to engage an advocate. Then you had made up your mind that in the interests of justice at the enquiry the complainants should be represented by an advocate ?

Witness : If possible.

Mr. Hamlyn : Very well, when you entered upon the enquiry you were under the impression that they were not properly represented ?

Witness : No, I did my best to assist them myself.

Mr. Hamlyn : Don't you recognise that they were at a great disadvantage in not having an advocate ?

Witness : That is a matter of opinion. No, not necessarily.

Mr. Hamlyn : Now, in the face of what you said to the Commissioner in this correspondence, will you still say they were not in a disadvantageous position is not having an advocate ?

Witness : That is a difficult question to answer.

Mr. Hamlyn : I don't see where the difficulty comes in.

Witness : Well, I may say that I would have preferred them to have had an advocate.

Mr. Hamlyn : They were clamouring for one ?

Witness : Clamouring to whom ?

Mr. Hamlyn : The correspondence speaks for itself. Is this the correspondence between you and the S. D. O. ?

Witness : Yes, on the 3rd August I wired to the S. D. O. that I would engage an advocate to prosecute.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then you took it upon your own shoulders to engage an advocate to prosecute ?

Witness : Yes, and on the 4th August I wired asking the complainants to choose between Maung Lat and Mahomed Ayoob and I said they must reply early.

Mr. Hamlyn : Mahomed Ayoob and Maung Shwe Yun are one and the same man and the accused engaged him ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : How many years has the other man been practising in Court ?

Witness : I don't know what experience he had in Rangoon before he came to Mergui.

Mr. Hamlyn : Will you kindly continue your telegrams ?

Witness : On the 7th I got a reply—"Israel Khan, wakil, Moslem League, Rangoon before choosing lawyer to take case."

The reply I gave was "Give them all the attention required. Kindly do so and name advocate . . . as regards interpreter your Court interpreter must come along to assist . . . interpreters here are not easily obtained."

Mr. Hamlyn : What was the reply that followed ?

Witness : On the 7th I wired and on the 9th I wired—"My 43. Have received certain information that McCormick has asked to retain Maung Shwe Yun. If complainant does not decide to morrow inform Maung Shwe Yun that he is at liberty to be engaged by McCormick."

Mr. Hamlyn : What did you mean by that ? You were trying to engage one of these two advocates and you engage neither. Whom do you blame for that ? Do you blame your Commissioner ?

Mr. Rutledge : I object to the question, your Worship, "do you blame your Commissioner."

The Court to Mr. Hamlyn : You can make all the comments you like later. It is not for the witness to say who is to blame for it.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then Mr. Andrew, you finally got a telegram from the Commissioner saying "Your 163.....if you believe charge of rape is false pleader should not be engaged to conduct the case for abduction."

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Do you know why any distinction should be made between rape and abduction ? Did you understand the meaning of this telegram ?

Witness : Yes, I should think so.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you solve the mystery why you should have an advocate if it was a case of rape and not if it was only a case of abduction ?

Witness : Well, I obeyed my orders, that is all.

Mr. Hamlyn : Then your orders put you in a false position ?

Witness : For what reason ?

Counsel : For this reason, that you had busied yourself, and informed the complainants that you were getting an advocate for them, and at the last moment you did not do so.

Witness : Well, I am content to let the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Hamlyn (interrupted by Mr. Rutledge) said to the Court : I want your Worship to know why these people were deprived of an advocate. No advocate appeared on the day of the trial, and the Deputy Commissioner, who was enquiring into the case, knew that they were begging and praying for an advocate and they had not one, and the case in consequence was not properly laid before the Court, and I say that this is a most important point in the case.

The Court to Mr. Hamlyn : The witness says that he did his best to get an advocate.

Mr. Hamlyn : I ask your Honour to record the question.

The Court : Very well, this is what I am recording "I think the question is an improper one. It was asked and was disallowed."

His Honour then remarked—"I may say that I am not going to finish this case. . . ."

Mr. Hamlyn : "Then I understand your Honour intends to send it to the Sessions without hearing any defence."

The Court : I merely say that I am not going to finish the case as it is going on just now.

Mr. Hamlyn, resuming his cross-examination of the witness, said :

The complainants put in a petition requesting that you should not try the case ?

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : A petition came to your notice that they did not want you to try the case at all ?

Witness : There was a petition addressed to the Sub-divisional Magistrate.

Mr. Hamlyn : You ignored that petition ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Why did you ignore it ?

Witness : I thought they might apply to me. I thought, if they could send a petition to the Sub-divisional Magistrate, they could have sent one to me.

Mr. Hamlyn : Victoria Point is 200 miles away, you told us.

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : And in the face of that petition did you consider it your duty to go on with the case ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you not consider it your duty to have it transferred from your Court to some other Court ?

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : I will put it to you, Mr. Andrew, when a party is dissatisfied with a tribunal to try a case and you know it has another Magistrate who can try the case, is it or is it not your duty to adjourn the case to have it transferred to another Court ?

Witness : Yes, but I was not asked to do so.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you examine them on the point ?

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : What was your reason ?

Witness : Because I did not consider that petition a bona fide petition.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you examine them on that point ?

Witness : No.

Mr. Hamlyn : And then who did you think it came from ?

Witness : I thought it came from Mohamed Din.

Mr. Hamlyn : What reason had you to think that it came from Mohamed Din ?

Witness : Because the woman Fatima, the mother of the child, is an absolutely ignorant woman of Selong descent and she could not possess that knowledge of facts which the petition contained. I would like to see the Police records. (After inspecting the records, witness added) : How could they possibly know he is a friend of McCormick, or who was a friend of whom.

Mr. Hamlyn : You just now stated that you did not enquire into the bona fides of the petition ?

Witness : No, I did not.

Mr. Hamlyn : The child's father, Fatima's husband, was dead ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : And Mohamed Din was Fatima's deceased husband's brother ?

Witness : No, not that I know of.

Mr. Hamlyn : Will you be surprised to hear that it is so ?

Witness : Yes. After a little hesitation witness added : Will you ask the question again please ?

Mr. Hamlyn : No, I won't.

Mr. Hamlyn : Now, Mr. Andrew, would it make any difference if he had not been the brother of her deceased husband, the fact of the filing of this petition ? Fatima, the mother of this child, is an ignorant woman and cannot write. Do you challenge her right to get her deceased husband's brother to assist her or any one else or even a petition writer ?

Witness : If they had presented it to me it would have been a different thing.

Mr. Hamlyn : A little matter of pride ?

Witness : Not at all.

Mr. Hamlyn: You did not think it your duty, having seen that petition, to stop the proceedings and get the case transferred from yourself?

Witness: No.

The Court here rose for the day, his Worship postponing the case to Thursday, the 27th instant. (June)

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE hearing was resumed on Thursday, the 27th, at 11 A. M.

The Court to witness: Have you read over the deposition?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: "I understand, Your Honour, the witness has read over his deposition and wants to make some alterations. I think if I may say so, with all due respect to the Court, that that should be left until after the witness has been finally examined."

The Court: I think it is well to get the deposition corrected as soon as possible.

Mr. Hamlyn: I think it a universal practice to leave it until after the witness's final examination.

The Court: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: I understand the witness has read it over and desires it to be altered.

The Court: He desires to point out inaccuracies.

Mr. Hamlyn: The corrections will be in the margin.

The Court: Yes, with my initials.

A few corrections were accordingly made as pointed out by the witness.

The Court to the witness: Is there anything else that is not correct?

Witness: Not that I remember. I should like to read through it again. I had not sufficient time that afternoon.

Mr. Hamlyn, resuming his cross-examination, said:

Mr. Andrew, you remember my putting certain questions about the trouble McCormick was giving in connection with land on the last occasion?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you acknowledged that he did give trouble with regard to the rules.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now allow me to refresh your memory. Did he not give a lot of trouble about fencing in three miles of land?

Witness: I don't remember, give trouble to whom?

Mr. Hamlyn: To the revenue authorities, to Mr. Buchanan, that is, the Revenue officer at Victoria Point?

Witness: Well, there was trouble. I don't remember specifically what it was.

Mr. Hamlyn: He fenced in a considerable portion of land without authority.

Witness: I could not say how much.

Mr. Hamlyn: He had no authority to fence it in?

Witness: You say so. I have got a very vague recollection of something of the sort occurring, but what it was I really cannot tell you.

Mr. Hamlyn: Very well. Perhaps I will be able to refresh your memory. Did he fence in three miles of rubber producing land without authority, without having paid revenue?

Witness: I don't know whether it is true he fenced in these three miles.

Mr. Hamlyn to the Court: May I have the petition, Your Worship, that was filed on the trial. Continuing to the witness.

Now the petition, Mr. Andrew, that was filed and desired that you should not enquire into this case was signed by some eight persons.

Witness: It purports to be.

Mr. Hamlyn: Why do you say it purports to be?

Witness: Because I have no knowledge of the authenticity of the signatures. They are mostly marks.

Mr. Hamlyn: Have you knowledge otherwise?

Witness: The principles of the case were not interested in having the case transferred and for that reason I have reason to doubt the genuineness of their signatures.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now you had all the parties who signed this petition before you. Did you examine any of them on the point?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: You have already acknowledged that Moosajee was employed as an interpreter. Now you know that McCormick himself brought Moosajee from Victoria Point and all his family and paid their expenses?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, Mr. Buchanan, the Sub-Divisional Officer, Victoria Point, was present on the day of the trial?

Witness: Yes, he brought in the witnesses.

Mr. Hamlyn: Thank you. I take it that it was under your instructions that he was present. He would not leave his sub-division without that?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Mr. Buchanan was at hand at any moment if you wanted him?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Mr. Buchanan understands Malay thoroughly?

Witness: No. He understands a certain amount of Malay.

Mr. Hamlyn: Have you examined him?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you profess to understand where his knowledge of Malay commences and where it ends?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did Mr. Buchanan get a reward of Rs. 1,000 from Government for his knowledge of Malay?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: You are of the opinion that the Government had no right to give him that Rs. 1,000?

Witness: I say nothing about it. I have no opinion on the subject at all.

Mr. Hamlyn: You say nothing about it?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, this is your diary. It commences on the 21st August 1911?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: That was the day you commenced the enquiry?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: I notice that you have made no note that Moosajee was employed as interpreter?

Witness: Yes, I think. On the depositions you will see that Moosajee was employed as interpreter, written by my clerk I think.

Mr. Hamlyn: There is nothing on the record to show that you swore Moosajee?

Witness: No, but I did.

Mr. Hamlyn: Nothing on the record?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: What oath did you make him swear on?

Witness: On the ordinary Mohamedan oath.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was affirmed?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And who paid his expenses?

Witness: What expenses?

Mr. Hamlyn: For acting as interpreter?

Witness: To the best of my knowledge I did, the Court did.

Mr. Hamlyn: You heard before you took up the enquiry that there were no interpreters in Malay at Victoria Point that both parties could trust?

Witness: Mr. Buchanan wired so, that there was no interpreter.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Moosajee was at Victoria Point?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you take the trouble to ascertain why a man from Victoria Point should be in your Court?

Witness: I thought he had been brought by Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. Hamlyn: Then you are astonished to hear that he was brought by McCormick, he and his family?

Witness: Quite.

Mr. Hamlyn: Mr. Buchanan sent up a list of witnesses who should be examined on behalf of the complainants?

Witness: Mr. Buchanan? Yes, it is on the record.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Lieutenant Finnie sent up another list?

Witness: I don't know if he sent a list. He sent all the depositions of the witnesses.

Mr. Hamlyn: Is it not the practice to send up a list?

Witness: This was not a Police case.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you seriously say that?

Witness: It was not.

Mr. Hamlyn: And in your enquiry you enquired under Chapter XVIII of the Criminal Procedure Code?

Witness: I do not know. I would like to consult the Criminal Procedure Code (after consulting the Criminal Procedure Code.) Yes

Mr. Hamlyn: And you wound up your order directing the accused to be discharged under Section 209, Chapter XVIII?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Were your proceedings conducted in accordance with Chapter XVIII of the Criminal Procedure Code?

Witness: To the best of my knowledge.

Mr. Hamlyn: I put it to you that you made no distinction whatever between the witnesses for the prosecution and the witnesses for the defence?

Witness: How do you mean?

Mr. Rutledge: Don't bully the witness.

The Witness: Continuing his answer to Mr. Hamlyn: I took all such evidence that was called for by the Magistrate.

Mr. Hamlyn: Will you answer my question?

Witness: Well, I say I don't understand the question.

Mr. Hamlyn: I will make you understand. You made no distinction between the witnesses for the prosecution and the witnesses for the defence. You called witnesses for the prosecution that were not mentioned in Mr. Buchanan's list?

Witness: No, I do not know whether I did or not.

Persia.

News of the Week.

The Times publishes a letter from Teheran drawing the gloomiest picture of the condition of Persia. The Regent departed, having virtually abdicated his functions and the country is in process of decay with a powerless ministry and an empty treasury and is a prey to the rivalries of Bakhtiari and Cashgais. The hope of the Persian Government of establishing order in the South is dwindling, it being nearly two years since the British note on the subject was sent. It should be realised, the letter adds, that the sands are running out.

In the course of a discussion on the Appropriation Bill in the House of Commons, Sir Edward Grey, replying to questions by Mr. Morrell regarding Persia, said that he did not think it was at present possible to find a group of financiers willing to lend money to Persia without an Anglo-Russian guarantee. The guaranteeing of a large loan, Sir E. Grey continued, would be one of the steps towards incurring a responsibility which he had been trying to avoid in Persia and elsewhere, but he contemplated a further advance of £200,000 to be equally divided between England and Russia. He believed that Russian conditions would not be onerous. The English condition would be that the money be spent on the promotion of the gendarmerie or other means for restoring order in the South. He hoped that the advance would lead to such an improvement that a large loan would be brought nearer in sight.

News received on the 6th August from Persia continues to be of a reassuring character, showing that internal affairs are settling down and that the Teheran authorities are taking a most hopeful view of the situation and regard Sir Edward Grey's fears about the loan as groundless. Sir Dawood Khan, the Persian Consul-General, in the course of an interview, said that, according to official intelligence from the Central Government received during the past three months, he could unhesitatingly say that the situation in Persia at the present moment has greatly improved. He pointed out that, apart from official reports from Teheran, he had seen nothing in the press in India or in England to cause anxiety in the public mind regarding Persian affairs. Several months ago there was, of course, trouble in parts of Persia, but since the defeat of the ex-Shah and Salar-ed-Daulah, both of whom have now disappeared from Persian politics, and since the death of Dawood Khan, the chief of the Kalohor tribes, and his son, affairs in Persia are regaining their normal condition. The disturbances in Kerman have been completely put down; Bundar Abbas is quiet and the road to Shiraz and Bushire is now open. The Persian Government is continuing the work of reform and reorganising the gendarmerie. It was with the intention of introducing far-seeing internal reforms that their Government wanted a loan. Official circles in Teheran believe that if the entire loan can be raised then the elaborate programme of reform can be carried out.

Answering a question, the Persian Consul General said, he is quite hopeful that the present situation in Persia justifies the expectation that the loan will be raised without any difficulty to the satisfaction of both the British and Russian Governments.

News has been received at the Persian Consulate of the death of Haider Khan, which took place on 2nd August. Haidar Khan was responsible for the dispute between the Kashgooly and Kazewony tribes. It is hoped that his death will remove all causes of disturbance on the Shiraz-Bushire road.

News from Persia on 6th August states that the Russians are at last reducing the number of their troops at Meshed, which has been perfectly quiet for weeks past.

Reuter wires from Teheran:—Two hundred and sixty gendarmes left Shiraz on August 5th under the command of the Swedes Siefert and Nystrom, to fight the bandits who have lately been interrupting traffic on Bushire road. The gendarmes were routed at Diringan, losing a gun and almost all the rifles. Siefert was wounded.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE Persian Government (telegraphs Reuter's correspondent in Teheran) has accepted the Russian demand for an increase in the Persian Cossack force at Tabriz to 700 men, with two additional Russian Officers, on the understanding that the Persian Cossacks shall remain, as heretofore, under the authority of the Ministry of War. The Government, in notifying its acceptance, expresses the hope that Russia may now see her way clear to removing the Russian force of occupation from Tabriz.

In a message dated 10th July the Teheran correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt writes:—"Russia has presented a Note demanding the abrogation of the clause in the Treaty of Turkmanchai which forbids foreigners to acquire landed property. By way of supporting this claim the Russians have once more moved 1,300 men into Azerbaidjan. Russia further demands that the Bakhtiari should resign from the Ministry and leave Teheran, and warns the Government against summoning the Mejliss. The population is giving credence to the rumours according to which the ex-Shah, Mohammed Ali, may yet return to Persia."

The situation at Tabriz seven months after the alleged massacres of Russians by the Nationalists and the occupation of the city by Shudja-ed-Dowleh is illustrated by the following brief telegrams which appeared in the Nova Vremya of Monday last:—

"Syed Mir Husain, who with inflammatory speeches was inciting the mob in the bazar to create disturbances, has been sent by the Governor-General Shudja-ed-Dowleh to Maraga in chains. Syed Mir Husain had raised the red flag in the name of the Constitution and tried to persuade the mob that the arrival of the Sipahdar would bring with it better times. The agitator was surrendered to the Governor-General by the mob itself. The house of the Persian revolutionist Syed Mir Husain, who had been inciting the mob in the bazar to create disturbances, has been destroyed by order of Shudja-ed-Dowleh. Shudja-ed-Dowleh is taking strict measures for the suppression of the activity of objectionable elements of the population, which are trying to make use of the arrival of the Sipahdar for the purpose of fomenting disturbances. To-day the well known Fidai Mami (?) was publicly hanged by order of Shudja-ed-Dowleh."

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, July 12.

A strong effort is now being made by the British Minister to secure the opening of the Bakhtiari trade route, otherwise known as the Lynch road, from Teheran to Mohammerah. Owing to the insecurity which prevails, Messrs. Lynch recently stopped all transport, and this appears to have brought the Bakhtiari to their senses. It has now been agreed to appoint the Sardar Jengh as Ilkhani of the Bakhtiari for a term of five years, to reside at Behbahan with despotic powers. His principal task will be to secure the safety of the trade route and to maintain good relations with the Sheikhs at Mohammerah. For initial expenses the Imperial Bank has advanced him £8,000 worth of guaranteed shares in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company. Amir Mofakhem, a Bakhtiari, is also to be appointed Governor of Kirman.

This attempt to solve the problem of the southern roads results in a considerable measure from the recent visit of Captain Gray, British Consul at Ahwaz, to Teheran, and its success is highly desirable, although confessedly problematic.

The Government has accepted the Russian proposal for the establishment of the Cossack Brigade at Tabriz, to be at the disposition of the Persian Minister of War. The budget for the brigade will be under the supervision of the Treasury.

Teheran, July 14.

Russian enthusiasm for the Trans-Persian railway project continues, but English official interest seems now to be in abeyance here. The British and Russian Governments are being brought more and more face to face with the problem of reconstruction in Persia. The existing machine is rapidly running down, and the search for a constructive policy continues.

Some commercial moves, chiefly Russian, are, however, being made. Russia has secured a sub-concession for the navigation of Lake Urumiah and is about to extend the rails from the terminus at Russian Julfa across the Araxes to Persian Julfa. Russia also shows a disposition to press forward the Julfa-Tabriz-Teheran railway scheme step by step with the English Khoramabad project. Both these schemes appear to have a real commercial basis and the two lines would assist each other ultimately. Therefore concentration of energy upon these rather than upon the Trans-Persian scheme is inherently more probable. Russia also desires to construct a line from Julfa to Urumiah, which would immensely strengthen her strategic position in regard to the Turkish frontier.

I have reason to believe that Russia proposes shortly to ask for a revision of a clause of the Treaty of Turkmanchai which only allows foreigners to hold land for residence and business premises. Many Russian subjects desire to purchase agricultural and urban land. Moreover, inability to hold land as security is regarded as a serious obstacle to loan or railway proposals and banking business in the absence of other adequate securities. The creation of mixed tribunals is also advocated by Russia. It is recognized, however, that such measures will not solve the problem of reconstruction and that much larger issues, involving fresh definitions of the Anglo-Russian position in Persia, may force themselves upon the attention of the two Governments.

The Shiraz Correspondent of the Civil and Military Gazette writes under date 18th July:—The state of roads shows no improvement. The rate on transport on the Bushire road has risen to an unheard of figure owing to the increasing exactions of tribesmen and their Khans. As for the south-east districts not a single caravan has come in. This means a serious dislocation of trade and business in Shiraz is paralysed.

Foreign Affairs.

Debate in the Commons.

July 10.

THE House went into Committee of Supply, with Mr. Whitley in the Chair, on the Foreign Office Vote.

The Earl of Ronaldshay (U.—Hornsey) moved a reduction of £100 in the salary of the Foreign Secretary. He said that while he did this he could congratulate Sir Edward Grey on the success with which the continuity of foreign policy in this country had been maintained. Our foreign policy to-day, he said, was based on the Triple Entente. The foundations of the policy were laid by Lord Lansdowne, but Sir Edward Grey had succeeded in raising up a superstructure on the foundations which had already stood the test of no inconsiderable strain. It was incumbent on the right hon. gentleman to do nothing which would impair the relations of this country with France and Russia, and to take every opportunity of cementing and improving those good relations. It would be the height of folly if anything were to be done which might create in the minds of the Russian or French people the idea that we were not absolutely sincere in our intentions to co-operate cordially with them. Lord Ronaldshay went on to say that in some ways Russia could perhaps have reciprocated the good feeling of this country. Both Russia and Great Britain had special interests in Persia and recent events had shown that those interests were not altogether identical. A perusal of the correspondence published seemed to show that Russia had been a little backward to recognise our special position in Persia, and that as a result the diplomatic wheels in that part of the world had not been moving quite so smoothly as they could have wished in the last few months. The prime necessity from our point of view was the necessity of maintaining the independence of Persia. We must maintain a buffer State between our Indian dominions and a great military and Continental Power; and we had also to take into consideration the sentiments of the Muhammadan world. He had not liked the incidents associated with the return of the ex-Shah to Persia. He travelled from a Russian port in a Russian ship, which also carried arms and ammunition. When he (Lord Ronaldshay) had travelled through Central Asia he had had to get a special permit to carry a single gun, and he had had to subject the permit to the inspection of innumerable officials.

THE House must be forgiven if it saw in the situation in North Persia last autumn a striking and disconcerting reproduction of the situation which existed in Merv and in Bokhara and other parts of Central Asia on the eve of their absorption by Russia. It was with the greatest satisfaction that he observed that Russian policy in that part of the world had recently undergone considerable modification. It was true that the Russians had shown considerable reluctance to withdrawing troops from Northern Persia, but he hoped that the Foreign Office would be able now to give the House reassuring information on the point. Lord Ronaldshay went on to accuse the Foreign Office of pursuing a policy that was devious and not predetermined, a policy subject to periodic oscillations. He congratulated the Foreign Secretary, however, on having in conjunction with the Russian Government advanced £200,000 to Persia. This was understood to be the forerunner of a still larger loan. He wished to put specific questions to the Foreign Office. Was the further large loan to be made to Persia in the near future, and, if so, what was the approximate amount? Was the Foreign Secretary of opinion that when the Persian Government was supplied with funds it would prove capable of dealing with disorders in the south of the country? Was the Foreign Office's policy for protecting British interests confined to financing the Persian Government, or were any other steps in contemplation? What was the British policy with regard to the construction of railways in Persia? As to the trans-Persian Railway, he objected to the conditions laid down first, that the railway should be carried down to the Persian Gulf on the Russian gauge. From the strategic and commercial point of view that appeared to be a most foolish concession for any British Government to have made. If there was to be a break of gauge it should be as far away from the Gulf as possible, say at Ispahan. That part of the line which lay in Persian territory should be constructed neither on the Russian nor the Indian gauge—5 feet and 5 feet 6 inches respectively,—but on the standard gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches used in many other countries. Another condition which it was understood the British Government had laid down as necessary for British co-operation was that Russia should not oppose the application by Great Britain for the concessions of certain other lines into the interior of Persia. It was understood that such lines were to be internationalised. Surely they should be British?

Mr. A. A. Ponsonby (L.—Stirling Burghs) regarded the trans-Persian Railway with a great deal of misgiving. To be considered there were the commercial interest of Great Britain, the commercial interest of India, strategic interest, and last, but by no means least, the interest of Persia itself. We should benefit a great deal more by railway development in the south-west of Persia than by any projected line extending right across the south-east. Any project for the development of British trade from the head of the Gulf up to Ispahan and Teheran would undoubtedly be a great benefit. Speaking generally of the state of affairs in Persia, Mr. Ponsonby held that all the fears expressed at the beginning of the session had been justified. Persia was to-day in a state of complete chaos. Russian troops still occupied the country, and there was grave danger of the ex-Shah being brought back to power under the direction of Russia. On the general question of the control of the House of Commons over foreign affairs, there were a great many members who believed that the House would gain greater control if a Foreign Affairs Committee were officially set up as in some other countries. He was disposed rather to doubt the efficacy of a scheme of that sort.—(Opposition cheers.) On the other hand, he felt that the House was confronted with a grave problem. Foreign affairs were being relegated to a very subordinate position. The Foreign Secretary had not the opportunity of telling the House what his policy was. It was to be wished that the House would commit itself to a resolution by which the Government, before concluding any treaty, before sanctioning any acquisition, cession, or exchange of territory, and before entering into any commitments which involved national responsibility, should consult the House of Commons and get a vote upon the question. That was not an impracticable proposal.

The success of any foreign policy could best be tested by the degree of sacrifice which was demanded from the taxpayer with the view of meeting expenditure on armaments. Subjected to this test, British foreign policy of the last six years had been rather a serious failure. New methods had been adopted. Till recent years the opinion of the Government on international matters was exercised by the Foreign Secretary alone. Negotiations, secret or open, were conducted by Ministers accredited to foreign Courts. This recognised method of negotiating had been superseded by a new and exceedingly dangerous system. Now the annual naval statement was used as a means of speaking to Europe, as a method of suggesting alliances and of preserving what was called the balance of power in Europe, and more especially as a means of cautioning, warning, and even threatening foreign countries. This official jingoism did not really represent the feeling of the people. He thought it unfortunate that there was not, as in former years, a day given to the discussion of Imperial defence so that the House could combine discussion on the Services with foreign policy. He would make two specific suggestions to the Government. As this country was responsible for the great increase in the expenditure on armaments which had seized the whole civilised world, this country should, on her own initiative, propose a conference in Europe for the limitation of the expenditure on armaments.

In conclusion, Mr. Ponsonby appealed to the Foreign Secretary to make a more definite advance towards friendly relations with Germany. It was not impossible, he believed, to arrive at a completely friendly relationship with Germany.—(Hear, hear.) In this connection he wished to protest against the constant singling out of Germany during naval debates in language only just short of provocative. We should get rid of the habit of mentioning foreign countries on those occasions, and classifying them as friends or possible enemies. Such references only stirred up ill-feeling and suspicion. The Foreign Secretary should be allowed to negotiate with foreign countries without the "assistance" of the Admiralty. Nothing could make him believe that we could not arrive at a clear and more friendly understanding with Germany, and if that were once established it would lay the foundations for the maintenance of the peace of Europe.

Mr. G. A. Lloyd (U.—West Staffordshire) said many Liberals and several newspapers had lately decried the Triple Entente, partly on the ground that it was conceived with hostility to the Powers excluded from it, and partly on the ground that there were no reasons why we should interfere in the internal policy of Europe. The truth was that we had been forced to have that Entente. Without feeling any antipathy to any other Power, we were bound as a sensible nation to weigh up the forces that might conceivably be used against us among the Powers of Europe, and to take precautions accordingly. Two main considerations determined our foreign policy—the defence of India and the prevention of the domination of Europe by any one Power. For the past hundred years our attention was fixed almost entirely on the defence of India, for there was no one Power that could dominate Europe. In the last few years, however, Germany had arisen as the great dominant military Power in Europe. She first exerted pressure on the independence of Holland, then there was pressure on France which resulted in the fall of M. Delcassé, then pressure upon Russia over Bosnia and Herzegovina, and finally pressure upon France and other Powers over the Agadir incident. If we had ignored all those obvious factors in the balance of power in Europe we should have been little short of criminal with regard to our own national safety. To ignore those factors would be to draw the design of our own sarcophagus. The position in Europe was still very clouded, and in view of that the Opposition, who supported the Government consistently on matters of foreign policy, were entitled to some explanation of the escapade which took place recently affecting the Triple Entente and Germany. He would deprecate sudden peace missions by War Ministers to Germany. They were a usurpation of the proper functions of the Foreign Secretary and the British Ambassador in Berlin. The War Minister had gone to Germany to preach Goethe versus guns. Such missions did not tend to improve international relations. They rather tended to accentuate bitterness of feeling between the two countries, and to rouse passion which had better be dormant. He hoped the Foreign Secretary would give some explanation of this mission and its results.

Referring to the Trans-Persian Railway, Mr. Lloyd said he realised that there were in the project the germs of much danger to India and Persia. He would much prefer to see a railway constructed which would have not a postal tracé, but an economic tracé. In that respect the project failed, for his present tracé was not economic. At the same time he did not believe it was possible permanently to isolate India for railway expansion. The enormous increase of her population and the political and economic changes which were taking place there were likely to force a demand for rapid communication between Europe and India before very long. Under the Anglo-Russian Convention of a few years ago Russia could to-day build a railway in Ispahan provided she obtained the consent of the Persian Government. She could get the money in Paris, or perhaps even in Russia, because such a railway might be an economic and paying railway. If Russia did that Russian goods would find their way—fostered probably by a system of railway rebates—in ever-increasing quantities to the central markets of Persia, which were now mainly furnished by British and Indian goods, and there would at once be pressure from India and elsewhere upon the British Government to provide a railway through Southern Persia to meet the competition from the North. That would probably be the best solution of the difficulty. He understood that negotiations had been proceeding for the acquisition of a concession for a British Railway in Southern Persia which should force its way into the central zone. What had become of that proposal? So far as he knew there was no immediate prospect of anything being done at all. In those circumstances he did not feel as hostile to the trans-Persian Railway project as some members did. After all, we must remember our European interests as well as our Indian interests. We must, however, see that the railway did not mean the loss of the independence of Persia. Above all we must see that there was no repetition of what happened in Manchuria, where the country was lost to China through the political guards that looked after the railway through Manchuria.

Sir G. S. Robertson (L.—Bradford) said he was decidedly adverse to the trans-Persian Railway project. It seemed to him obviously strategic instead of commercial. For instance, how could it possibly pay beyond Ispahan unless it was supported by a substantial guarantee, and who was to pay that guarantee? Again, who was going to benefit? About Russia he would say nothing, except that she no doubt had power to extend her present railway as far as Ispahan, irrespective of this scheme. It was doubtful whether Persia would derive any advantage from the scheme. It could not be shown, he thought, that Persia could bear the heavy guarantee the railway would require. As to its advantages to England, he could see only one, and that was that the mails and a few passengers might be able to get to India a few days quicker than by the present routes. On the other hand, such a line would surely interfere with us more or less commercially. It must interfere with the traffic through the Suez Canal and the Red Sea, where our share greatly preponderated. Most important of all was the strategic position of India, and the great expense which could be caused by any change in our frontier which we had made enormous sacrifices to maintain. There was an alternative route which seemed to him more worthy of support. He hoped that things in Persia itself would now improve. A large portion of the loan ought to be earmarked so as to ensure that the chaotic state of South Persia might be remedied. As far as Persia itself was concerned, he had personally no hope in the Mejliss. It was only by a strong Persian Government that reform could be effected. He hoped Sir E. Grey would be able to give some reassurance about the state of things in Persia generally, and more especially as regarded the turmoil and chaos that had so long prevailed in the South.

Mr. J. L. Baird (U.—Rugby) expressed his fears of a reduction of our forces in the Mediterranean, and quoted the leading article in that day's Daily News as showing that his fears were not groundless. Had the withdrawal of ships from the Mediterranean, he asked, taken place after consultation and with the consent of His Majesty's representatives at the Courts of the Mediterranean Powers. Did it meet with the approval of the Military and Naval Commander-in-Chief at Malta? It would perhaps, he said, be impossible to tell the House whether we had arranged to have our interests in the Mediterranean looked after by some other Power, but he thought at any rate before the ships were withdrawn the country should have the opportunity of saying whether they were not prepared to spend more money sooner than have the ships withdrawn.

Mr. John Dillon (Nationalist—East Mayo) called attention to the present situation in Egypt, and to the "calm" which had existed since Lord Kitchener went there. They had been treated, he said, to a series of articles dealing with this calm, and the Times described how Nationalists had fled to the Bosphorus. Before the change in Turkey members of the Young Turks party had to fly from Constantinople to Cairo. Now the Nationalists of Cairo had to fly to Constantinople. He thought the change was rather a painful one for Great Britain. There had been a very severe Coercion Act brought into operation against the Nationalist party, and Nationalist newspapers had been suppressed. This was the way the calm had been brought about. Now they were told by the press that a plot to assassinate Lord Kitchener, the Khedive, and the Premier had been discovered, and arrests had been made. From a careful study of the Denshawi trial he had come to the conclusion that no person charged with a crime which had a shadow of political colouring attached to it could hope for anything like a fair trial in Egypt. He strongly appealed to the Government, in view of the condition of justice in Egypt at the present time, to lay on the table all the information that could be obtained relating to these charges and to state the character of the tribunal before which the men would appear.

Turning to Persian matters Mr. Dillon said that his claim for the Persian people was this, that having by their own exertions, unaided by external power, put an end to one of the most abominable Governments any nation ever groaned under, the Governments of Russia and England should give them fair play, and allow them to work out their own salvation in their own way. From the hour on which the rebellion succeeded, however, the Persians had not for a single day obtained fair play. The Government there had been deliberately paralysed by Russia, and this country had weakly consented to it. The very disorders which were the direct result of the continual interference of Russian agents had been used as an argument to discredit the Persian Government and blacken it in the eyes of the world. At this moment Northern Persia was a Russian province. Yet we talked about preserving the independence and integrity of Persia! Great Britain had sanctioned the appointment of the ex-Shah's lieutenant and chief agent as Governor of Tabriz, and all the leading Nationalists of that town had been beheaded. He appealed to Sir Edward Grey to make some strong statement that would convey to the people of Persia the assurance that the British Government intended to stand honourably by pledges given in the past.

Mr. M. Sykes (U.—Hull) condemned the trans-Persian Railway scheme as not being a business proposition and as not likely to lead to the development of Persia. He advocated British support of schemes for the construction of railways northward from the head of the Persian Gulf and connection with Russian railways so that Russian traffic might find its way to the Gulf.

Sir E. Grey (Secretary for Foreign Affairs) said he gathered that the Committee wanted to make use of this opportunity to get information on the special points that had been raised, rather than to have a general statement on foreign policy. With regard to the criticisms passed by Lord Ronaldshay on the Anglo-Russian Agreement, these criticisms rather tended to show that the Agreement was being worked rather in the Russian interest than in ours. It was a counterpart of the sort of criticism which the Russian Government had to meet from a section of opinion in its own country. This section said that the Anglo-Russian Agreement had been a most one-sided affair, because Russia had given up a great deal and received very little in return. In judging the state of things in Persia they really had to consider, not whether the Anglo-Russian Agreement had brought about a perfect state of things, but whether it had brought about a better or worse state of things than there would have been if no such Agreement existed. They had also to bear in mind the fact that Russian influence before the Agreement was supreme in the north of Persia, and that in the chaos which succeeded in Persia the Government might, but for the Agreement, have made its influence still more supreme at Teheran than it had ever been before. Russia might practically have annexed the north of Persia, and if she had done so she could have pursued from that base a forward policy of railways, and so forth, towards the Indian frontier.

Generally, under the Anglo-Russian Agreement, the Russian Government had given up that forward policy which some people thought she might pursue in that part of Asia, and from that point of view the Agreement had been a self-denying ordinance on the part of Russia. Take the case of the Afghan Agreement. The Ameer had not signed it, but Russia had entirely waived that condition in practice and loyally observed that part of the Agreement. When they looked at the Anglo-Russian Agreement as a whole, and when they considered all the trouble there had been and what would have happened, not in Persia alone but in the general relations between Russia and Great Britain if the Agreement had not been in existence, he said that the maintenance of that Agreement was more than ever necessary, and that the state of things, unsatisfactory as he admitted it was to-day, was as nothing compared with the complications that would have arisen if there had been no such Agreement. But for the Agreement Russia would have been constantly under the apprehension that we in the south of Persia were going to take advantage of the chaos of the situation there to prejudice her interest, and the old state of suspicion and intrigue and squabble which existed formerly would have been intensified many-fold. Instead of that, however, that might have differed about details; there had never been a suspicion for a moment that either side had been attempting to exploit the situation in Persia to the disadvantage of the other, and the fact that that had been so had been not only to the mutual interests of the two countries but to the interests of peace. That was a truer perspective than that given by Mr. Dillon, who left out of account past history and material facts of the situation which were essential in forming a true judgment of the working of the agreement.

Passing to the questions raised by Lord Ronaldshay, the Foreign Secretary said he had been charged with inconsistency. He quite admitted that in one or two things there had been verbal inconsistencies. But there had been no inconsistency about British policy in Persia. The British Government had always been opposed to sending anything like an expedition into the south of Persia. They did reinforce the Consular Guards last year, because they were told there was real danger to life at Shiraz, but they purposely restricted the action of those Guards so that they might not be committed to a large expedition. It was true that there had been less disorder and less interference with trade in North Persia because Russia had had so many troops there than there had been in the South. It was also true that if the British Government had chosen to use troops and undertake serious liabilities in the south of Persia they might have done much to keep the roads open. But the Government were most reluctant to embark on a policy of that kind, because, though the beginning was easy, the end was difficult. They still held that they should, so long as they possibly could, avoid intervention which was likely to be of a permanent kind, even in the south of Persia. He had been asked whether a further large loan was likely to be made to Persia in the near future. He wished he could say "Yes." But with the state of things in Persia as it was, it was very difficult to see how a large loan was to be made on attractive terms. Persia wanted money, but it was no use to lend her money until the money was likely to be effectively spent. The Swedish officers employed by the Persian Government were now engaged in organising gendarmery for the south, and if any money was lent or any support given by the British Government they would certainly stipulate that some of the money should be spent on the restoration of order on the Southern roads. Lord Ronaldshay had asked whether the British Government contemplated any measures for restoring order in the South, except financing the Persian Government. They did not at the present moment contemplate any measures, because no measures would be effective. They would, of course, do everything they could by diplomatic influence to help and encourage the work of the Swedish officers, but they did not contemplate taking such measures as sending a British force to keep the roads open, for the reasons he had already given.

Turning to the question of the trans-Persian Railway, Sir E. Grey said that before the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made the apprehension in this country always was that Russia would use her influence in the north of Persia to make a railway towards Seistan or into Seistan, which would be strategically most prejudicial and alarming to the Indian Government. What was feared was that with Great Britain and Russia holding themselves at arm's length, suspicious of each other, we should one day find that the Shah, under Russian influence at Teheran, had given a concession for a railway of a nature most damaging to us. The Anglo-Russian agreement had put an end to any possibility of that kind. Under that Agreement, Russia could get concessions for railways in a certain sphere in North Persia, but it would be an entire breach of that Agreement if Russia were to get any concession for a railway into Seistan, for instance. He would go further. It would not be an altogether undesirable condition of affairs if Persia could always remain undeveloped, unpierced by railways—if, in fact, the whole of it were a desert without any inhabitants—so far as our strategic position in India was concerned. But Persia was not a desert without any inhabitants. It was a country capable of being developed. Therefore we could not possibly construe the Anglo-Russian Agreement as meaning that railways were not to be made in Persia at all. In fact everybody admitted that a railway from Mohammera would be a desirable railway. Russia, of course, had her views as to railways. She would like to bring her trade in from the north, just as we desired a railway from Mohammera to bring Indian trade up from the Gulf. He foresaw then that railways must be made in Persia sooner or later. And they would be for the good of Persia. Someone had said there would have to be guards, and so forth, and that would infringe the independence of Persia and the authority of the Persian Government. But without railways he doubted whether the Persian Government would have any authority, especially with the tribes in the south. It would remain in the uncontrolled and semi-chaotic state in which it had always been. Railways would, therefore, have to come sooner or later if Persia was to become a developed and ordered State. When railways had been made in Persia, the question was sure to come up of connecting them with the Indian railways. The moment an overland route to India became a possibility it could not be indefinitely resisted. The Government came to the conclusion, therefore, that when the idea of a trans-Persian Railway was mooted they ought not in principle to oppose it and say that their policy was never to have a trans-Persian railway at all, and that they would always oppose an overland route to India. That would not be a wise or practical policy for His Majesty's Government to adopt in the long run, and so they said that they had no objection to the Société d'Etudes being formed to go into the question from a financial and economic point of view.

The hon. member for Bradford had asked if such a railway could be made without a guarantee. The Government were absolutely uncommitted with regard to any guarantee, and even if the Government or any Government that succeeded them decided that it was desirable to recommend a guarantee it would have to be submitted first to the House of Commons. They thought it right to make it quite clear that if a trans-Persian railway was to be constructed the Government must reserve great liberty of action before they could support any particular line. They had told the Société d'Etudes that, though in principle they did not oppose a trans-Persian railway and would under proper conditions be favourable to it, they must reserve full freedom of action when it came to the actual construction and the subsequent management. (Hear, hear.) They had reserved their opinion with regard to the alignment of the railway, the constitution of the Board, the representation of British interests, the question generally of freight and passenger rates, and also specially with regard to the break of gauge. Even if a trans-Persian railway became feasible, before it could receive the support of the British Government they would have to come to an agreement with Russia with regard to the branch lines of the railway to be made—(cheers)—and the retention of control of the lines in the British sphere and the equality of treatment for British trade. The question of break of gauge was an important one, and must be carefully considered before the Government were committed to any scheme. When the Société d'Etudes had reported as to whether it was feasible to make a railway, and if so what railway should be made, the House ought to be informed as to what the proposals were, to hear from the Government on what conditions the Government were prepared to consent to any definite scheme. He had always contemplated that the southern part of a line from Mohammera should, if a concession were given, be conceded to a British company. If it went further north into the Russian sphere they could not have a British company with a concession in the Russian sphere. He would bear carefully in mind what construction was to be put on any internationalisation which might be applied to the southern part of the railway. With regard to the negotiations with Turkey about the Baghdad Railway, the British Government had not committed themselves to any scheme. Turkey had made an agreement with Germany under which she recovered her liberty of action, subject to one or two conditions with regard to the railway below Baghdad. Negotiations were going on between Britain and Turkey in regard to this portion of the railway. Germany was perfectly aware of these negotiations, and directly German interests were affected—if they were affected—by the negotiations the British Government would be perfectly ready to discuss the matter with the German Government. At the present moment the basis of the negotiations was as to whether we should give our consent to the increase in the Turkish Customs duties which Turkey wanted, and one great object the British Government wished to secure was that there should be an understanding between us and Turkey about the status quo of questions relating to the Persian Gulf generally. When the negotiations had reached a conclusion the result would be made known, but he could assure the noble lord that they were not committed to any syndicate, and that they would not commit themselves to any syndicate on conditions that the railway should go beyond Bussorah.

In reply to Mr. Dillon, concerning a plot in Egypt, he said that as yet he had received no evidence. It was the business of the authorities in Egypt to look after this, and it was impossible yet to discuss the matter in the House. His own feeling had undoubtedly been one of immense relief that if there had been a plot it had been discovered in time. He had not the least doubt that there would be a perfectly fair trial, and he could only say that the policy of Lord Kitchener in Egypt had, from all the accounts which reached them, been not only an unqualified success, but had been exceedingly popular with the native Egyptian opinion itself. Lord Kitchener had been most accessible to native Egyptian opinion, and the zeal and energy he had shown in developing the interests of the natives themselves had been deeply appreciated. He believed that the press prosecutions were under an old law. We could not judge these prosecutions from the point of view of a Western country. Of course, here or in Western countries attacks upon the Government went on, it was perfectly well known, unchecked because there was a general understanding that there was to be freedom of the press and no interference, but in Oriental countries a Government was always in this difficulty, that if violent attacks were made upon it, and especially upon persons of the Government, the impression given was not one of liberty and justice but simply one of fear, that the Government would never allow the attacks to be made unless there was some reason or other to be afraid of the people who made the attacks. He did not like these press prosecutions, and he would like them to be as few as possible, but they had to bear in mind that the Egyptian Government and the British Consul-General in Egypt had come to the conclusion that the prosecutions in the given case were necessary. They could not judge it entirely by Western standards. He did not wish to put the matter higher than this, that attacks upon the Government would weaken authority and alienate people who were well-disposed, but who would think that if the Government would not stick up for itself it could not be supported.

Mr. Dillon: What did Lord Cromer do?

Sir Edward Grey said that if his recollection was right Lord Cromer, during the last few years he was in Egypt, had come to the conclusion that the great latitude allowed to the press was causing great mischief in Egypt, and some action would have to be taken. In regard to a newspaper printed in this country which had been suppressed in Egypt, he said that one article he read in this contained information absolutely inaccurate as to British policy in general, and the result of which, if it were believed, must be to make people believe that our policy was actively anti-Islamic. There could be no more mischievous statement made. When the Egyptian Government decided to exclude the paper from Egypt, from what he had seen he certainly came to the conclusion that it was an action in which he could not interfere with the discretion of the Egyptian Government. Lord Kitchener and the Egyptian Government in fact were perfectly right. (Hear, hear.)

Turning to what he described as larger questions, Sir Edward Grey said he had been asked about a statement as to a reduction of our force in the Mediterranean. The question really raised, was one of the greatest importance, so much so that it was difficult to handle it definitely. It was the question of the relation between foreign policy and naval strength. The hon. member had read a quotation from a newspaper saying we had surrendered our naval predominance in the Far East to Japan, in the West to the United States, and that now we were going to surrender in the Mediterranean to a third Power. He did not know whether it was the opinion of the editor that we should maintain separately a sufficient margin of strength to protect our own islands in the home waters, a sufficient margin to rule independently in the Far East, and a sufficient margin of strength to keep us pre-eminent in the west of the Atlantic and the east of the Pacific, and then a separate standard for the Mediterranean altogether. Of course this was absolutely out of the question. He must ask the Committee to bear in mind that it was exceedingly difficult to be definite about this question. He would try to put two definite issues. In the first place we must not rely upon our foreign policy to protect the United Kingdom. That was to say, if we let our margin of naval strength in home waters fall below that which might be brought to bear against us, we were setting our foreign policy a task which it ought not to be set.

If we did not keep up our naval strength our foreign policy would become impossible, because in every diplomatic situation which arose we would have to give way, and our position would not be that of a great Power. Whatever our foreign policy was, we must keep a sufficient margin in home waters. (Hear, hear.) But when they got further afield into other parts of the world it was a different matter, and our foreign policy and naval strategy did to a large extent depend on each other. Take the question of the Far East. The relation between the Japanese alliance and naval strategy in the Far East had been most intimate. It was worth while considering at the present moment that with all the instability there was in China at the present moment, and all the difficulties which arose, there had been no fear whatever of international complications. (Hear, hear.) The good working of the Japanese Alliance in recent years had been a great factor in that. In the last few years that alliance had worked nothing but good. It had not brought us into worse relations with any other Power; it had not brought Japan into worse relations. On the contrary, the relations between Japan and Russia were now exceedingly good, and he believed the alliance was more than ever in the mutual interests of the two countries. (Hear, hear.) They had worked it with great restraint and perfect loyalty to each of them, and it had been a great and beneficent factor in keeping peace in the Far East, and preventing the disturbances in China, which were due to internal causes, from giving rise to international apprehensions between the Powers whose interests were concerned.

Having said that, he came to the Mediterranean question. At the present moment he had no hesitation in saying that we either have sufficient force, or could put into the Mediterranean at short notice sufficient force, to meet any emergency. We had not incurred any peril at the present moment. The hon. member was doubtless thinking of our future policy when he asked if we were going to abandon our position, which would put us in a state in which we could not protect our interests. He quite agreed that if we did anything like abandoning the Mediterranean we could not make our position there secure by any skilful diplomacy or foreign policy. On the other hand, it was certainly not necessary that we should keep a force in the Mediterranean which was to be put out on a moment's notice to hold its own against all the other fleets. He admitted that if we abandoned the Mediterranean altogether—although at present we had no prospect of quarrel with any Power in the Mediterranean, and although he did not think there was a single Mediterranean Power which was contemplating hostile or prejudicial designs against us—there would be a tendency for us to be left out of account, to slip out of account, and we would find that the diplomatic situation was hardened against us. Therefore he admitted that we ought to keep a sufficient naval force available for use in the Mediterranean at any moment so that we should count as one of the Mediterranean naval Powers. Of course, that left out of account what force we might in an emergency be able to put there from other places. Further than that, he did not think he could take the Committee at present.

Our general foreign policy remained unchanged. The starting point in any developments in European foreign policy was the maintenance of our friendships with France and Russia. With that as our starting point, let us have the best possible relations with other countries. (Hear, hear.) When they saw France or Russia coming to an agreement with another European Power and being on good terms with it, as was emphasised by the meeting between the Russian and German Emperors recently—when they saw that they had every reason to congratulate themselves.—(Ministerial cheers.) He was convinced that France and Russia were as loyal to the friendship with us as we were to our friendship with them. Nothing which took place on occasions such as the meeting in the Baltic the other day was going to take place to our disadvantage. Just as if there were difficulties between France and Germany or Russia and Germany, that was going to exercise a disturbing influence on diplomatic relations between ourselves and Germany, so anything which removed difficulties between France and Germany or Russia and Germany—as the Morocco settlement did last year, and as the recent conversations between Russia and Germany might have done—smoothed the path of relations between Great Britain and Germany too. A very significant statement had appeared in the official communiqué published after the meeting of the Emperors in the Baltic the other day. It was this sentence—"There can be no question either of new agreements, because there was no particular occasion for them, or of producing alterations of any kind in the grouping of the European Powers, the value of which for the maintenance of peace has already been proved." He entirely endorsed that statement. He had always felt that though there might be separate groups, they need not necessarily be in opposing diplomatic camps. Our own relations with the German Government at the present moment were excellent.—(Cheers.) We were perfectly frank about all questions of mutual interest. He believed that when questions came up, whether, for instance, in connection with the two countries, respective interests in Southern Africa or whether in connection eventually with the Baghdad Railway, both Governments were convinced that their mutual interests could fairly be reconciled. He had done all he could to establish such relations. On the question of China, for instance and the action of the six Powers he had been perfectly frank in expressing this country's views, believing that thus it would be found there was no real opposition. So he would conclude by saying that separate diplomatic groups there were, as had been recognised in the communiqué he had read, but he did not think that ought to prevent frankness and the exchange of views upon questions of mutual interest. If that took place, the separate diplomatic groups need not necessarily mean opposing diplomatic camps.—(Cheers.)

Colonel C. E. YATE (U—Melton) said that information he had received from Persia served to show that dishonesty and corruption were to be found on every side. One after another Nationalist Ministers seemed to fall into bad practices. At the present moment Persia could not stand alone. Unless she was helped and controlled by her neighbours she must fall to pieces. But for Russia and England she would have gone to pieces long ago.

Mr. NOEL BUXTON (L.—North Norfolk) said that if reform in Turkey was to come from within the rivalry between the British and German Embassies at Constantinople was a lamentable obstacle. This disastrous rivalry also blocked the way if reform was to come from without by small Powers. There was only one small Power that could cut the Balkan knot. But could Bulgaria move while this division in Europe existed? While this rivalry existed, to talk about the Persian and other questions was like attempting to make a watch go when the main spring was broken. A feeling of uneasiness widely prevailed as to the Anglo-German relation, and he hoped the Foreign Secretary would be able to make a still more reassuring statement.

Sir J. D. REES (U.—Nottingham) said with regard to Sir Edward Grey's speech he would be glad to know whether the right hon.

gentleman really suggested that Russia had any idea of trade in promoting the trans-Persian Railway. He thought it was notorious that in Moscow, the commercial capital of Russia, the projected railway was viewed with the greatest apprehension, and was regarded as purely strategic. He asked for information as to the position of the opium traders of India who had five or six million pounds worth of stock laid up in treaty ports. China would not cease to use opium, and the Indian-grown opium was the best and the least harmful.

Sir G. TOULMIN (L.—Bury) feared lest the great opium crime of the last century should again be an evil influence at the commencement of a new régime in China. The resolution of 1906 was an instruction to put an end as soon as possible to the conditions which were existing. There were also the decision to take ten years to right the wrong and the conferences at Shanghai and at the Hague. The latter was an indication that the question had assumed an international aspect. The argument as to the poor Indian taxpayer had rather lost its force during the last year or two, seeing that the great surplus owing to the rise in the price of opium had really given to the Indian revenue almost as much in the year or two that had gone by as was expected to be received during the ten years. The new agreement came to in May 1911, recognised the sincerity of the Chinese Government, and their pronounced success in diminishing the production of opium in China. Yet, this very agreement had been made an instrument for forcing into China in advance of the instalments agreed upon quantities of uncertified opium. Now it was said that there were large stocks, and the opium speculators desired that the British Government should back their speculation and put pressure on the Chinese Government to enforce or encourage wholesale buying, and to discourage the Chinese local authorities from putting impediments in the way of retail trade and smoking. He trusted that no pressure of this kind would lead the Government to reverse its policy.

Mr. Bonar Law (Leader of the Opposition) said he supported as strongly as he could the broad lines of policy pursued by Sir E. Grey.

Morocco.

The Situation at Marakesh.

For some years Marakesh has been almost forgotten. Since Mulai-el Hafid left the southern capital on the march or flight which ended in a more or less triumphant entry into Fez, political interest has been almost entirely confined to Fez and the north.

Once indeed again, when Mulai Abd-el-Aziz was making his last attempt to preserve his throne, Marakesh was brought into notice. For one memorable day when the prisoners and booty, which announced the defeat of Abd-el-Aziz, were being brought in from one side of the city, and the dead and wounded of the Glawa party, which had made an unsuccessful attack on the Mtoogi, were being carried in at another, the fate of the city seemed to hang in the balance. A day later the arrival of Si Aissa and Si Madani from Fez compelled the retreat of the Mtoogi, and ended the last hopes of Mulai Abd-el-Aziz.

Now again the grim, crumbling old city is passing through a crisis. This time it is not the fate of a Sultan who, confiding in the support of his European friends, had lost the respect of his subjects, which is at stake, but the safety of all those Europeans who, trusting in the strength and prudence of France, have remained in Marakesh despite the shock which events in Fez must have given to their trust.

The state of affairs appears to be comparatively clear. Outside the walls the chief factor in the present disturbance is the tribe of Misfawat, whose country lies between Marakesh and the Glawi pass. The tribe refuses to allow the passage of any Glawa, so that the Glawa in the city are for the moment completely cut off from their fellow tribesmen and from their base.

Within the city there are three powers—the governor, the Mtooga, and the Glawa—and the cause of the trouble is the fear that, through French influence, the Glawa are to be placed in a position of even greater power than they previously enjoyed. The governor and the Mtoogi are of one mind on the question of disliking the re-establishment of the Glawa, and the Mtoogi, or rather, as the Mtoogi is still outside the city, his fiery representative, who is leading the Mtooga at present within the walls, is prepared to go any extreme to prevent the carrying out of the scheme, and to oppose the announcement, believed of the expected appointment of the Glawi to the governorship of the city.

At his strongest it is doubtful if the Glawi would fight the Mtoogi with much hope of success; but now that he is cut off from the mountains, can expect no help from the present governor, and is hated by the population, his chances of success in an appeal to arms seem slight indeed. There seems no reason to doubt the existence of a widely spread belief that the Glawi relies on French support, and it is this belief alone which makes the situation dangerous to Europeans.

The Glawi's brother, Haj Thami, was a strong and on the whole a good governor of Marakesh for several years, and it is not unlikely that the Glawa family are better suited than any of their rivals to carry out the peculiar duties which will fall to the lot of kaid under the new régime, but that is not the chief point at present.

The French are now at their own wish responsible for seeing that the steps necessary for establishing their hold on the country shall not unnecessarily prejudice European interests or endanger European lives. For many years Europeans in Marakesh have suffered anxiety, at times extreme danger, owing to the steps and incidents which have led to the establishment of the Protectorate. During the last few years, however, a series of indications—such as the presence of French military officers, and the establishment of a French consular officer—has led naturally to the belief that France felt herself strong enough to disregard native prejudice, and Europeans, quick to take the hint, have gone in increased numbers to Marakesh confident that France believed herself able to insure the safety of themselves and their property.

It would be absurd to expect that immediately after the signatures of the Protectorate, order should be firmly established all over Morocco. The difficulties to be surmounted are very great, and even such a miscalculation as caused the recent events in Fez, and which perhaps, delayed steps which would otherwise have been taken in Marakesh, however, deplorable, cannot well be resented. The dangers were unknown or underestimated, and the awful consequences were nearly as much a surprise to the Moors as to the French.

In Marakesh the case is quite different. The dangers are obvious and avoidable, and if a disaster came there will be little doubt as to where the blame must be placed. A few weeks ago everything in the city was quiet. The population was perfectly peaceable and well disposed towards foreigners, the shock of the news from Fez had been received with unexpected calmness, and there was no reason to expect any disturbances.

The danger has arisen entirely owing to the belief that the French authorities intend to use their influence to make the Glawa family all powerful. The present moment seems so unpropitious for bringing on a trial of strength between the Glawa and their enemies that the general belief as to the French policy seems almost absurd; but, absurd or not, it exists and is infinitely dangerous.

The Glawa and the Mtooga have for weeks been ready to attack each other, and when, almost a fortnight ago, the Mtooga under arms were awaiting the expected announcement in the mosque of the first dreaded Glawa appointment to begin the fight, the whole of the city was listening for the first shot as the signal for an outbreak, the direction and extent of which none could foresee.

Many Europeans have left Fez, but many still remain, and prefer to run all risks rather than abandon the duties or interests for which they are responsible.

The French authorities have it in their power to remove all danger in either of two ways. They can destroy the belief that it is their influence which is supporting the Glawa, or they can, if it be not too late, request all Europeans to leave Marakesh, and guarantee them against unavoidable loss.

In the first case all cause of excitement except hostility to the Glawa family would be removed, and a purely native quarrel alone remain. In the second case the utmost to be feared would be material losses such as the French Government has on previous occasions exacted payment for from those held responsible for them.

Before this time it may be that the necessary steps have been taken, and that the crisis has passed. That perfectly obvious dangers should be knowingly run, and the risk of ultimate disaster willingly taken would be intolerable.

It is a sad truth that many stages in the growth of French influence in Morocco have been accompanied by tragedies. The murder of Dr. Mauchamp, the outbreaks at Casablanca and at Fez, have each marked an advance, and each has exceeded its predecessor in the scale of bloodshed and horror. Surely the establishment of French influence in the south is not to be preceded by yet another tragedy, perhaps more terrible, certainly more easily foreseen than any of the previous ones.

It after Fez has convinced the most dull of the existence of dangers which many have long known, want of prudence, skill or strength leads to a repetition on the south of the horrors of the north, the best friends of France will doubt if they have been well advised in helping her to undertake a responsibility which she either fails to realise or is unable to bear, and the consequences will be felt in the questions which still remain to be settled.

That innocent people should have suffered as Europeans in Marrakesh must already have suffered, is bad enough. No words could fully describe the crime of permitting the suspense of the last few weeks to continue until put an end to at the hands of a fanatical mob.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Replying in the House of Commons to a question by Mr. Noel Buxton, Sir Edward Grey said that the Italian occupation of the Aegean Islands must occasion considerable discussion when the war is over.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on August 3rd:—An all night engagement took place between the Albanians and Turks yesterday but with no decisive result. The revolution is spreading.

On the 2nd instant two bombs exploded in the market at Uskub. Two Jews, four Moslems and 32 Bulgars were killed and three Moslems and 11 Bulgars wounded.

Reuter wires from Salonika:—The explosion reported on August 2nd took place at Kochana and not at Uskub.

The situation at Constantinople is disquieting. The Committee of Union and Progress has induced the Chamber to adopt a motion to interpellate the Minister of War, whom it accuses of complicity with the Military League. Eighty officers and partisans of the Committee, at a meeting in Liberty Hall, passed a resolution in favour of preventing the illegal dissolution of the Chamber. The Cabinet is sitting late and it is believed that it has decided to act vigorously and arrest a number of officers.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on August 4th:—Fighting between the Turkish and Montenegrin Frontier Guards broke out yesterday morning and lasted till late in the evening. Montenegrins allege that the Turks were the aggressors. Montenegrins stormed the Turkish entrenchment. They say that 50 Turks were killed and that they themselves lost 12 killed and 15 wounded.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on August 4th:—The Senate has adopted the Government motion interpreting the Constitution as meaning that the present Chamber is merely a continuation of the last and that, therefore, its mandate has expired.

The Trade dissolving the Chamber is expected to-day.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—The Chamber, so far from accepting the Government's and Senate's interpretation of the Constitution, on August 4th passed a vote of want of confidence in the Government, which then adjourned sine die. Thus a direct conflict has arisen between the Committee of Union and Progress, who dominate the Chamber and are supported by a considerable section of the Military, and the Government, which is backed by a strong Military force and is confronted with the Albanian rebellion, the leaders of which insist upon dissolution.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on August 5th:—In spite of the vote of censure, the Grand Vizier to-day went to the Senate and the Chamber and read the decree of dissolution ordering new elections.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—The President of the Chamber went to the Palace on August 4th to inform the Sultan of the vote of censure of the Government. His Majesty refused to receive him.

An Imperial rescript was read in the Chamber on August 5th stating that the Cabinet enjoyed the full confidence of the Sultan.

It is reported that the Cabinet has decided to arrest some of the principal members of the Committee of Union and Progress, including Talaat Bey and Djavid Bey.

The Cabinet has decided to proclaim a state of siege in Constantinople for forty days.

Reuter wires from Cetinje:—The Turkish Minister has demanded satisfaction for the recent frontier fight within twenty-four hours, otherwise there will be rupture in diplomatic relations.

Reuter wires from Salonika:—Travellers from Kochana declare that over a hundred persons were killed in the recent bomb explosions.

Bulgarian bands are entering Turkey and distributing arms to the villagers in Ishtip District.

The troops at Prizrend and Mitrovitza have joined the insurgents and have sent delegates to the Albanian Conference at Pristina.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on August 6th:—Frontier fighting continued throughout the 5th August. Montenegrins were ordered to retire from the border and to adopt a defensive policy. The Turks, however, crossed the frontier and attacked. They were repulsed with loss however by the Montenegrin infantry and artillery. General Vuxotych has been ordered to the scene empowered to urge the Turks to common action to restore tranquillity. After repulsing the Turks, the Montenegrins followed them over the Frontier and captured three fortified positions.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—Djavid Bey and Talaat Bey, whom it is reported the Cabinet have decided to arrest, have gone to Salonika to confer with the Committee of Union and Progress.

Reuter wires from Cetinje:—Montenegro has replied stiffly to Turkish complaints and insists that none of its soldiers was on Turkish territory. The encounter was the result of continuous provocation by Turkey.

Reuter wires on August 8th:—The dissolution of the Turkish Chamber has apparently calmed the Albanians who have abandoned their intention of marching on Uskub.

A state of siege has been proclaimed in Salonika.

Reuter wires from Sofia:—In consequence of the report that the troops and gendarmes massacred the Bulgarians at Kochana after the explosions on the 4th and 5th instant, the Premier has instructed the Minister at Constantinople vigorously to demand an enquiry and the punishment of the culprits.

It is announced in Athens that a veritable massacre followed the bomb affair at Kochana lasting seven hours. Fifty Christians were killed and upwards of two hundred wounded.

The massacre at Kochana is producing great excitement in Bulgaria. The newspapers at Sofia denounce Turkey in unmeasured terms and declare that unless Europe restores order in the Balkan States she will be obliged to act on her own account.

A telegram to the Times from St. Petersburg states that an alliance has been concluded between Serbia and Bulgaria.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

St. Petersburg, July 17.

In well-informed circles here considerable importance is attached to rumours that Turkey and Italy have begun direct pourparlers. The possibility of serious complications in the Balkans renders this consummation highly desirable. On Russia's part the utmost satisfaction would be evoked by confirmation of the rumours mentioned.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The Imperial Ottoman Embassy in London states that the Turkish commander in Tripoli has informed the War Ministry in Constantinople that the Italians have begun poisoning the wells. A bottle of poison was found on an Italian spy arrested at Zwarra on 10th July, who confessed that he had been despatched for the purpose of poisoning the wells, that he had already poisoned one, and that two other spies had left in order to poison the wells near Bonoma.

According to Reuter's correspondent in Rome, the Italian Minister of War has published a list of the Turkish prisoners of war who have been captured since the outbreak of hostilities. It is as follows:—88 officers, 57 non-commissioned officers, 160 corporals and 1,430 soldiers. 1,693 are at present in Italy.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 14.

Rumours, which it is impossible to confirm, but which are believed in diplomatic circles to have some foundation, are current here that certain Turkish politicians are now engaged in attempting to open up direct negotiations with Italy, on what basis is unknown. The names of Hussein Djahid Bey, editor of the Tanin, and Prince Said Halim, President of the Council of State, who are said to have been staying at Evian-les-Bains, are mentioned in this connexion.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 17.

Notwithstanding the practically unanimous vote of confidence accorded by the Chamber on Monday the Cabinet of Said Pasha has resigned. The reasons for this step, as given by the Agency Ottomane, are that the Grand Vizier did not succeed in his negotiations for the nomination of a Minister of War, while, on the other hand, the Minister of Marine, Hurshid Pasha, sent in his resignation to the Sultan yesterday. In addition to this the Ministry of Finance was without an occupant.

Said Pasha went this morning to the Palace and handed to the Sultan the collective resignation of the Cabinet. The news of the Cabinet's resignation took Constantinople by surprise. In view of the generally accepted belief that Mukhtar Pasha was ready to accept the portfolio of the Ministry of War and that the Cabinet was ready to accept his original conditions, speculation has been naturally, busy finding an interpretation of the impossibility of nominating a War Minister. With regard to Hurshid Pasha's resignation nothing was known until this afternoon. It is explained as due to his disinclination to work with Mukhtar Pasha—an explanation which, if correct, would indicate the latter's appointment as being at one moment as good as a fait accompli. Interesting as speculation on the course of events during the last 48 hours may be, the important point at the moment is that the opponents of the Committee left have gained their immediate object, though what the composition of the new Cabinet will be remains to be seen.

In Ministerial circles Tewfik Pasha, the Ambassador in London, is mentioned as a possible successor to Said Pasha, and it is understood that he has already been communicated with. Meanwhile Assim Bey, the Foreign Secretary, was summoned to the Palace this afternoon.

In an interview with Reuter's representative the Grand Vizier said that the resignation of the Cabinet was due to internal dissensions in the Ministry.

Salonika, July 17.

On Saturday night the President of the Djakova Municipality personally handed in at the telegraph office a despatch signed by officers and civilians addressed to the Sultan and couched in the following terms:—

"The incapable persons who have composed the Cabinet during the past four years have driven the Empire to the verge of liquidation. This clique recently used the power of the Government to dissolve Parliament in order to form a new Chamber which permits it to take uncontrolled possession of the country. You, as Khalif, must observe the march of the Empire towards catastrophe. You have the power immediately to dissolve Parliament and command the re-election of Deputies in accordance with the desires of the population. If you continue to remain inactive and indifferent to our demands, while there is yet time to apply a remedy, the day is not far distant when you will see Albania, plunged in bloodshed, pass under the protection of another State."

Presumably because of the absence of a reply to this message, a crowd, composed of officers and civilians, stormed the telegraph office and demanded to converse telegraphically with the Sultan. There appears to be no doubt of the determination of the authors of the telegram to fight for the realization of their demands.

The incident has made a great impression in other districts of Albania, particularly in Prishtina, where the excited population crowded the mosques, closed the doors to all non-Albanians, and proceeded to deliberate upon the situation.

Constantinople, July 17.

It has been decided to despatch to Albania a peace mission composed of three prominent Albanians who are senators. They will try to persuade the rebels to suspend hostilities, giving them assurances of a satisfactory settlement of their grievances.

Salonika, July 18.

The decision of the Council of Ministers to send a Commission to Albania in order to inquire into the causes of the rising has made an excellent impression and the feeling on both sides is so hopeful of good results that a condition of affairs amounting to a virtual armistice now prevails in the disturbed districts.

News from Turkish Sources.

(Specially Translated for The "Comrade.")

Benghazi, July 15.

THE Al-Moayed correspondent wires:—The opening ceremony of two new Madrasas was performed here yesterday with great pomp. So that now there are four Madrasas altogether in our camp, in which 600 students are studying.

Our soldiers are very comfortable. Trade is flourishing. Not a single day passes in which fresh caravans do not come into the town. There is an ample supply of water and provisions. The Italians, as usual, are concealed behind their fortifications, and do not dare to come out for fear of the night attacks by the Arabs. The leaders of the Arabs have heard that the Italian premier has sent a threat to the Porte that the Italians are shortly going to strike a decisive blow. They are jubilant over it; for they hope that now the Italians will come out of their fortifications at Benghazi, Derna, Tobruk, Khoms and Tripoli, and try to give battle in the open field. At present they are practically immured within these fortifications and their self-imprisonment is simply shameful.

Tobruk, July 17.

The special correspondent of Al-Neel wires from the field of battle:—This morning at 10 A.M. the Italians fired fifty shells into the Turkish camp. The diameter of each shell was about 10 centimetres. The Turks began to reply to the Italian shots, but on coming out from their fortifications they found that the Italians were safely ensconced behind their fortifications and it was from there that they were firing the shells. All the 50 shots were wasted and not a single soul was injured.

Tobruk, July 20

The firing of the shells was continued to-day by the Italians. But like yesterday no harm has been caused.

A new correspondent of the German newspaper Gazette de Frankfurt has reached here to-day.

Mahmud Shevket's Fall.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 11.

THE only newspaper which refers with any freedom to the resignation of the Minister of War is the Tanin. A leading article which is published in this journal under the signature of Ismail Hakki Babanzadeh after copious praise of Mahmud Shevket Pasha's military qualities and private virtues, expresses regret that he should have resigned during a foreign war. His resignation has no connexion with the mutiny at Monastir, and has merely strengthened the determination of the Government to deal promptly and energetically with the mutineers. The new Minister of War must be imbued with the revolutionary spirit which on 24th April three years ago wiped out the stain of the mutiny on 13th April.

July 12.

There is still no indication as to the effect which has been produced upon the discontented officers by Mahmud Shevket Pasha's resignation. The more moderate military men express admiration for his great services to the Ottoman Army and his genuine patriotism, but many consider some of his recent appointments, notably that of his cousin and his brother-in-law, Hadi Pasha, to be Chief of the General Staff, unwise, and hint at the suspicion that political motives underlay certain recent promotions and transfers. His opponents roundly accuse him of having shut his eyes to the continued employment and payment of Army officers by the Committee of Union and Progress, and of having been guided by the leaders of that body in the selection of his personal and departmental Staff. The Albanian members of the Opposition and not a few Albanian officers go further, and assert that his Arab origin made him a bigoted opponent of the employment of Latin characters in the Albanian schools. It may well be, however, that this last accusation really emanates from the Young Turk extremists, who, frightened at the results of their policy, desire to shift the responsibility for it on to other shoulders.

An interesting explanation of the causes of Mahmud Shevket Pasha's resignation is given by the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung, who says: "The immediate cause of the resignation of the generalissimo was the highly alarming reports concerning the attitude of the officers at Damascus and Salonika, followed by an ultimatum transmitted early on Tuesday morning to the Presidents of the Chamber and the Senate in the name of the officers of the army demanding under pain of forcible removal the resignation of Mahmud Shevket within 24 hours. This explains why the Council of Ministers had no time to appoint a successor, and was obliged to transfer the post provisionally to the weak Minister of Marine, Hurshid Pasha."

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 18.

The local press generally expresses regret at the retirement of the Cabinet in the present crisis, owing to the unfavourable impression it is calculated to produce abroad.

The Tanin says: "The withdrawal of Mahmud Shevket Pasha damaged the stability of the Government structure, and notwithstanding the vain efforts made to prop it up it is now completely wrecked." The journal trusts that the matter will stop here, but fears that if the upheavals continue Turkey will fall into the abyss. It had expected greater firmness from Said Pasha. "Foreign opinion," says the Tanin, "will now attribute the fall of the Government to pressure on the part of the mutineers, and nothing will convince it to the contrary. We should prefer to see Said Pasha resume the reins of office, for the situation is not one for half measures. The Cabinet must be homogeneous; it must consist entirely of Unionists, or include none at all. Any combination would be like tying down a boiler head with string when the boiler is just about to explode."

Other Turkish papers content themselves with expressing the hope that the new Cabinet will be composed of men enjoying the confidence of the country.

According to one paper, divergences also arose between Said Pasha and Hadji Adil Bey, Minister of the Interior, in respect to the despatch of a peace mission to Albania, Hadji Adil objecting to the proposal. None of the papers mention the fact, however, that most of Said Pasha's colleagues did not know till yesterday afternoon that he had actually tendered his resignation, whereas he submitted it to the Sultan soon after midnight. The Ministers had been summoned to a Cabinet Council at the Grand Vizierate in the afternoon, and on their arrival they were told the news. Efforts were made by some members of the Cabinet to induce Said Pasha to withdraw his resignation, and a meeting of the Committee of Union and Progress held out an offer of the fullest support. But Said Pasha was immovable.

The course pursued with regard to Tewfik Pasha is remarkable because, inasmuch as he has just been appointed by irade to the Grand Vizierate, he ceases to hold the post of Ambassador in London, and therefore the only alternatives open to him are acceptance or retirement.

Turkey and the Powers.

THE Grand Vizier of Turkey made his eagerly awaited statement in the Chamber yesterday. Reuter's Constantinople correspondent says that it constituted a review of the entire external and internal situation, and the Minister concluded by saying that if the Chamber retained confidence in the Cabinet the latter would continue to do its duty, otherwise the decision was in the hands of the Chamber.

Asim Bey, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, followed, giving an explanation regarding foreign relations, which he declared had much improved during the last ten months.

After moderate speeches by two Albanian deputies, to which the Grand Vizier replied, the Chamber passed a motion of confidence in the Government by 194 votes to 4.

Speaking of the war the Grand Vizier said that rumours had been circulating with regard to the attitude of Russia, but assurances had been received from St. Petersburg that Russia had no hostile designs. He paid a tribute to the warriors fighting for Turkey in Tripoli. Referring to the occupation of the Aegean islands he said that Italy was apparently endeavouring to counterbalance her defeats in Africa, but if anybody hoped to profit thereby the Turks would defend their island possessions to the last drop of their blood. The relations between Turkey and the Powers were good. He dwelt especially on their relations with Great Britain.

The speech of Asim Bey, the Minister for Foreign Affairs in the outgoing Turkish Cabinet, the other day was of exceptional interest, and some of its passages deserve to be quoted textually. His first subject was, of course, the war. "If we had not accepted the war," he observed, "we should have been in a very bad position. We should have had all the world as enemies. By resisting we have improved the situation so far as external affairs are concerned—in fact, the present situation is very favourable. We are very optimistic on that head. What is wanted is to avoid internal feuds. Let us be united, and our position will be still better. Turkey is still necessary for the European balance of power."

Then turning to the relations with other Powers, Asim Bey began by pointing out the improvement in those with England. "The friendly relations of Turkey with England," he declared, "which have for centuries been based on mutual confidence and have undergone difficult trials, especially during the last thirty years of the old régime, have now, in spite of the present difficulties, been brought back to their normal state. To-day the old traditions are reviving with England.—(Applause.) They give great hopes for the future. We have many points of contact, political and economic, both on land and at sea, and the future development of our relations depends on the arrangements on those points. We have done our duty on this subject, but in order to reap it is necessary to sow."

With regard to Germany and Austria Asim Bey said:—"We are not unmindful of the fact that the position of the allies of our enemy, our friends Germany and Austria, as against the belligerents is exceedingly delicate. At the same time, since the very beginning of the war, they have shown themselves full of consideration for us, and this deserves our gratitude. You will still remember the important speech which Count Bertoletti made before the delegations. The words of that high personage, who directs with such great skill the policy of Austria, and who is as much interested in the maintenance of the Balkan status quo as ourselves—do not these words constitute a brilliant proof of the intimate relations between Turkey and Austria?"

As regards Russia, Asim Bey denied the recent alarmist rumours, declaring that they were "far from the truth." He admitted that "there have been between Turkey and Russia certain divergencies of view, which were rather of the nature of remembrances of the past, but we examined them with equal good faith with one another. . . . Russia was as much pained by the present war as the other Powers. She has even taken certain steps with a view to putting an end to this sanguinary tragedy, but these steps had no effect, and have even been badly interpreted."

Truth About Albania.

(FROM THE "ENGLISHMAN" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

London, July 19.

EUROPE is inclined to take too pessimistic a view of Albania and the general situation in that portion of the Ottoman Empire. As one who has been much amongst the Albanians the writer would assure his readers that as fighting material the Albanian is greatly over-rated and his system of offensive war can never stand against an organized force trained upon modern methods. The whole theory of Albanian tactics is to catch your enemy unawares, and, if possible, to shoot him in the back, preferably if he can be found asleep. The average Albanian is a dead shot with his rifle up to 150 yards; beyond that range, however, he is of little use. In his national conceit that he knows more about everything than anyone else in the world, he dispenses with all artificial sighting and uses his thumb as a backsight. As often as not he files the foresight flush with the barrel and knocks the backsight off. Like the old Soudanese, who cut the barrels of their Remingtons short so that they might be conveniently strapped to a camel saddle, the Albanian subordinates modern aids in sighting on his piece to his own personal comfort in the carriage of the weapon. Besides, the Albanian is not really a brave man. He is a swashbuckler and a popinjay. He cocks his hat, and sports all the properties of bravery, but it mostly ends in this personal display. In the opinion of the writer the Ports Albanian difficulties, as long as they are purely Albanian, will not effect any great disaster. It is when they become Italian, Austrian and Russian difficulties that the danger is imminent.

The resignation of Mahmud Shevket Pasha from the portfolio of the Ministry of War and the practical military dictatorship, is a far more serious matter. It means one of two things. It means that either Mahmud Shevket has ceased to be the tool of the Committee of Union and Progress, or that the new military secret society, the "Saviour Officers," have undermined the power of the original committee. From the news of the resignation of the said Pasha Cabinet, it looks like the latter end. For about 24 hours Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha was Minister for War elect. He, it will be remembered, is a soldier of dashing type. During the Turko-Greek war he commanded a brigade of cavalry. Without waiting for orders he charged and overthrew the Greek batteries at Larissa.

It now seems that old Nazim Pasha is likely to be the new Minister of War. No one can accuse him of being anything but a patriot. He was the first Pasha connected with the Young Turk movement and was exiled to Erzerum 30 years ago by Abdul Hamid. Although kept in fortress confinement, he devoted the whole of his time to the study of his profession. Just before the Revolution he escaped from Erzerum and worked his way, dressed as a coolie, to Russian Tiflis. At Batoum he signed on to a Black Sea steamer as a stoker and thus worked his way back to the Golden Horn. On arrival at Constantinople, he found that the Revolution had taken place. This aged and dirty engine-room artisan made his way to Sir Adam Block, who had been a friend of his in the past, and disclosed his identity, begging the loan of some money that he might buy a General's uniform and appear in the streets in his proper capacity. Abdul Hamid fell on his neck and wept, and he was at once appointed to command the Adrianople Army Corps. Later he came to Stamboul as assistant Minister of War. In this capacity he resented the second revolution and very openly said what he thought of the Young Turk's régime. As a consequence he was not employed for some time. Then he was sent to Bagdad as military Governor. His military energies soon had ample scope. He was not, however, supported by the Constantinople authorities, and he came to grief over his Anglophile tendencies which induced him to grant to Sir John Jackson and Company a contract for the Irrigation of the Euphrates Valley. Since this date he has been living in retirement at Constantinople.

I have just had a conversation with a British Officer, who has spent four months with the Turks in Tripoli. The story that he has to tell of the Italian ineptitude for warlike operations almost makes one's hair stand on end. The Turks and Arabs are so few that it seems incredible that the Italians cannot do exactly as they like. The persistency of the few, however, is so great, and they have established such a moral superiority over the Italians, that the latter just refuse to leave their entrenchments. This officer says that the Turks have ample food and means of procuring ammunition that they could carry on the campaign indefinitely. Their practice is to maintain a campaign of unbroken night-sniping. My informant says that the reports published in Rome have not a word of truth in them when they describe victories with large numbers of Arab and Turkish dead. At the most the occupation of the points that these descriptions signalize has been effected by dislodging the thin line of observation posts with which the Italian entrenchments are surrounded.

England, Russia and Germany.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

MORE illuminating than any semi-official communiqués as to the nature of the Baltic Port meeting are the articles which the Novoe Vremya the faithful interpreter of the sentiments of the powerful cliques grouped round the Russian Throne, published on the eve of the interview. Its foremost publicist, M. Menshikoff, had a three column article entitled "The basis of friendship," in which, after a long excursion into the history of Russia's foreign policy, he says:—

"Once more, as a hundred years ago, the chief subject of European politics is England's rivalry with the strongest Continental Power. The object of the complex struggle is, as before, the predominance of England, and once more Russia is her most important tool. As Germany threatens nobody directly except England, the latter country is obliged to repeat Pitt's policy, which had for its aim to surround Napoleon with hostile coalitions. Fate willed it that it should be Russia who saved England a hundred years ago. By way of reward for this service of Russia England immediately after the overthrow of Napoleon, becomes our bitterest enemy for a period of almost a hundred years. Suppose we, in the event of the Anglo-German duel, help, with the assistance of France, to crush the Germans? We may on the very next day have caused to regret it and to seek allies against England. There is one more or less permanent factor of history—geography. So long as Russia remains the sole European country which has come near to India she will be regarded by England as dangerous. On the other hand, only the loss of India by England, from whatever cause, would establish permanent peace between us and her.

"What will happen should Germany be beaten? Her navy will be destroyed, but her army, which is dangerous to us, will subsist. And once more England's predominance at sea, so hard for us and for the whole world, will be established—perhaps for another century. If we had not become used to this predominance it would have seemed to us as monstrous as Napoleon's predominance on the Continent seemed to our forefathers a century ago. We then tried to save the world from the land conqueror, but now Germany is struggling to save the world from the sea conqueror, who has already grabbed one-fourth of the terrestrial globe. What could be better for us? Russia ought to rejoice that somebody has arisen to fight the enemy who for a hundred years stood in her way everywhere. Is it not England's hegemony at sea which has compelled us to stop dead, as before a stone wall, in all the Easts—the Near, the Middle, and the Far East? Is it not this hegemony which will keep us back in our natural evolution on two continents in the future?"

The leading article of the Novoe Vremya is as significant by its total omission of all allusion to either England or France as it is by the exceptionally warm terms in which the Kaiser is greeted. It assures him of "the complete unanimity with which the Russian people shares the sentiments of its monarch;" it calls him "a great sailor by profession and ideals;" it welcomes the meeting as "an event which is regarded as happy by all lovers of peace and all opponents of the cruel policy of the sword and blood;" it commends the majority of the German nation upon being "calm, industrious, good-natured in spite of all warlike pretences, and preferring the peace of the domestic hearth to the passing glory of military laurels," and extols the Kaiser as a man of "rare and many-sided gifts"—a "character and a talent to whom all hearts open." It concludes: "May the meeting in Russian waters prove a new link in Russo-German friendship!"

Italian Socialists and the War.

THE war in Tripoli has had its inevitable effect on the Italian Socialist party. At its Congress at Reggio Emilia last week it came to a split, and a new party has arisen to contest the claim of the older organisation to represent the interests of the "proletariat."

The Socialist movement in Italy has long been ailing. Some ten or fifteen years ago it stood in the forefront of the Socialist International and was distinguished by its revolutionary tendencies. It was then led by Professor Enrico Ferri, a scholar and strict Marxian, and enjoyed a large following among the then nascent industrial proletariat. Gradually, however, a more moderate wing arose led by Signor Turati and his Russian wife, Mme. Anna Kulishoff (Kuliscioff), and the internecine struggles which ensued brought about the complete disorganisation of the movement. It is sufficient to point out that though represented in the Chamber by over 40 men, the party at present only counts 29,000 members, and its chief organ, Avanti! had recently to be transferred from Rome to Milan in order to be saved from disappearance.

Shortly before the war, however, a marked reaction set in owing to the extreme opportunism into which some of the Moderates (or Reformists, as they are called in Italy) fell. Signor Ferri, himself turned Reformist, proclaimed his adherence to the Monarchy.

His colleague, Signor Bissolati, followed suit, and not content with advocating unconditional support of the Giolitti Ministry and the acceptance of office in the Government, actually entered into pourparlers with the King with the view to himself showing an example of political latitudinarianism. The negotiations ultimately fell through—ostensibly, as Signor Bissolati explained, because he would not don a court uniform; in reality, however, because by that time the working class and the generally democratic and Republican followers of the party were up in arms against this policy of compromise with the existing political régime.

The war brought matters to a head. Not only did Signor Bissolati, Professor Ferri, and a number of Reformist deputies declare themselves in favour of the Tripoli expedition, but they also joined in the Nationalist and Chauvinist campaign. An extraordinary Congress of the party immediately assembled at Modena to lay down the policy of the party with regard to the war and the Government which had begun it, but though the resolution, passed after a heated debate, emphatically condemned the adventure, expressed the "solidarity" of the Italian working class with that of Turkey, and strictly forbade any support to the Government, Signor Bissolati and his comrades persevered in their jingo and bellicose course, voted in favour of the annexation decree, gave every support to the Giolitti Ministry, and even took part in the farcical demonstration that the Nationalists got up in honour of M. Carrère, the Temps correspondent in Tripoli, who had been wounded by an Arab. Impelled by this exhibition of contempt for the decisions of the party, even the more moderate section of the Reformists, led by Signor Turati, turned away from Signor Bissolati and his associates, and joined the Revolutionary wing in their protests against the jingo current in the party.

The Congress at Reggio Emilia—the place where the party was born and is, perhaps, still stronger than anywhere else,—though in the nature of a regular annual gathering, almost confined itself to the question of the political conduct of the Right wing of the Reformists, or rather its leaders, Signori Bissolati, Cabrini and Bonomi—all three deputies,—and Signor Podrecca, editor of the comic paper L'Asino. The discussion, in which all the leaders of all the sections, including the accused themselves, took part, lasted two days, and in the end three resolutions were proposed—one by the Revolutionary wing, demanding the expulsion of the four accuseds and two by the Turati section and the local group at Reggio Emilia respectively, merely censuring them. The result of the voting surpassed all expectations the two milder resolutions received only from two to three thousand votes and the drastic resolution of the Revolutionists was carried by over 12,000 votes. The Congress, it may be noted, was attended by about 700 delegates.

The immediate result was that the four gentlemen above-mentioned withdrew, and were followed by nine other deputies in sympathy with them, and on the very next day a manifesto was issued by them announcing the formation of a new Socialist-Reformist party, of which the constituent Congress is to be held in October. At the same time the older party elected a new executive, entirely consisting of Revolutionists, and a Revolutionist was likewise elected editor of the party organ Avanti! in the place of a moderate Reformist, who had voluntarily retired.

"The Second Prophet."

(Specially translated for the "Comrade" from "Al-Alam.")

THE Egyptian Gazette of Cairo publishes the following letter of its special correspondent, Mr. Slome, in its issue of the 18th July:—The unparalleled courage and resolution which the Arab tribes are manifesting in Tripoli and Barca are eloquent comments on their adamant firmness in religion and their national warlike tendencies. But it is also a fact that the abundance and valuable nature of the materials they capture from the Italians have considerably stimulated these warlike propensities of the Bedouin race. For the Arabs the uniform of the Italian soldiery is also a valuable booty—even when there is no money in the pockets. Ghazi Enver Bey has now made some arrangements for giving the Arabs a certain amount of monetary allowance. Enver Bey has been getting large supplies of money without any difficulty. He gets this money from the Egyptian merchants who realise their dues from the Turkish Consul in Egypt by submitting the receipts.

The question of ensuring a constant supply of provisions was one of the most difficult problems of the war, but Enver Bey has also solved this problem. Thousands of bags of dates are obtained from Sewa at a very low cost. And for the Arab soldier the supply of a few draughts of water and some dates is the best commissariat arrangement. Enver Bey is also trying to find out a remedy for the extreme dearth of water. Some Turkish engineers have begun to pump up water from the earth and send it on to all the places in which it is required. All that has been said in praise of that wonderful man, Enver Bey, falls short of an adequate appreciation of his great and almost incredible achievements. I could go on praising him for years and yet not succeed in giving him his due meed. His superb administrative ability and powers of organisation cannot be overestimated; and in battling against difficulties he has been showing a resourcefulness which is simply unsurpassable. All that has been accomplished up to this day has been the work of that single master-mind unaided by anybody else. His greatest achievement is the magical power which he exercises over the hearts of the Arab tribes, all of whom almost worship him. They have unanimously dubbed him "The Second Prophet." No Arab ever calls him "Enver Bey," but they always use the more respectful designation of "Enver Pasha," and bow down their heads, as a mark of respect, every time they name him. There is hardly an Arab who has not got the handsome face of Enver Bey engraved within his heart. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that this veritable "hero" is being literally worshipped over all the desert and the interior of Tripoli.

A strong rumour is current here nowadays that Enver Bey is shortly going to make a great decisive attack on Derna and is busy making preparations for it. If there is any truth in this statement, there is going to be great bloodshed and the attack will be a very desperate one; for the Italian navy is stationed quite close to Derna and can cause fearful havoc by shelling the enemy without even landing their troops. But, to quote Madame Colera, "The Arabs do not pay any more heed to the shots from the Italians than if they were mere playing balls" and past experience justifies this statement.

The truth of the matter is that Italy is now bogged in a desperate situation. True, it is not impossible for Italy, by depleting its exchequer, to conquer the coasts of Tripoli by the help of its guns and its navy. And it was presumably on this assurance that Italy at first affected a most gallant attitude. But the real problem now is the question of the interior of Tripoli. When they first embarked on this desperate enterprise they were in utter ignorance of the nature of the country, the extreme difficulties of traffic, the frightful scarcity of water, the difficulty of securing beasts of burden and the unbearable inclemencies of the climate. But these are the very things which explain the hopeless failure of the Italians against a handful of Arabs, despite their stupendous preparations for the war. And to this day Italy has been in vain trying to solve the problem. Several regiments have been sent into the interior one after the other. But all of them were unsuccessful, and some were almost annihilated. They do not know what were the natural points of vantage in the deserts. At one place there are deep caves, at another a huge ditch into which a whole army might leap and disappear from view in the twinkling of an eye, and the enemy not be able to find any trace of it. Then there are the mounds of sand which are equally serviceable to conceal a regiment from the enemy and to give it an elevated position from which to shoot them down. The Arabs know every inch of the ground and take full advantage of all these natural characteristics of the country, whereas the Italians, in their ignorance of them, expose themselves to utter ruin every time they advance into the interior.

Let us suppose a big Italian army marching fearlessly into a boundless desert. There is no trace of any enemy and silence reigns supreme all around. Suddenly, and without any previous notice, a shower of bullets is poured upon them and a horde of Arabs makes its appearance from a certain direction. The Italians prepare for action. But before they have recovered from the shock of this unforeseen attack, the Arabs again disappear as suddenly as they burst into view and as mysteriously as if it were all a magic play, without either fighting or fleeing. And the Italians are left alone to cudgel their brains with the problem as to whether the earth had swallowed the Arabs or they had disappeared into the heavens.

Generally the Arabs use rifles of a very old pattern. A numerous section of them is even content with its ancient desert weapons, and it is beyond doubt that the proficiency they have attained in their use by constant practice is so high that in the hands of the Arabs they are about as serviceable as the modern costly weapons. Enver Bey had got a supply of modern rifles and offered them to the Arabs, but the majority of them refused to give up their ancient rifles and weapons of the desert. And as to big guns, I am convinced the Turkish Officers, and particularly Aziz Bey, the Commander of Benghazi, have quite a sufficient number of them. At first Enver Bey had only two guns. But later on he captured some very fine mitrailleuse, from the Italians and also secured as booty an abundant supply of ammunition for their use.

The most wonderful characteristic of the Arabs is that at all times and under all circumstances they are so fearless and cheerful that it seems as if they were ignorant of the very existence of the 150,000 Italian invaders. I have made the acquaintance of many Arabs and sounded them well, but never did I find in a single Arab heart the least particle of fear for the Italians or concern at the present situation. The imbecility of the Italian army is a standing joke with them, and they burst out into irrepressible laughter when the elaborate schemes originally prepared by the Italians about the Tripolitan campaign is unfolded to them.

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

statement says that the Naval Convention, while disquieting none, will prove that Russia while attentively following the events in the East is far from detaching herself from her allies in the West.

According to a message to the Times from Paris, the results of M. Poincaré's visit to Russia are that France will support Russian interests whenever necessary concerning the Chinese loan, the Balkans and Railways in Asia Minor, while Russia in return will do her utmost to strengthen the Alliance from military and naval standpoints.

Though nothing has yet been disclosed with regard to the nature of M. Poincaré's conversation with the Ministers in St. Petersburg, the French press is jubilant and supposes that the conversations have been a great success. It is stated that M. Poincaré has telegraphed to M. Fallières expressing complete satisfaction at his visit to the Russian capital. The press singles out the fact that the British Ambassador was the only foreign diplomatist invited to the banquets at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and the French Embassy which were more than mere ceremonial, as the papers declare that Gambetta's prediction is fulfilled, viz., that France supported by England and Russia would be unassailable.

Quadruple Entente.

REUTER wires from Paris:—In an interview with the Japanese Ambassador M. Poincaré informed him that perfect agreement existed between France and Russia regarding the loan and that as England completely agreed with Japan, the four Powers were at one for the defence of Russian and Japanese interests.

Anglo-German Co-operation.

THE Pioneer's London correspondent wires on August 14th:—The Echo de Paris states that Messrs. Lynch Brothers, have entered into an agreement with the Deutsche Bank, the driving force behind the Baghdad Railway, concerning the navigation of the Tigris and the Euphrates and have jointly formed a nominally Belgian Company to purchase or build steamers, which, it is hoped later, will be taken over by the Anglo-German-Turkish Company. The Echo de Paris points out that this is the first instance of Anglo-German co-operation in Asia Minor. The paper refers to the relations of Messrs. Lynch with the Cassel group of financiers and mentions a rumour that the attempt to introduce Baghdad Railway bonds in the English market will shortly be renewed. Messrs. Lynch Brothers confirm the formation of the Belgian Company, which, they say, was advertised at the time and make no further statement.

China and Tibet.

The Pioneer of the 11th August learns that the Chinese in Lhasa have sent in their terms to the Tibetans but they are of a kind which the latter are likely to accept.

News from Tibet on August 14th goes to show that the negotiations between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese at Lhasa are proceeding favourably and that there is now good hope of terms being arranged. The Dalai Lama is exerting all his religious influence in the interests of peace.

The Week.

France and Russia.

M. Poincaré has been much fêted in St. Petersburg. He has had long conversations with M. Sazonoff and M. Kokoytsoff. M. Poincaré lunched with the Tsar on 10th August and afterwards inspected a camp of 60,000 troops at Krasnoeselo where he will attend a grand review on 11th August. The sole announcements bearing on the visit hitherto have been semi-official contradictions of reports that the opening of the Dardanelles or the raising of a loan for the reconstruction of the Russian Fleet are being discussed.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg:—The Tsar reviewed 60,000 troops at Krasnoeselo on 11th August. M. Poincaré was present and afterwards lunched in the Imperial tent.

An authoritative French statement, summing up the effects of M. Poincaré's visit to St. Petersburg on the 14th August says:—That while the Alliance did not need strengthening, exchange of ideas has resulted in a clear definition of views. Agreement was easily reached on all questions pressing for solution in the East and also on all the great problems exciting public opinion in Europe. The Egypt.

REUTER wires from Cairo on 13th August :—Sentences have been delivered in the case in which three men were charged with plotting against the Khedive, Lord Kitchener, and the Prime Minister of Egypt. One man is condemned to fifteen years' hard labour and two others to fifteen years' imprisonment.

Afghanistan.

The Pioneer says on August 16th :—The troops in Kabul that have been drilled by the Turkish instructors who have been attached to the Afghan Army for the last two or three years were recently inspected by the Amir on the big parade ground. Rewards were granted to all Officers and non-commissioned officers who should be sent to garrison the towns in the various provinces to instruct the regiments there. One of the Turkish officers in the Amir's service has been raised to the rank of General and he is to prepare a drill book for general use in the Afghan Army.

The Pioneer's Frontier correspondent states on 11th August that another venture in the arms traffic is being arranged at Kabul. Some Baluchi middlemen have arrived there and a Kafilah is to be organized to proceed to Perso-Baluchistan or Mekran. The Suleiman Khel Ghilzais are to arrange for camels and escort. The route is via the Helmand Valley and Seistan.

A correspondent reports that the road between Dhakka and Jellalabad has once more become unsafe owing to the presence of gangs of robbers. One Afghan official had his baggage looted a short time ago. The road guards are quite inefficient and the orders issued by the Amir during his stay at Jellalabad regarding the protection of travellers are disregarded.

The tribal levies which went from Jellalabad, Ningraher and Laghman to assist in suppressing the rebellion in Khost received ten rupees per man from the Kabul Durbar as batta.

The Amir has remitted all the arrears of revenue due by the Khostwals. The extraordinary clemency shown was doubtless due to the revelations of tyrannical methods followed by the late Governor which brought about the rising in the first instance.

In connection with the protest of some newspapers against the expulsion of Brahmans and Pundits from Afghanistan by order of the Amir it is understood that there has been no such general expulsion ordered, but certain Hindus who were under suspicion of being mischiefmakers were summarily directed to return to India. His action now is only against obnoxious individuals.

Hospital for Haj Pilgrims.

A communication addressed by the President of the Haj Committee, Bombay, to the Government of the Punjab, is published on 9th August in which it is stated that the pilgrims who journey annually to Jeddah on their way to and from Mecca and Medina are subjected to very great suffering and often die in the streets for want of medical aid. The British Ambassador at Constantinople is anxious to build a hospital for pilgrims at Jeddah. It is estimated that the cost of construction would be over a lakh of rupees for which philanthropic aid is invited.

New Delhi.

Extraordinarily rapid progress is being made with the buildings in temporary Delhi. The Secretariat south wing will soon be ready for occupation. Metcalfe House can be got ready for the Additional Members of the Council. The Post Office in the temporary city near the Secretariat is also well in hand. Telephone wires underground and overhead are nearing completion and will soon be in working order. The Central Exchange will be somewhere near the Secretariat, probably in the new Post Office.

The Moslem League.

The Council of the All-India Moslem League on 12th August unanimously elected the Right Hon'ble Mr. Syed Amir Ali to preside over the next annual session of the Moslem League to be held at Lucknow on the 30th and 31st December.

The "Burma Critic."

A full bench of the Chief Court on 12th August held the District Magistrate's order of committal to the Sessions Court passed in the Megui defamation case, (G. P. Andrew, I.C.S., vs. C. Arnold, Editor of the Burma Critic) to be illegal. Five separate judgments were given, four agreeing on its illegality since the Magistrate had not taken the defence evidence. Mr. Justice Robinson dissented.

The Moslem University.

A MEETING of the Muhammadans of Amritsar was held on Monday, the 12th instant, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted :—This mass meeting of the Mussalmans of Amritsar expresses its strongest disapproval of the proposed Moslem University with all the restrictions and without powers of affiliation and wishes the money collected to be utilised in awarding scholarships to deserving Muhammadan students.

The Moslem University.

The Moslem Community was much concerned on learning from the recent press communiqués the decision of the Secretary of State to confine the scope of the proposed Muslim University to Aligarh, and shortly after the publication of the communiqués, the Hon. the Rajah of Mahmudabad issued the notice of a meeting of the Constitution Committee for the 11th and 12th instant. The following responded to the invitation :—

The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haq (Patna), Rajah Naushad Ali Khan (Lucknow), the Hon. Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Qazilbash, C.I.E. (Lahore), Syed Jafar Husain (Aligarh), Mr. Mumtaz Husain (Lucknow), Mr. Shaukat Ali (Rampur), Mr. Mohamed Ali, Editor of the Comrade (Calcutta), Nawab Mahomed Ishaq Khan C.S. (Meerut), Syed Nabiulla (Lucknow), Mr. Mahomed Yusuf (Lucknow), Dr. Sulaiman (Jaunpore), the Hon. Captain Malik Mubarez Khan Tiwana (Shahpur), Abul Khair Syed Mahomed Mohsin (Bareilly), Shaikh Habibullah (Barabanki), Mirza Habib Husain (Lucknow), Mr. Wilayat Ali (Barabanki), Mr. Nawab Ali (Barabanki), the Hon. Mr. Fakhruddin (Bankipore), the Hon. Mian Mahomed Shafi (Lahore), the Hon. Nawab Abdul Majid, C.I.E. (Allahabad), Mr. Syed Wazir Hasan (Lucknow), Mr. Mahomed Yakub (Moradabad), Shaikh Abdullah (Aligarh), Mr. Syed Sultan Ahmed (Calcutta), the Hon. Shaikh Shahid Hosain (Lucknow), Dr. Naziruddin Hasan (Lucknow), Maulvi Bashir-ud-din (Etawah), Syed Hasan Askari (Partabgarh), Mr. Abdul Aziz (Aligarh), Syed Nasir Husain Khayal (Calcutta), Mr. Abdul Aziz (Peshawar), Munshi Ehtisham Ali (Lucknow), Mr. Mahomed Athar (Lucknow), Maulvi Nizam-ud-din Hassan (Lucknow) and Dr. Zia-ud-din Ahmad (Aligarh), Secretary of the Constitution Committee.

In the meantime the Raja Sahib received by wire copy of the following letter from the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler which was being posted to him :—

"DEAR RAJAH SAHIB,

I am now in a position to communicate to you the decision of His Majesty's Secretary of State in regard to the proposed "University of Aligarh."

You will remember that the movement was started without any reference to Government. Not until May 1911 did a Committee, consisting of Nawab Mushtaq Husain, Mr. Aftab Ahmad Khan, Dr. Ziauddin and yourself, approach me informally. We had some discussion and I said that before going any further the Government of India must obtain the sanction of the Secretary of State in regard to the principle of establishing a university.

On the 31st July 1911, I communicated to you the readiness of the Secretary of State to sanction the establishment of a university provided, first, that your Committee could show that you had adequate funds in hand for the purpose and, secondly, that the constitution of the proposed university was acceptable in all details to the Government of India and himself. I added at the end of my letter that the Secretary of State had "reserved full discretion in regard to every detail of any scheme which may eventually be laid before him."

At that stage no details could be placed before the Secretary of State. The discussions which have taken place between us were conducted on this clear understanding, which I more than once repeated.

As regards what I may call the external relations of the university, His Majesty's Secretary of State has decided, after mature consideration, that the proposed university should not have powers of affiliation outside the locality in which it may be established. The hope of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan was to convert Aligarh into a teaching and residential university, and this hope has been repeatedly expressed since by leading Muhammadans and others connected with the College. In the preamble of the draft constitution prepared by the Constitution Committee it is stated that "from the beginning the object of the founder and the Muslim Community was to raise such College to the status of a university."

The practical objections on educational grounds to affiliation are many. I need only instance the following :—

- (1). A university with branches all over India would lead to competition and probable conflict with the older territorial universities.
- (2). Such a university would inevitably keep down the standard of Aligarh degrees and would destroy the hope that the teaching university would become a genuine seat of learning at which examinations would be subordinate to teaching and teachers would be free to develop the intelligence of their students and not merely exercise their memories.
- (3). The value of the residential system depends upon the tone or spirit which pervades the college and which, handed on from one generation of students to another, constitutes its tradition and the traditions of Aligarh are quite local and peculiar, depending largely on personal associations.
- (4). The university at Aligarh would be quite unable to control colleges situated in different parts of India.

Experience is already demonstrating the inconvenient size of existing universities. Apart from these practical objections on the general principles of high educational policy, it is desirable that the

the University of Aligarh should be founded in harmony with the best modern opinion of the right road to educational efficiency, i.e., as a teaching and residential university.

The decision of His Majesty's Secretary of State is final and must be accepted as such. The Secretary of State and the Government of India recognise that it may be a cause of disappointment to the Community, but they trust that it will be in their best interests in the long run.

As regards what I may call the internal relation of the proposed university, considerable modification of the proposed constitution will be necessary. The Secretary of State has decided that the Viceroy should not be Chancellor, that the university should elect its own Chancellor and that the powers which it was proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council, with one exception, namely, that the professors should be appointed without the previous approval of the Governor-General in Council. The distribution of powers between the various bodies of the university must be the subject of future discussion. I can only say at present that it is essential that all matters relating to curriculum, discipline and examinations should be in the hands of educational experts. This is the practice in the English universities on which the constitution of the proposed University of Aligarh has been based. It has been suggested that some seats upon the Council should be reserved for representatives of the Senate. I suggest that, with a view to expedition of business and the avoidance of misunderstanding, the Constitution Committee should consider the constitution de novo with reference to the main heads of discussion and not with reference to the drafts already prepared. It is desirable to obtain a clear and complete statement of the points on which the Conference agree, after which the Bill can be remodelled.

His Majesty's Secretary of State still reserves his discretion as to the constitution, in all details not specifically mentioned in this letter as decided, and particularly in regard to the distribution of powers among the component bodies of the university.

I am authorised to announce that, should the specified sum of thirty lakhs be collected and invested, and a constitution be framed satisfactorily to the Government of India and the Secretary of State, the Government of India will be prepared, in view of their deep interest in the movement, to make a liberal annual grant to the university contingent, as in the case of grants to universities in England, on the satisfactory results of inspection and audit.

In conclusion I must tell you that the Secretary of State has decided that the proposed university should in future be styled, the "University of Aligarh."

Yours sincerely,

HARCOURT BUTLER.

On the 11th instant the President opened the proceedings with a thoughtful speech, explaining the import of the Government's letter and invited the members to consider it carefully and dispassionately, advising them at the same time not to think of an agitation inconsistent with their traditional attitude.

Mr. Mohamed Ali, Editor of the Comrade (Calcutta), said it was not at all difficult to state what was uppermost in the minds of the Mussalmans, nor was it more difficult to foretell with reasonable accuracy what answer the community would give if a plebiscite were taken on the question whether they should accept or reject the local University to be styled the University of Aligarh. But they had not met to consider that question. It was not for the Constitution Committee to say whether they would accept or reject such a University. That question was beyond the scope of that Committee. It was for the Moslem University Foundation Committee and for the Moslem Community at large to say whether they would have such a University or not. The Constitution Committee had been constituted merely for the purpose of framing a constitution for the proposed Moslem University and it was only with a view to frame such a constitution that it had conferred with the Government on two occasions during the last year. The Committee had learnt the views of the Government in these conferences, and in the light of that knowledge it had revised the draft Constitution to the extent that it considered desirable. Since then the Committee learnt along with others in the recent Press Communiqués what the Secretary of State had decided in the matter of affiliation, and only a few hours ago the Committee was enabled to learn not only the reasons which the Secretary of State declared to have influenced his decision, but also certain other hardly less important decisions. Obviously the Committee could not accept the decision of the Secretary of State without further deliberation. It could only recognise one mandate and that was the mandate of the Moslem community. But it was its duty to consider the decisions of the Secretary of State as suggestions for the alterations of the Constitution it had drafted. The decision whether the Mussalmans should accept or reject a university on the lines suggested by Government would be a final decision and the last word must be uttered by the Moslem community itself.

The speaker's suggestion, which was supported by the Hon. Mr. Shafi (Lahore), met with unanimous approval.

Letters and telegrams received from absent members were then read which showed remarkable unanimity on the question of affiliation. The cablegram of H.H. the Aga Khan that this question should be pressed and the Government should be requested to reconsider its decision and the letters of Nawab Viqar-ul-mulk and Mr. Syed Karamat Husain, ex-Judge of the Allahabad High Court, containing the same views, the letter of H.H. the Nawab of Rampur, advising the community to comport itself rationally and with traditional sobriety, were heard with respectful attention. Resolutions of various Provincial and District Committees against the Secretary of State's decision were also read.

In reply to a question the President announced that thenceforward all proceedings would be public and authorised the publication of the draft Constitution.

The Hon. Mr. Shafi opened the discussion of the points raised in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter. In a forcible speech, he said that the Panjab opinion clearly preferred no university to a local university and that the Panjab would refuse a university on the Government terms. He was emphatically of opinion that the community must be consulted before a final reply was sent to the Government. All classes of people and persons of all ages were agreed in the Panjab on these points, and the younger men even threatened to sue the promoters if a local university was accepted without reference to and approval of the community. He said that by its acquiescence for so long the Government was stopped from pleading want of knowledge of the condition on which funds had been subscribed. He also referred to some tentative suggestions about the disposal of the funds collected in the event of their ultimate failure.

Mr. Mohamed Ali said that even if a reference to their final verdict was permissible, he would still request them to say nothing about refusing the University. No; they would have the University and they were sure the Government would give it to them on their own terms. Any talk of refusing only betrayed a doubt in their ultimate success. He then discussed the reasons for and against affiliation, and in conclusion deprecated any reference to the future disposal of funds. The use of the capital for any purpose other than the Moslem University was haram and the use of its income on any thing except to promote its establishment was forbidden.

Mr. Syed Wazir Hasn (Lucknow), Secretary of the All-India Moslem League, supported Mr. Mohamed Ali and laid special stress on the sacredness of the funds collected for the University. The money must be reserved for the University whenever they might get it.

Khan Bahadur Syed Jafar Husain (Retired Executive Engineer) said they had not only to consider the question of affiliation but also whether their University should be a Moslem University or some other. He had collected funds in the Central Provinces and vouched for it that the subscribers had not paid anything for a university such as the one which the Government contemplated.

The Hon. Moulvi Fakhruddin (Bankipore) said it would be a breach of faith with the subscribers in Behar to use the funds subscribed by them for any kind of university other than one with powers to affiliate Moslem institutions that may grow up in Behar. Without such powers they could not come into being, but if such powers were obtained they would be established and those already in existence would grow and flourish. He impressed on the community the need of determination. They had flattered too long and a pardanashin policy was no longer possible. They were not so uneducated as before and they must act as educated people.

The Hon. Mr. Shahid Husain (Lucknow) referred to Mr. Montagu's curious assertion about Moslem unity and his subsequent recantation and he felt sure the Secretary of State's final decision would also be withdrawn.

The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque said he was not sorry but glad that the Secretary of State had decided as he had done. He was creating solidarity and self-respect among them. At this juncture courage, not cowardice, was required, and if the Mussalmans were a community they must comport themselves as a community.

The Hon. Captain Malik Mubariz Khan, Tewana, (Shahpore), in a simple but moving speech, described his own experience in the Panjab when he toured even in small towns and insignificant villages to collect funds for the University. It was only when the poor villagers understood that even their local schools would be linked with and improved by Aligarh that they subscribed liberally and often beyond their means.

After discussion of the form in which the Committee's conclusions should be embodied, the following resolutions were moved and unanimously carried. Almost every member spoke.

1. The Moslem University Constitution Committee, after carefully considering the Hon'ble Sir Harcourt Butler's letter to its President, regret that it is unable to modify the Constitution framed by it, by confining the scope of the proposed Moslem University to the locality at which it is to be established without the power of affiliating the institutions outside that locality. The Committee is of opinion that further representation should be made to the Government to reconsider its decision.

Proposed by the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi, Lahore, and seconded by the Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haq of Patna, Syed Zahur Ahmed, Lucknow and Shaik Abdullah, Aligarh.

2. The Committee expresses its deep regret at the decision of the Secretary of State that the Viceroy should not be the Chancellor of the proposed Muslim University. The Committee further regrets that it is unable to agree to the decision that all the powers which it was proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council.

Proposed by Syed Nabiullah, Lucknow, and seconded by the Hon'ble Mahik Mubriz Khan, Shalpur, supported by Mr. Abdul Aziz, Peshawar; Hon'ble Shaikh Shahid Husain, Lucknow; Dr. Mahommed Sulaiman, Jaunpore.

3. The Committee deeply regrets that His Majesty's Secretary of State has decided that the proposed Muslim University should in future be styled "The University of Aligarh" and feels constrained to request the Secretary of State to reconsider his decision, which goes against the long cherished and intensely-felt sentiment of the entire Muslim community.

Proposed by Mr. Mohamed Ali, (Oxon.), seconded by Maulvi Bashiruddin and supported by Nawab Nasir Hussin Khayal and Dr. Nasiruddin Hasan.

4. The Committee is of opinion that a copy of the above three resolutions be communicated to the Muslim University Foundation Committee with the letter of the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler for such action as it may deem necessary. The Committee is of opinion that another representation should be made to the Government, to reconsider its decision.

Proposed by the Hon. Nawab Abdul Majid seconded by the Hon'ble Mr. Fakhruddin and supported by Mr. Sultan Ahmad, Mr. Shaukat Ali.

5. In view of the statements contained in the letter of the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler that, (1) As regards what I may call the internal relations of the proposed University, considerable modifications of the proposed constitution will be necessary, (2) "The distribution of powers between the various bodies of the University must be the subject of future discussion," (3) "His Majesty's Secretary of State still reserves his discretion as to the constitution in all details not specifically in the letter as decided and particularly to the distribution of powers among the component bodies of the University," the Constitution Committee resolves that it is absolutely essential to ascertain definitely from Government to what portion of the draft Constitution it objects, so that the Committee may reconsider the draft and arrive at a final conclusion.

Proposed by Mr. Mohamed Ali, and seconded by Syed Wazir Hasan, supported by Mr. Mohd. Yakub, and Munshi Ebtisham Ali.

6. Resolved that the Sub-Committee consisting of the following gentlemen be formed to draft the answer to the Hon'ble Sir Harcourt Butler's letter on behalf of the Constitution Committee: Hon'ble Mian Mohd. Shafi, Hon'ble Mr. Mazharul Haq, Hon'ble Nawab Abdul Majid, Syed Wazir Hasan, Mr. Mohamed Ali and Nawab Mohd. Ishaq Khan.

Proposed by Nawab Fatch Ali Khan Quzilbash, C.I.E., and seconded by the Hon'ble Mr. Fakhruddin and supported by Maulvi Nizamuddin Hasan.

On the 12th instant the Hon. Sahebzada Aftab Ahmad Khan, who had not been able to be present on the previous day, discussed some of the points settled in his absence. When referring to the question whether the University should altogether be rejected or not if affiliation was not allowed, his attention was drawn by the Hon. the Raja Saheb of Jehangirabad to the limited scope of the Constitution Committee and to the fact that the resolutions of the Constitution Committee were being communicated to the Parent Committee, the Moslem University Foundation Committee, for necessary action. The Raja Saheb was emphatic that, speaking for himself at least, he had not subscribed a lakh of rupees for a local University of Aligarh, but for a Moslem University with powers to affiliate outside institutions. The Hon. Sahebzada Aftab Ahmad Khan was also convinced and accepted all the decisions of the Committee.

The following reply to Sir Harcourt Butler, drafted by the Sub-Committee was then read and unanimously approved:—

Dear Sir Harcourt Butler,—I am thankful to you for the long and detailed letter which you have been good enough to address to me on the subject of the decision of His Majesty's Secretary of State in regard to the proposed Moslem University. I laid your letter before the Muslim University Constitution Committee which met here on the 11th and 12th instant, and the matters dealt with in the letter were most carefully considered by the members, who attended in large numbers practically from every part of the country. Before stating the conclusions at which the Constitution Committee arrived, I consider it necessary to invite your attention to the fact that the scope of my Committee is limited and that it was constituted merely to frame a constitution for the proposed University, and when considering the letter under reply the Committee was conscious of the fact that it had no authority to go beyond a consideration of the decisions contained in the letter as suggestions for altering the Constitution which it had framed for the University.

The decisions of the Secretary of State are so entirely opposed to the basic principles on which the promoters of the proposed Moslem University have all along been working that, apart from the personal inclinations of its members, the Constitution Committee felt that it had no authority to accept decisions which run counter to the very principles on which it was asked to frame a constitution for the University. In view of the extreme seriousness of some of these decisions the Constitution Committee considers it necessary to refer them to the Muslim University Foundation Committee together with its own views on the matters concerned. Moreover, so far as can be judged from present indications, the Muslim community at large has shown a deep and intelligent interest in the decisions announced in the recent press communiqués, and has even formed definite views of its own. It therefore appears far more desirable to the Constitution Committee to ascertain these views through the Muslim University Foundation Committee than to rely on its own unaided judgment. I am, therefore, communicating the resolutions passed by the Constitution Committee to the Muslim University Foundation Committee for its consideration and necessary action. Copies of resolutions are also sent herewith. I hope to address you again on the subject on learning the views of the Muslim University Foundation Committee and through it of the Muslim community.

As regards the conclusions at which the Constitution Committee has arrived, I may mention that the deliberations of the members attending the meeting were aided and influenced by the communications received from some of the absent leaders of the community, including His Highness the Aga Khan, Nawab Mushtaq Husain, and Mr. Syed Karamat Husain, and various Muslim associations and committees which have been taking active interest in promoting the proposed University.

With reference to what you call the "external relations" of the University, the decision of His Majesty's Secretary of State that the proposed University should not have powers of affiliation outside the locality in which it may be established caused the members of the Committee the deepest disappointment; and, apart from other indications, if the views of such a representative body can be, as I believe it is, a true index of the public opinion of the Mussalmans, the decision of the Secretary of State in this matter seems clearly to have been a cause of great disappointment to the community, as you rightly apprehended in your letter.

After very careful and prolonged deliberation the Constitution Committee unanimously resolved with regret that it is unable to modify the Constitution framed by it by confining the scope of the proposed Muslim University to the locality in which it is to be established without the power of affiliating the institutions outside the locality. The Committee is, therefore, of opinion that further representation should be made to the Government to reconsider its decision.

With reference to another decision of the Secretary of State that the Viceroy should not be the Chancellor, that the University should elect its own Chancellor, and that the powers which it was proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council with one exception, namely, that the professors should be appointed without the previous approval of the Governor-General in Council, the Committee has received the decision with extreme disappointment, but regrets that it is unable to agree to the decision that all the powers which it was proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council.

In the concluding paragraph of your letter you tell me that the Secretary of State has decided that the proposed University should in future be styled the University of Aligarh. This decision has caused the Committee much pain, and, in view of the fact that it goes against the long cherished and deeply-felt sentiment of the entire Muslim community, the Committee trust that it will also be reconsidered.

I may be permitted to refer to certain statements contained in paragraphs 9 and 10 of your letter which require further elucidation. In paragraph 9 you state that "as regards what I may call the internal relations of the proposed University, considerable modifications of the proposed constitution will be necessary," and again in the same paragraph you mention that the distribution of powers between various bodies of the University must be the subject of future discussions. In paragraph 10 you state that His Majesty's Secretary of State still reserves his discretion as to the constitution in all details not specifically mentioned in this letter as decided, and particularly in regard to the distribution of powers among the component bodies of the University. With a view to the avoidance of likely misunderstandings the Committee deem it absolutely essential to ascertain definitely from Government to what portions of the Constitution drafted by the Committee objection is taken, so that on those particulars the Committee may reconsider the draft of the Constitution prepared by it and arrive at final conclusions. I trust you will kindly ascertain the views of His Majesty's Secretary of State indicating any further objections that he may have to communicate, while also mentioning if there is any detail of the draft Constitution to which the Government of India themselves have an objection. On learning these, I shall be glad to lay them before the Constitution Committee for further consideration.

(Sd.) MOHAMED ALI MOHAMED KHAN.

Throughout, the discussion was characterised by coolness and determination. It is proposed to redouble the efforts for the collection of funds in order to be financially ready for the establishment of the Moslem University on the community's own lines, whenever it may come, and to impress on all that the Mussalmans were in earnest in their demands.

Press Opinions.

The "Pioneer."

We publish on another page the full text of two letters addressed by Sir Harcourt Butler, the Education Member, to the Maharaja of Darbhanga and the Raja of Mahmudabad on the subject of the recently announced decision of the Secretary of State to the effect that neither of the two proposed Universities, at Aligarh and Benares, should have powers of affiliation outside the localities in which they are to be established. Sir Harcourt Butler sets forth the reasons for arriving at the decision briefly, but in a clear and convincing manner. As he points out, there are many very practical objections to the ambitious schemes which some of the promoters of these Universities have had in view. A University that would try to "mother" the whole of the country, or rather the students of a particular religion in every province would set itself an impossible task. It would also inevitably come into conflict with the older territorial Universities, it would be able to exert no control over colleges scattered all over India and the value of its academic distinctions would be bound to suffer by comparison with the educational standards of less loosely organised institutions. On the lines laid down by the Secretary of State, the two Universities, if they ever come into being, may serve a very useful purpose by adding to the educational facilities of India. The whole trend of the current educational policy of Government is the slow but sure multiplication of teaching and residential Universities, towards the creation of which private beneficence may well be directed. We are convinced that this view will commend itself to the thoughtful and evenly-balanced minds of those who are promoting the Universities of Aligarh and Benares after their first disappointment at the Secretary of State's decision has passed away.

The "Civil and Military Gazette."

A press communiqué some three weeks ago briefly announced: "It has been finally decided that the educational scope of a University at Aligarh and Benares should be limited to the locality in which it may be established." To-day we publish the full text of letters from Sir Harcourt Butler in which the Secretary of State's reasons for the decision are set forth. The decision has, perhaps naturally caused grave disappointment in both the Muhammadan and the Hindu communities, partly no doubt because it came as a complete surprise, partly because it dashes the hopes of those whose liberality has made the establishment of separate Universities practicable. It is unfortunate that a decision on this fundamental point could not have been reached earlier. There has been no secret about the desires and aims of those responsible for collecting funds for the two Universities. There can be no doubt that a considerable proportion of the funds in each case was subscribed on the understanding that local colleges would be affiliated to the denominational Universities. The destruction of these hopes has naturally caused bewilderment in both communities, and will necessitate a reconsideration of the entire scheme for communal universities. But though the decision of the Secretary of State must at first give rise to disappointment we hope that disappointment will not be followed by hasty or ill-considered action. There should be a calm and deliberate consideration of the question from every point of view, for any decision that is reached must have a momentous and permanent influence upon the future of either community. In his letter to Raja Sir Mohammed Ali Mohammed Khan, Sir Harcourt Butler mentions some of the objections to affiliation from an educational point of view, and it must be admitted by all fair-minded men that they are extremely weighty. The great defect of the existing Indian universities is that they are non-residential, and that adequate supervision over affiliated colleges is practically impossible. It is hoped that in any future universities that may be established—whether communal or general—a higher ideal will be reached, that the universities may become genuine seats of learning, at which examinations would be subordinate to teaching, and teachers would be free to develop the intelligence of their students, and not merely exercise their memories. Nobody, either in the Mussalman or the Hindu community, wishes the communal universities to be replicas of the existing Government institutions; they aim at a higher ideal, and desire to train character as well as intellect. To fulfil that purpose the universities must be residential, and in view of this ideal, we believe calm reflection will show that the Secretary of State's decision on the subject of affiliation is sound. The attempt to supervise the working of the affiliated colleges would inevitably dissipate some of the influence of the university; it would tend to keep the standard of training in the central institution on the level of the affiliated colleges. It cannot be suggested that a university at Aligarh or at Benares could adequately supervise all the colleges of either community that are or will be established in India; it cannot be contended that even now either community is unable to supply sufficient students at a central institution to absorb the entire energies of the university staff. There is undoubtedly room in India even now for denominational universities of the centralised teaching type; and we are convinced that such universities will in the long run be of greater benefit to the communities than institutions with a wider charter.

The "Indian Daily Telegraph."

14th August.

We published on the 13th August a letter from the Hon'ble Sir Harcourt Butler, Member of Education, to the address of the Raja of Mahmudabad, President of the Constitution Committee of the Muslim University, embodying the decision arrived at by his Majesty's Secretary of State on certain vital matters affecting the proposed constitution of the University. The decision, as would appear from the letter, is not final in regard to matters of detail as his Majesty's Secretary of State still reserves his decision as to the constitution in all details not specifically mentioned in this letter. It would appear that his Majesty's Secretary of State has finally decided that the scope of the University should be confined to the limits of the locality where it is to be established. It is also decided that the Viceroy should not be the Chancellor of the University, and that the powers proposed to be vested in the Chancellor—except as to the appointment of European professors—should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council. It has also been decided that the University should be called "The University of Aligarh" and not "The Moslem University, Aligarh." The suggestion is further made in the letter that alterations should be made in the constitution to admit of the distribution of powers between the various bodies of the University in such a way that all matters relating to the curriculum, discipline and examinations should be in the hands of educational experts.

In the letter of the Education Member a few out of the many reasons which are said to exist have been given in support of the refusal of the power of affiliation, namely: "(1) A university, with branches all over India, would lead to competition and probably conflict with the older territorial universities. (2) Such a university would inevitably keep down the standard of Aligarh degrees, and would destroy the hope that the teaching university would become a genuine seat of learning at which examinations would be subordinate to teaching, and teachers would be free to develop the intelligence of their students and not merely exercise their memories. (3) The value of the residential system depends upon the tone or spirit which pervades the college and which, handed on from one generation of students to another, constitutes its tradition, and the traditions of Aligarh are quite local and peculiar, depending largely on personal associations. (4) The University at Aligarh would be quite unable to control colleges situated in different parts of India."

As regards the first of the points mentioned above, unless the complications and matters of conflict with other universities are specifically mentioned, we are unable to offer any comment. It is obvious of course that the Education Member here refers to the affiliation of the colleges and not to the recognition of the schools, as it would be absurd to imagine that any university could exist without schools as its feeders outside the central seat of the university. It may be urged that the schools now existing and teaching on the lines of the Government curriculum ought to serve as feeders. We were given to understand that the proposed Muslim University would have its own curriculum entirely dissociated from that of the Government universities in India; and we think that unless the contemplated Universities at Aligarh and Benares have some special feature in connexion with the education imparted by them, which it is not possible to introduce into the Government university system, there can be no use for denominational universities.

As regards the second objection raised in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter against affiliation on educational grounds, we were under the impression—an impression fostered by both Hindus and Mahomedans—that it was the desire of Indians to have a higher standard than that reached by the Government universities. If so we fail to understand how they would affiliate any institution which would not adopt the curriculum and have the same standard of teaching as that of the central universities. Turning to the third point in the Education Member's letter there is undoubtedly great weight in the statement that "the value of the residential system depends upon the tone or spirit which pervades the college and which, handed on from one generation of students to another, constitutes its tradition," and further, there is no doubt that "the traditions of Aligarh are quite local and peculiar," but admitting this we think that the attempt of the Muslim community to produce the same tone and spirit among other institutions constituted similarly to the M.A.O. College should be encouraged instead of being checked. Of course so far there is only one college in India, the Islamia College, Lahore, which the Muslim community could affiliate after a few years when it has been brought up to the Muslim University ideals, but there is no doubt whatever that should the Muslims be allowed to have a central educational institution it would provide the necessary impetus to have as many colleges in the country as their resources would permit. The proposed constitution, indeed, was very strict in this connexion, as it only permitted of affiliation with the previous sanction of the Chancellor (the Viceroy) which the Muslim leaders very well knew could not be obtained without satisfying the Chancellor that the institution desired to be affiliated was up to the standard of the university college.

The fourth—and final—objection raised in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter is purely a supposition, for there is no reason why, if sufficient funds are available to employ a large staff of university inspectors, the central university should not be able to establish effective control over the colleges outside its local limits. Having examined these points we quite fail to understand why the Government, having once admitted the principle of a denominational university, should now attempt to place restriction on its territorial jurisdiction. There may possibly be reasons for their attitude other than those given in this letter which are more or less of an educational nature, but we go so far as to say that even on political grounds such restrictions are useless in the case of Mussalmans who are a homogeneous people and are linked together by ties of race and religion.

The decision of the Secretary of State that the Viceroy should not be the Chancellor, when hitherto no objection has been raised to the idea, cannot but impress the impartial observer as in the nature of an unkind declaration. "Willing to wound and yet afraid to strike" (to quote Pope's famous aphorism) seems to sum up the Government attitude in this matter. The intention is that the Viceroy's connexion with the university should be an official not a personal one. And yet if the Muslims had the Viceroy as their Chancellor they would have had an opportunity of displaying their regard and affection for the character and personality of the King-Emperor's representative in this country. He would have presided over their deliberations in his personal capacity of Viceroy. His disposal of their affairs in the capacity of the Governor-General in Council will certainly deprive the people of the intimate connexion which they would otherwise have enjoyed. There is no doubt the Secretary of State in coming to this decision has tried to give the Governor-General in Council a power of interference in a denominational institution which he could have equally exercised in his personal capacity without making the community feel the bitterness of it. It was always understood that even acting in the capacity of a Viceroy, the Chancellor could have taken the opinion of his advisers in a semi-formal way, but why he should have been compelled by the Secretary of State to put on his official garb and be armed with the advice of his councillors we do not understand. As regards the proposed change of name of the university, this is a typical instance of the ignorance of the feelings of the Indian people by those who decide the great problems of India from Whitehall. We cannot but sympathise with the Muslims in the fact that their long cherished idea of a Mussulman university will suffer if the university is to be called the University of Aligarh.

We also note in the letter of the Hon. Member for Education an announcement that the Government will be pleased to make a liberal grant to the university if accepted by the Muslims on the terms laid down by the Secretary of State. We will only observe that such an announcement would have been hailed with joy if it had come when the series of differences between the Muslim community and the Government of India had been settled.

The "Statesman."

The Comrade, which represents presumably the views of young Aligarh, and possibly those of a wider section of Mahomedans, expresses deep disappointment over the communiqué issued by the Education Department stating that "it has been finally decided that the educational scope of a University at Aligarh or Benares should be limited to the locality in which it may be established." The announcement, it says, bars the way to the University for the various Aligarhs which it was hoped to create and thus "knocks the bottom out of the educational programme which Mahomedans have been maturing with steadfast hope and devotion for upwards of 30 years." The terms of the communiqué are not devoid of ambiguity. It could be taken to mean that the proposed University is to recruit its students from Aligarh and its neighbourhood. In that case it can be little more than a glorified edition of Aligarh itself. It is doubtful indeed if it can be as much as that, for, if the University has its scope limited to its particular locality, it will have a smaller constituency than Aligarh College, which has drawn its alumni from all India. Probably, however, the intention of the communiqué is to declare that there shall be no affiliation of distant colleges to the proposed Universities. We are at a loss to understand why this local limit has been imposed upon institutions which are expressly designed to foster a certain type of education. To have refused sanction to the projected Universities as being denominational institutions or as being unnecessary would have been an intelligible proceeding. Many educational authorities are opposed to denominational Universities on grounds which have been fully explained during the controversy provoked by the Aligarh and Benares schemes. Other authorities are doubtful of the wisdom of increasing the number of Universities, especially by creating Universities of a new type which may have the effect of lowering University standards throughout India. Had the Government of India declined on either or both of these grounds to countenance the proposal to create a Mahomedan University at Aligarh or a Hindu University at Benares their action could have been defended. But Sir Harcourt Butler spoke honeyed words to the promoters of both schemes and gave them to understand that, if they secured a sufficient amount of financial support, the Government would grant a charter. On the strength of this assurance large sums have been subscribed by Mahomedans and Hindus all over India. It is reasonable to suppose that most of this money was given on the understanding that the benefits of the Universities were to be shared by India as a whole. When, however, the funds have been collected the Government announce that the scope of the Universities must be local. The Comrade fears that in these circumstances the majority of Mahomedans will be of the opinion that it will be better to have no University than one which is cribbed, cabined, and confined. If the scheme is abandoned the action of Government will be bitterly resented. In view of the importance of the question the public are entitled to some explanation from the Education Department in addition to a brief and curiously worded press communiqué of four lines.

The "Empire."

Sir Harcourt Butler has done his best to soothe the ruffled feelings of the Mahomedans in connection with the veto which the Secretary of State has seen fit to impose upon the proposed Moslem University for all India, and we trust he may succeed, but we have our doubts. There is a great deal to be said against the idea of a denominational University, as we ourselves pointed out some months ago. A university in the abstract ought to be above denomination. Nevertheless, when we come to think of it, denominational Universities have done more for the world at large than the undenominational Universities—e.g., Oxford, Cambridge, Upsala, Leyden and many others. There does not therefore seem to be any intrinsic reason why a Moslem University, provided it is efficient, should not do as much for Northern India as Oxford and Cambridge have done for Great Britain. The objection to the proposed denominational University cannot therefore lie on the ground of educational disadvantages, but must be based upon political grounds. It is easy to see how Lord Crewe, holding the rigid views to which he has recently given repeated expression, as to the impossibility of ever admitting India into the category of self-governing dominions, is unable to contemplate the formation of an institution which would undoubtedly tend to generate a very high degree of communal self-consciousness among Indian Moslems. That is the real objection to the scheme, although Sir Harcourt Butler does not say so. It is difficult to imagine, however, why the real reason should not be said outright. Lord Crewe in his latest attempt to explain away the despatch of last August, has specifically identified the Government of India with his own reactionary policy, and as there has been no repudiation of him by the Government of India the natural inference is that Simla and Whitehall are at one in this matter. Lord Crewe is rapidly acquiring a reputation for extreme, not to say brutal candour where the future of India is concerned. Why should there be any more beating about the bush in this matter than there was about the impossibility of regarding India as a country that could ever be fit for self-government?

By a curious coincidence, at the very moment when Sir Harcourt Butler's letter was issued, a representative Mahomedan conference at Lucknow was coming to the conclusion that it could not accept a university without affiliation, and was declining to take the decision of the Secretary of State as final. We have had several illustrations recently of what "finality" means in India, and there is some justification, therefore, for this attitude on the part of the supporters of the scheme. But in almost the same breath in which the Lucknow conference implores the Government to reconsider its decision, we have Sir Harcourt Butler repeating for the second or third time, that the decision is absolutely "final." The Mahomedans, says the Member of Education, must either accept a college at Aligarh, which is to be called a university, or they must make up their minds to do without a university at all. Apparently this is what the Mahomedans will do; in which case the next business will be the return of subscriptions wholesale, and the fruitless expenditure of a year and a half's effort. The Government will thus have given the maximum of annoyance at the minimum gain—unless indeed the Moslems continue to receive Sir Harcourt Butler's assurances in the Pickwickian sense, and to urge their demands upon the Government, both in this country and in England.

With regard to the Hindus, there is even colder comfort for them than for the Mussalmans. The letter to the Maharaja of Durbhanga is final enough so far as its curtness is concerned. In this case also we doubt the happiness of the solution which the Government has adopted. If the scheme was wrong, why was it not frowned upon from the beginning? As it is, the Government lays itself open to the accusation—a very serious one in India—of having roused hopes which it never intended should materialize.

The "Englishman."

There seems to be considerable dissatisfaction among Muslims throughout India regarding the recent official communiqué limiting the scope of the proposed Aligarh University to Aligarh itself. For ourselves we are rather inclined to the view that under existing conditions, it would be for the good of the University itself to concentrate its educational activities, at least for some time to come, in Aligarh. There are not many Moslem educational institutions in India sufficiently advanced for the privilege of affiliation to the University, and even if these were affiliated, they would not benefit the University.

The "Indian Daily News."

SIR HARCOURT BUTLER'S letters to the originators of the Universities movement reiterates the decision already announced that the present orders are final. The practical objections to the proposed scheme of affiliation to the two Universities, mentioned in Sir Harcourt's letter, were anticipated in these columns when the decision was first announced. These objections have not been satisfactorily met by the supporters of the movement in the press, although much warmth has been exhibited in criticising the order of Government. The plain fact of the matter is the proposed Universities are impossible on the scale designed. The enthusiasm for education of which ample evidence has been shown is a very good thing in its way; but the programme drawn up was clearly too ambitious. If the Universities were constituted on the original plan, there would inevitably have followed a serious conflict of educational practices and tendencies. In the resulting chaos the high ideas with which the institutions started would have been forgotten. The fatal objection to universal affiliation is, that inspection and control would be well nigh impossible. Sir Harcourt Butler concludes: "The decision of His Majesty's Secretary of State is final and must be accepted as such." In the face of this pronouncement, it is the clear duty of the promoters to restrict the scope of the Universities within the limits of teaching and residential bodies. It would of course be a great pity if the movement were abandoned altogether.

The "Amrita Bazar Patrika."

THE letters which the Education Member, Sir. H. Butler, has addressed to Raja Mohammad Ali and the Maharaja of Durbhanga, refusing powers of affiliation to the proposed Aligarh and Benares Universities, remind one of the Bengali adage, "Every thing in the iron safe is yours, only its key will be mine." Here is a fair résumé of these letters in our own language: "It will be your own Universities, only you will have to obey implicitly what we command you. First of all, you must each raise at least fifty lakhs; then you must christen them, the Aligarh and the Benares Universities respectively. You must not cast your eyes beyond the four walls of the cities, whose names your Universities will bear and you must affiliate only the college or colleges located therein. You will be allowed to constitute your governing bodies and distribute their powers in such a way as we decide hereafter." Is not the arrangement delicious? And, as if all this is not enough, the further reassuring hint is thrown out that "as regards what I may call the internal relation of the proposed University, considerable modification of the proposed constitution will be necessary." And further on, the Education Member says that "all matters relating to curriculum, discipline, and examination should be in the hands of educational experts." We wonder what superior beings these "educational experts" will be like. We fancy they are white and not dark-skinned men to be nominated by the Government of India or the India Office at Home, and not by the governing bodies of the Universities. By the bye, the Hon'ble Member, in order to remove any possible misapprehensions on this score, quietly adds that "this is the practice of the English Universities" on which the proposed University of Aligarh has been based. May we ask if it is also the "practice in the English Universities" to put their valuables in an iron safe and make over its key to others? Do they, in short, carry on their internal management at the dictation of others?

But lest there be unreasonable or cranky people who develop symptoms of disappointment at these very fair terms, the letters wind up with the further reassuring asseveration that though "it may be a cause of disappointment to a community, it will be in their interests in the long run." Of course, of course there can be no doubt about it. Are they not all babies, and does not their ma bap know better than they what will serve them the best? Alas! alas! the mountain was in labour, and lo! it has produced a mouse!

The "Bengalee."

August 14.

It is perfectly obvious that the announcement made by Government that the Hindu and Moslem Universities are not to have the powers of affiliation outside the localities in which they may be established has created a sense of deep disappointment among those interested in the movements. The Hindu community have not so far formally expressed their views, but we know the feeling of dissatisfaction that prevails among them. The attitude of the Muhammadan community is clear and unmistakable. Recognised leaders from different parts of India recently assembled at Lucknow and after prolonged discussions they unanimously decided not to urge upon Government a Moslem University, if it were without power of affiliation. The leaders hoped that under the circumstances the Government would not disappoint the united wishes of the Mussalmans and that it would reconsider the decision, which the Muhammadan community were not prepared to accept as final. We heartily join in the appeal here made to the Government. Nothing could be more regrettable than if the decision of Government in this matter were to mean the virtual collapse of the great movements which during the last couple of years and more have occupied the energies of some of the finest minds in the country, both Hindu and Muhammadan, and from which so much has been expected by the people at large. From the point of view of the Government it would be a grave blunder. We can only hope, in spite of all that Sir Harcourt Butler has said in his letters published in these columns yesterday, that the decision is not final. As regards the arguments put forward by Sir Harcourt Butler in support of this decision it is not necessary for us to notice them at length. We have in the past said a good deal on the subject in connection with the proposed Dacca University, and it seems hardly necessary to go over the same ground. Suffice it to say that the ideal of teaching and residential Universities is undoubtedly a high and laudable ideal, but it has to be modified in practice in accordance with the circumstances of a particular case. A time may, indeed, come when teaching and residential Universities would be the rule in this country. But the time is not yet. At present it is felt by all who have the true interest of the country at heart that the thing most needed is to diffuse education. In the present case there is additional argument in favour of conferring on the Universities the power of affiliation, that the proposed Universities are to constitute a new type of University, the advantages of which ought to be widely diffused. Nor is the fact to be overlooked that the organisers of the movements have collected subscriptions from every part of the country, and in many cases the subscriptions have been promised or given on the understanding that the Universities are to be beneficial to the whole country. In Bengal, for instance, a hope has been entertained, ever since the proposal of a Hindu University was set on foot, that the National schools might eventually be affiliated to that University. To say now that the Universities are to have no powers of affiliation is to shatter this hope and similar hopes which have been entertained in other parts of the country. It would not, further, be easy to convince the public that the usefulness of the Universities would not materially suffer, so far as the country at large is concerned, if the powers of affiliation were withheld.

If Sir Harcourt Butler's definition of what he calls the external relations of the Universities is highly unsatisfactory and has been a source of great disappointment, we can scarcely say that his definition of the internal relations is calculated to give greater satisfaction. The Secretary of State, he tells us, has decided that the Viceroy should not be the Chancellor, that the University should elect its own Chancellor and that the powers which it has proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General-in-Council, with one exception, namely, that the professors should be appointed without the previous approval of the Governor-General-in-Council. This is not very clear, and so far as it conveys a meaning the arrangement proposed is open to grave exceptions. The organisers of the Moslem University, it would seem, proposed to vest certain powers in the Viceroy in his capacity as Chancellor of the University. The Secretary of State has decided that the Viceroy is not to be the Chancellor, but the powers in question are still to be exercised, not by the Viceroy but by the Governor-General-in-Council. This would certainly officialise the University to an extent which many would regard as extremely undesirable, and would destroy its independence. It would be one thing for a high official, whom the University chooses to be its Chancellor, to exercise certain powers; it is quite another for the Government as Government and entirely unconnected with the University, to possess those powers. And then what are to be the powers of the Chancellor of the University, if all the powers proposed to be vested in him except one are to be taken away from him and conferred on the Government? The arrangement proposed would certainly be anomalous and entirely unsatisfactory.

August 15.

In connection with the decision of Government that the Universities at Aligarh and Benares should have no powers of affiliation outside the localities concerned, the Empire raises a point of some importance. Our contemporary says:—

If the scheme was wrong, why was it not frowned upon from the beginning? As it is, the Government lays itself open to the accusation—a very serious one in India—of having roused hopes which it never intended should materialize.

Yes, if the idea of the Government from the beginning has been that the Universities are to possess no powers of affiliation, it was their clear duty to have said so at the very outset. They knew very well that the organisers were collecting subscriptions from every part of the country and expatiating with enthusiasm upon the advantages which the Universities would confer upon the people generally.

ing the conscience of the "patriots." The League's appeal was frankly, if not gushingly, sincere. One might almost detect a note of penitence in its anxiety to discover a practical basis for co-operation and unity. But, as was to be expected, the "nationalist" Press has greeted the appeal with characteristic gibes and jeers. Nothing can give a more accurate measure of the "nationalist" attitude than the following passage, which we take from a provincial "nationalist" organ that is supposed to have been evolved on the basis of a provincial patriotism free from the taint of sectarian bias:—"Having stood aloof from the heat and burden of the struggle, having escaped the odium of malicious criticisms, and having made a stronghold of the very argument that they have refrained from joining the Congress, they (the Mussalmans) obtained their share, and more than their share in some respects, of the benefits that have accrued to the country from the endeavours of associations, organisations and politicians of the Congress school. It has now dawned upon them that neither the progress of the world nor the progress of this country has been in the least affected by the policy of stagnation and quiescence they wished to adopt and that things have generally gone on as well perhaps without them as they might have with them." It is impossible to mistake the spirit of this plain deliverance. The last sentence, in particular, lays bare the true inwardness of "the associations, organisations and politicians of the Congress school," and it would be absurd to expect that the Mussalmans would ignore the existence of this attitude in their calculations of the future. We dealt with the Hindu "communal patriot" and his psychology in our last. The extract we have given from a "nationalist" organ of the conventional type bears a direct and emphatic testimony to the accuracy of our analysis. The Mussalmans have been curtly told that they are of no account in the "nationalist" programme and that things might "go on" very well without them. However, the Mussalmans already knew this much, though the knowledge of this bluff has so far not frightened them into unconditional surrender. The attitude is not without a tragic irony of its own. The dream of an exclusively Hindu India is vanishing like a mist from the political horizon of the country, and the old type of "patriot" is, in sheer dismay, shouting brave words in the hearing of the world. For good or evil, the Mussalman has come to stay, and, however disconcerting the fact may be, a community of 70 millions cannot be all maya. Nor is it in the power of the community to attain nirvana to oblige its neighbours before it has run the cycle of its destiny. Those who imagine that they can very well "go on" by ignoring the existence of the Mussalmans may perhaps be reminded that the Hindus are not the first people in the world's history who have discovered the use of a "majority." Other "majorities" have also existed that thought of themselves as "nations" by the divine right of number, until a wholesome experience of failure cured them of their pathetic intolerance and vanity. The "nationalist" has, perhaps, to undergo this experience before he emerges out of his shell and accepts the presence of the Mussalmans as a factor of the situation. For the present, however, he must continue to indulge in his magnificent attitudes and heroic poses. Newspapers of the stamp we have referred to above never lose an occasion to fall foul of the Mussalman who cannot tolerate, the sentimental humbug that is their usual stock-in-trade. The Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali in particular, weighs, on the consciousness of the Hindu "communal patriot." His recent remarks about the recruitment of the Indian public servants, when he urged upon the Public Service Commission to attach more importance to "training and breeding" than to examination aptitude, have peculiarly jarred on "nationalist" susceptibilities. The paper from which we have taken the extract calls Mr. Ameer Ali "a philistine"! Perhaps the term has acquired new significance in a new atmosphere charged with a brand new provincial "patriotism." All we can say is that word is "weighty" and whether it accurately describes Mr. Ameer Ali or not, it must make him extremely uncomfortable by its terrible irrelevance.

IN CERTAIN quarters persistent attempts have been made to cast doubts on the truth of the statement that the war in Tripoli has stirred the feelings of Moslem India as never they have been stirred before. "A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still"; and we know it is in vain to try to convert these detractors. But, as for the European public at large, we are sure that if it had any knowledge of the numerous communications we have been receiving on the subject of the war or the deep sympathy and Islamic zeal with which these letters are instinct, it would not have truly a shadow of doubt that "all the stages of the war are being most closely followed in every Indian home." As an incontestable proof of this fact we may mention that we have received several letters from modest and retiring Purdahnashin ladies expressing deep sympathy for the victims of the war. On the 7th August, for instance, Mrs. N. A. Ghulam Ali wrote to us from Khairagarh (C.P.):—"Dear Brother—Yesterday I sent you a money order for rupees four only as a little contribution to the Turkish Relief Fund. If this my little money could buy a few bandages for the wounds of our Turkish and Arab brethren who are fighting for Islam, I shall be satisfied. I send it in the name of my little boy, Feroz-Hussain. May he live to be a good and true Mussalman . . . to help our cause nobly." Another Moslem lady, the highly educated wife of an eminent official of Hyderabad and daughter of another still more eminent official of the same State wrote to us some time back to say that her child regularly prays for the success of Moslem arms in Tripoli, and that the most favourite nursery game in the harems, now, is for the children to play at mimic battles between Turks and Italians. Numerous Moslem ladies have been contributing liberally towards the Turkish Relief Fund, and some have sent their jewellery to contribute the money towards the Relief Fund. Such is the strength of passionate feeling which the Italian depredations in Tripoli has evoked in the Indian Moslem world. Men, women and even children—in their own small way—have been giving unmistakable evidence of their sympathy. And yet some people would persist in failing to see any symptoms of Indian Moslem sympathy with the heroic Turkish and Arab defenders of Tripoli. After all, A'Kempis was not far wrong when, among other failings, he attributed to mankind (or a certain section of it) the quality of being blind.

THE 1st of August, 1912, saw the termination of a most successful régime of Secretaryship of the M. A. O. College by the departure from Aligarh of its late popular Secretary, Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, to enjoy that rest and peace in the eventide of life to which his hitherto incessant and intense activities in the Moslem cause have entitled him and which his present condition of physical breakdown rendered absolutely necessary. Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk was the only leader of the Moslem community whom the Mussalmans of India were unanimous in considering a worthy successor of the great Sir Syed Ahmed, and his four and a half years' period of Secretaryship has fully justified the implicit confidence that they had placed in him. The period during which the Nawab has been at the helm of affairs has been one fraught with peculiar difficulties and embarrassments for Moslem India. But the Nawab has piloted what seemed to be the fast breaking-up ship of his community through the troublous times with such consummate skill that to-day the condition of Muhammadans all over India is more conducive to optimism, in spite of some overhanging clouds, than it has ever before been. The towering personality of the Nawab, his unswerving honesty of convictions, and his far seeing political sagacity and unfailing resourcefulness in meeting great national emergencies are responsible, perhaps, to a greater degree than anything else, for the perceptible improvement which has latterly come into evidence in the social and political condition of the Indian Mussalmans. On his personal loftiness of character and his many qualities of head and heart it would be superfluous to expatiate. It would be a bright day for Moslem India when the community would be able to boast of a considerable number of leaders of the same moral calibre as the Nawab, and as utterly selfless in their desire for uplifting the community. A man without any great patrimony, he took up Government Service as his chief means of livelihood, but gave it up almost at a moment's notice when he found that under a certain type of officials it interfered with his religious principles. Then, after a term of office in the Nizam's Dominions, he finally consecrated his life to selfless service for his community. He was one of those who were chiefly instrumental in preventing the great blunder which Lord Macdonnell had wellnigh committed on the question of the conflicting claims of Urdu and Hindi to be the court language. Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk was the first to perceive the necessity of focussing the political aspirations of the Indian Moslems in a central League, and he spared no personal sacrifice in time or energy to establish it on a permanent footing and widen its scope of potency and usefulness. We firmly believe that the Nawab is one of the very few political leaders against whom no section of his community has even a syllable to whisper, and to whom no Muhammadan dare impute any self-seeking motives. We are now in too close proximity to the Nawab's régime at the great national education-centre at Aligarh to be in a position to take a historical retrospect of his term of office. But the grave concern which the whole community has been expressing at the retirement of the Nawab from active supervision of the institution is ample enough testimony to the unqualified appreciation with which the Moslem community looks back on the Nawab's term of office at Aligarh. We heartily join in Moslem India's earnest prayer that Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk may be blessed with an early recovery from the maladies from which he is suffering. May he long be spared to his community to continue his great work for its amelioration and to see the consummation of that great movement of reform and regeneration which he helped so much to usher in.

So "the only consolation" that was left to us in the matter of the remarkable hoisting of Rai Bahadur Kanhaya Lal on to the Additional Judicial Commissionership of Oudh has been withdrawn. For we now learn that he has been confirmed in the appointment in which he was recently gazetted to "act until further orders." We repeat that we yield to none in a just appreciation of the special merits of extraordinarily able officers. But there is always a limit beyond which it is difficult to convince the public that the motive power of "special merits" was the only propulsive force for shooting into pre-eminence extraordinarily qualified official meteors. To the average mortal it certainly seems rather remarkable that a gentleman who was a Munsif only in 1906 should have suddenly begun to be blessed with abnormal official preferment and, jumping over most of the intervening hurdles of acting and permanent Sub-Judgeships and Judgeships of all grades, should to-day have reached the dignity of an Additional Judicial Commissioner. Mr. Kanhaya Lal's singular rise into power has seemed all the more unaccountable to the public in view of the fact that the Rai Bahadur's rapid promotions have entailed the supersession of several high officials—permanent District Judges and Statutory Civilians—against whom the public has never heard even a whisper and whose integrity and high administrative ability it has never had reasons to doubt. Rightly or wrongly, in certain quarters in the public the impression has been gaining ground that there is more than meets the eye in the peculiar fact that the most phenomenally rapid stage of Rai Bahadur Kanhaya Lal's official progress has synchronised with the régime of Sir John Hewett, who is known to have taken a particular fancy to a certain very near relation of the fortunate Rai Bahadur, who has himself attained great prominence in the official world. Unwholesome food for reflection seems also to have been supplied to the public by the curious coincidence of the announcement of the Rai Bahadur's confirmation with the outburst of eulogistic rhetoric which Sir John's departure has evoked from that very near relation. The Hon. Pundit Sunder Lal has always been noted as a phlegmatic but industrious and most successful Vakil who had travelled a good deal in "the wilderness of single instances," but it was left for Sir John Hewett to discover in him the greatest Indian educationist of U.P. Similarly, Sir John Hewett was everywhere known as a masterful and remarkably able administrator, but it was left for the Hon. Pundit Sunder Lal to discover in him a popular demi-god. We do not object to these reciprocal discoveries, but we draw the line at a jump from a Munsif in 1906 to a Judicial Commissioner in 1912. We suspect that the post in which Mr. Kanhaya Lal is confirmed will not permanently be vacant before Sir John departs from the United Provinces. But evidently Sir John has little faith in his successor's ability to make a wise choice for the post, and is it not better never to put off for tomorrow the work of—the day after tomorrow?

The Comrade.

The Moslem University.

I.

We have not been made to wait in the wilderness for long; for the Government has not only published the reasons for the "final" decision of the Secretary of State in regard to affiliation by the proposed Moslem University, the absence of which we regarded as significant, but the members of its Constitution Committee have also been shown the courtesy of a "private view" of the other "final" decisions of His Majesty's Secretary of State. The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler was this time considerate enough to send by wire a copy of his letter to the Hon. Raja Sir Ali Mohamed Khan for the Committee's information on the eve of its meetings on the 11th and 12th, intimating that the letter would be published in Simla only on receipt of the Raja Saheb's acknowledgment. This is as it should be, and we may now spare the Hon. the Education Member the additional observation that this is also as it should have been.

When some members of the Constitution Committee reached Lucknow on the 10th they found that they had not only to consider the so-called "final" decision of the Secretary of State in regard to affiliation, but that they had also to consider several other "final" decisions hardly less important, and that they were required to be prepared to consider several other "final" decisions if and when it pleased His Majesty's Secretary of State to declare his pleasure. These new decisions and the prospect of others still in the womb of futurity could not ordinarily fail to disturb the equanimity of the members of the Constitution Committee. But after the bolt from the blue contained in the recent Press communiqués which preceded the letter of the Education Member, and the manner in which the ukases of Lord Crewe were communicated, had inured the Committee to a great extent. In high society it is a sin to be surprised, and the Moslem community is being elevated greatly by the shocks which it is now sustaining so that in course of time it could say with Macbeth:

"I have almost forgot the taste of fears."

Moslems have "supp'd full with horrors, and direness cannot once start them."

As our readers must recollect, these coming misfortunes had cast their shadows in front. The Government of India themselves had some doubts about the necessity of affiliation; but when almost a year ago the Committee conferred with Sir Harcourt Butler and Mr. Sharp, the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi was deputed by the Committee to explain the reasons which made affiliation such a vital portion of the University Constitution. We do not know what has occupied the Secretary of State for so long, because the change of Capital and the modification of the Partition were clearly such unimportant matters that, so far as can be judged from Lord Crewe's feeble echo of the Government of India's Despatch, it could not have taken the Secretary of State long to have said "yes" to everything which the eight "Patriot Kings" of Simla had decided to do. The famous Despatch left India on the 25th August, and his Lordship said "Amen" to it officially on the 1st of November. The conference between the Constitution Committee and the Department of Education took place towards the end of September, and the proceedings of that conference must have been communicated to the Secretary of State early in October. The Marquess of Crewe, then, had several weeks, before he came out to India, wherein to consider the Constitution drafted by the Committee, and had ample opportunity, while he was here, to discuss any details to which he took objection. But even after his departure from India it was not till the beginning of March that he communicated his objections to the Government of India. When His Lordship's despatch arrived in India the Secretariat as usual tried to keep everybody in the dark officially and enlightened everybody unofficially. The fiction of secrecy was kept up, and in view of the so-called finality of the Secretary of State's decision, we are rather sorry that we lent our countenance to this fiction of secrecy. In the issue of 9th March we expressed our regret that a local vernacular contemporary should have inadvertently published, on the strength of a very prominent member of the Constitution Committee, a statement to the effect that the Government did not intend to permit the affiliation of colleges and schools outside Aligarh. But we knew all the time that not only did the Secretary of State object to the power of affiliation, but that he also disapproved of the Viceroy being the Chancellor, and that he was in favour of permitting the authorities of the proposed University to appoint their professors without the previous approval of the Viceroy as Chancellor. Therefore, so far as we are concerned, we could say with the Persian poet:

هر دشمنی است دوست گر با منکودی *
آخر کردی نفست می داشتی

(Every hostility that thou hast shown, O friend of mine, towards me, thou hast shown it only now, but I knew of it before.)

If the mystery of the Secretary of State taking nearly half a year in communicating his decisions on the draft constitution of the Moslem University cannot be easily explained, it would on the face of it be still more difficult to explain the mystery of the non-publication of these decisions for another period of nearly half a year. But, although the Secretariat did not publicly avow it, we knew all the time that the Government of India had referred to the Secretary of State, and no doubt His Lordship took time to arrive at what the Government terms his "final" decision. But howsoever the delay may have been caused, it is certain that nearly a year has elapsed since the Constitution Committee last conferred with the Government of India.

On the eve of the Durbar Announcement, when no doubt it was desirable to keep the Mussulmans in good humour, the Hon. the Member for Education graced the Educational Conference with his presence in company with one of his distinguished colleagues, and announced in a language which his audience could understand at least as well as he that the establishment of the University was only a question of money. It is true that when the English version of his speech was shown to him a few minutes later before being despatched to the Press, he altered the word "only" into "mainly", and thereby put on the armour of official reserve which for just a dream-while he had put off only a moment before. But in view of the decisions contained in his letter to the Hon. Sir Ali Mohamed Khan, K.C.S.I., the President of the Constitution Committee—decisions which, in the opinion of that Committee, "run counter to the very principles on which it was asked to frame a constitution for the University," and which are "so entirely opposed to the basic principles on which the promoters of the proposed Moslem University have all along been working, that, apart from the personal inclinations of its members, the Constitution Committee felt that it had no authority to accept"—can Sir Harcourt Butler say that in view of such decisions the establishment of the Moslem University was even "mainly" a question of finance? The Mussalman were repeatedly assured after the Durbar Announcement that if they brought in thirty lakhs one day they could get their University on the next. When it was mentioned that, according to rumour, H. E. Sir George Clarke—although he had indicated his approval of the University Movement quite early in 1911—and H. H. Sir John Hewett were opposed to the establishment of the Moslem University, the powers that be assured the nervous and the sceptic that Local Governments did not matter, and that the Moslem University Bill need not be referred to them at all. The Mussalman had waited long enough for legislative action. They were in a restive condition after the Announcement. The Government of India had already ignored Local Governments in much more important matters than the establishment of the Moslem University. And the Moslem University was just the kind of sop that could have been thrown to a depressed and restive community. Who could then blame the sceptics if their doubts were soothed and the nervous if their nerves were restored to a normal state? In spite of the sinister shadows cast by the "final" decisions as early as March last, the Moslem community was assured that no delay could now occur between the collection of the necessary funds and the introduction of the Bill in the Council. Even the greatest pessimist had no idea that just when the necessary sum would be collected the Government would impose conditions which no one ever dreamt that the Mussalman would accept. We shall not be so uncharitable as to say that this coincidence was premeditated by the Government. We grant that it is purely accidental, but we equally emphatically declare that it was avoidable. That it was not avoided is the fault of a Government which has got into the habit of working on the greatest of public issues in secret and then suddenly and without warning facing the people with "settled facts." The Government of India were resourceful enough at the Durbar and staked the reverence and regard of India for her Sovereign on the cast of the die. But, fortunately enough, there is only a retiring Secretary of State, who has done little for India, to deal with this time, and we have no doubt whatever of the final issue.

We publish elsewhere the proceedings of the meetings of the Constitution Committee, and may state at the very outset that we whole-heartedly endorse every one of the conclusions at which it has unanimously arrived. Had the Committee been the only organisation established in connection with the proposed Moslem University, and the final arbiter of its destinies, we have no hesitation in saying that it would have decided to refuse the University altogether rather than have it on the terms of the Government. When we say this we do not for a moment ignore the composition of the Constitution Committee. It is a large enough body composed of some fifty members from every part of the country and of all shades of opinion. It has both Ultra-Conservatives and Ultra-Radicals among its members, and comprises men of different ages and temperaments. But when the veteran Raja Saheb of Jahangirabad could agree with the latest recruit to the ranks of the English Bar in India, and the representative of the Punjab in the Viceroy's

Council could vie with the representative of the Moslems of Behar in that Council in emphasis and determination, then it is safe to say that, had the Committee to consider the larger question whether to accept the Government's terms or refuse the University altogether, at least an overwhelming majority would have agreed to refuse.

But soon after the President's opening speech—which was a model of such orations on occasion; so critical as this, and in which the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad placed the whole situation clearly and succinctly before the members, asking them to consider it coolly and dispassionately, and although in no way endeavouring to foist his own views upon the Committee, advised it to eschew agitation of a character inconsistent with Moslem traditions of sobriety and moderation—attention was drawn to the fact that the scope of the Constitution Committee was limited. It was pointed out that if it had no authority to accept decisions so entirely at variance with the basic principles on which the promoters of the proposed University had all along been working, it had no authority also to arrive at any conclusions such as the acceptance of a University on the Government's lines or the refusal to have a University at all. A Constitution Committee which entered into a discussion of the community's final verdict would have acted wholly unconstitutionally and gone beyond its powers, and no member of such a Committee could honestly persuade it to give such a verdict on behalf of the community merely because he knew that the Committee's verdict would accord with his own. We, therefore, trust that the Government would take note of the Committee's strictly constitutional action and approve of it, even if it cannot approve of its decisions.

It may possibly be suggested that the Committee was unwilling to face such a grave problem and shifted this heavy load to another body. But a glance at its decisions will show that the Committee was inspired with as great a sense of its duty as a sense of its limitations, and if it would not decide what it was for the Moslem community at large to decide, it had no hesitation whatever in arriving at conclusions so far as its own duty of framing a constitution was concerned.

Ever since its members had heard a year ago from the Hon. the Member for Education that Government had not made up its mind whether the power of affiliation should be granted to the proposed University or not, they had been considering whether the University of which they were framing a constitution could possibly dispense with that power without detriment to its character and beneficence. It would not then be right to say that it settled things in a hurry in the course of a few hours on the 11th and 12th instant. As regards the name of the University, if a name ever denoted anything and was not wholly without significance, the Committee could not possibly consent to the dropping of the word "Moslem" or some such qualifying word from the proposed appellation of a University which was to be established almost exclusively by the Mussalman and mainly for the benefit of the Moslem community. As a matter of fact, it may safely be said that the Mussalman would not consent to a change of name such as has been suggested in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter even if they began to think about it from now till doomsday. As regards the remaining decision of the Secretary of State, that the Viceroy should not be Chancellor, but that the powers which it was proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council, the Committee has only decided that it is unable to vest all such powers in the Government of India if the Viceroy cannot personally be the Chancellor of the University. In other words, while deciding against the omnibus transference of the Chancellor's powers to the Governor-General in Council, the Committee has not yet decided what powers, if any, it could safely leave to an outside body such as the Government of India. It cannot, therefore, be said that the Committee has done its work rashly and in a hurry, and it was evident to every person present in the meetings that although a marked determination characterised almost every speech, there was none of that passion which befalls rather than illuminates a critical situation.

Unfortunately the hesitating and vacillating conservatism—even if such a thing can be called conservatism—of the régime of the late Nawab Moshin-ul-Mulk has led some people, including a type of Government officials, to think that among the Mussalman only youth is capable of honest thought and determined action. That is a high enough compliment for Moslem youth, but it is not always meant as such. Human nature is very complex, and it is one of the riddles of humanity that none are so cynically supercilious towards youth as those who lack wrinkles and grey hair themselves. None are so hard on youth as the young, and, consequently, we were not at all surprised some time ago to hear of the dangers of being led by young men from one who had still a good half of the journey to travel before completing the psalmist's span of life. We would, therefore, ask the Government to scrutinise carefully the ages of the members of the Constitution Committee so that they may discover for themselves that the decisions of the Committee have not been uttered out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. It is true that the two leaders of the Mussalmans most prominent in connection with the University Movement are what the junior members of the Government of India would call young. We have, however, never heard that the toga virilis was withheld from His Highness the Aga Khan and the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad because the tiniest poppies of the Government disapproved of men who were well under forty. But even if youth is a crime, the grey hair and wrinkles of Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk Bahadur must redeem every beardless youth that lips in liberal thoughts. For if the love of liberty and determination are characteristic of adolescence, this Moslem patriarch must have discovered the secret of perpetual youth. But he is not the only patriarch that is both liberal and determined. We have already referred to the veteran aristocrat of Jahangirabad who redeems the youth of his brother Taluqdar of Mahmudabad, and we may leave the junior members of the Government to challenge such of the Moslem Jury as they object to on the score of lack of years. We would, however, remind the Government that whether in England or in India, just at the present moment it is the young that are in the vanguard of administration, and if the pot calls the kettle black, the kettle is not likely to suffer long for want of a suitable reply.

Turning to the proceedings of the Lucknow meetings on the 11th and 12th, we note that the Constitution Committee wisely refrained from assigning any reasons for the conclusions at which it arrived after prolonged and careful deliberation. But it is not the same thing as having no reasons to offer. We propose to explain these reasons in detail in a later issue, but we may be permitted to refer at this stage to Sir Harcourt Butler's own procedure in the matter of assigning reasons. He says nothing about the reasons why the Viceroy should not be Chancellor, nor does he explain why the University should elect its own Chancellor and hand over all his powers to the Viceroy and the latter's colleagues in Council. Again, in the briefest paragraph of his letter, and the very last, he must tell the Committee without any show of reasoning that the Secretary of State has decided that the proposed University should in future be styled the "University of Aligarh". It is true that he vouchsafes to instance what he is pleased to call only some of the many practical objections on educational grounds to affiliation. But that does not deny the existence of "practical objections" on other grounds. There is a doctrine of "economy of causes" known to scientists and philosophers which lays it down that if one cause can account for two or more consequences one need not search for more causes. It is true that the great Newton had intended to make a hole in his bedroom door for the kitten when it was born, like the one he had made for the cat, and, having forgotten to do so, was not a little surprised to find that, in spite of a single hole, both the kitten and the cat were in the room that night. But if all are not philosophers, all are not Newtons either. The Mussalmans cannot therefore be considered too presumptuous if by a sub-conscious process they assign a single cause to two consequences and expect the kitten to enter by the same aperture as the cat. Clearly the objection to the name of the "Moslem University" could not have been based "on educational grounds," and, according to the doctrine of economy of causes, it is just possible that the objection to affiliation was in reality based on the same grounds as the objection to the name.

As we have said before, we shall discuss in a subsequent issue "the practical objections on educational grounds" to which Sir Harcourt Butler refers in his letter. But it is well known that the Government of India addressed the Secretary of State on no less than two occasions supporting the Moslem plea for affiliation. If out of their full quiver Sir Harcourt is pleased to send a few darts in the direction of the Moslem community in the shape of practical objections, will he not also lend it one of the many armours from the Government's well-stocked armoury with which he and his colleagues had resisted the Secretary of State on two occasions? Surely the masters of the destinies of a sixth of the whole human race could not have been engaged in a "sham fight"!

We have already said a good deal to show that we do not agree with some of the Secretary of State's decisions. But we must also thank him for one decision in which his lordship has negatived the proposal so vehemently insisted upon by the Government of India. After the Durbar Announcement it was idle for Government to try to prevent the possibility of mischief in permitting the most forward community of India to appoint professors for its University without the previous approval of the Viceroy. At any rate, Government could no longer expect to make the Mussalmans yield the point in the belief that this particular precaution was not designed for the loyal and the contented. The precaution of previous approval was, therefore, as inconsistent with the Government's general attitude towards the discontented as difficult to obtain approval of from the loyal and the contented, and is therefore dead and buried. May it rest in peace and know no resurrection!

We must also thank the Government of India for the prospective offer of "a liberal annual grant to the University contingent," on the analogy of grants to Universities in England, "on the satisfactory results of inspection and audit." A gift horse can only be looked at in a limited number of ways, and we would have recommended to the Moslem community to beware of the limitations and pass the customary resolutions. But, in the first place, even the Mussalmans have by now dimly seen that the grant would come from the general revenues of the country to which they contribute much more than what is spent on the education of their youths. For instance, it is not perhaps generally known that the Government grant to the notorious "favourite," the Aligarh College, is only thirty-three thousand rupees as contrasted with its total revenue of two lakhs and twenty thousand. In the next place, the camel that is sold for five rupees has to be purchased along with the cat tied to its neck that is priced at five hundred. This was a fable some time ago; but our Government is converting the fables of yesterday into the facts of to-day. We trust it would not be accounted to us as a sin to suggest with the utmost humility that it is a trifle premature to expect that the Mussalmans would rush to frame a constitution "satisfactorily to the Government of India and the Secretary of State" in order to qualify for that "liberal annual grant to the University contingent" which their "deep interest in the movement" has led the Government of India to contemplate. There are other ways of displaying a "deep interest in the movement", and the "liberal annual grant" could well have waited till the Mussalmans had framed a constitution "satisfactory to the Government of India and the Secretary of State". The Government credit is not yet so low that for every bargain the coin must be jingled in the pockets. The Government of India are often more considerate than this, and what could be more generous than the recognition that the Secretary of State's decision in the matter of affiliation "may be a cause of disappointment to the community"? A caviller may suggest that "may" is hopelessly weak when it is well known that mandates are being sent in all directions to suppress the impending agitation. But, as the late Home Member once suggested, that may be a misprint after all, and the "may" may have changed places with the "must" in the previous sentence that "the decision of His Majesty's Secretary of State is final and must be accepted as such". Surely the Government knows that the Committee can recognise only one mandate, and that is the mandate of the entire Moslem community.

Trans-Persian Railway.

WHATEVER may be the ultimate fate of the project for a railway across Persia, which the Committee of Studies now sitting in Paris is to examine and evolve, it is, at the present moment, the most important and complicated issue of the Middle Eastern question. The present proposal on which the British, French and Russian financiers are engaged has emanated from the Russian Foreign Office. It was first communicated to British Government towards the end of 1910. Gradually it materialised in the shape of the Société d'Etudes that has undertaken to go into the whole question from its financial and economic aspects. The proposal, though not a new one,—the idea of a Trans-Persian railway is as old as 1872—has, owing to the new set of circumstances governing international diplomacy and the new conditions in the Middle East, become a thoroughly live issue. The recent debates in the British Houses of Parliament were very earnest in tone; and the deep anxiety and doubts to which both the Liberals and Unionists gave expression may be taken to mean that the question of railways in Persia has entered a decisive stage. Sir Edward Grey and Lord Morley repudiated with a little too much emphasis the idea that the British Government had definitely committed itself to a participation in any scheme of railway construction that the promoters of the Russian proposal might happen to elaborate. They assured their respective Houses that no such commitments had been assumed, that His Majesty's Government had only agreed to the proposal in principle and consented to its examination, but that it reserved the fullest freedom of action when the project emerged in final form. The Government justifies its attitude of benevolent patronage on the grounds that the promoters of the scheme would have proceeded independently of British help and that the British veto at the outset would have led to other complications without extinguishing the project. Lord Morley even darkly hinted at some ugly results of British refusal to participate. What those results might be he left the House to conjecture. He wished most urgently to impress on their Lordships that "in the view of the Government—and the Government of India were just as sensible of this point as the Government at home—a point-blank refusal to assent not to a railway but to an examination of the proposal might have led to complications that would involve disadvantages to our Indian position much more serious than the disadvantages of the present project over which the Government would, even by this limited co-operation that they reserved to themselves, retain some decisive means of control." The more serious disadvantages to Indian position are not clear to the uninitiated, and one may be permitted to doubt that they are not the result of the strange obsession that affects British diplomacy in consequence of Russian dominance over the British Foreign Office. Russia might extort a concession from Persia within her own sphere, build a railway through Seistan and dominate the Indian frontier. This contingency, perhaps, loomed in "the political imagination" of Lord Morley when he uttered his vague warning about "complications." It amounts to a sad though mute confession that the Anglo-Russian Convention is a farce. Sir Edward Grey never loses an opportunity to justify his handiwork, though he is never entirely free from the consciousness of having to defend a lost cause. His favourite argument about the utility of this curious diplomatic instrument is that the condition of Persia would have been far worse without it. As if the state of Persian affairs could be much worse than it is! The Convention has given Russia a correct measure of Sir Edward Grey, his temper, his methods and the strength of his diplomacy. She found an ideal atmosphere for the development of her designs in the recent administration of British Foreign Affairs. She realised that she was an indispensable factor in the balance of power that Sir Edward Grey was endeavouring to set up for check-mating Germany. She, therefore, reaped through British friendship what she could have never expected to achieve in face of British opposition and rivalry. The Trans-Persian railway scheme is designed as the final consummation of the aggressive policy which the Muscovite has pursued for the past few years in the affairs of the Middle East. The freedom of action claimed by the British Government in any scheme prepared by the Committee of Studies sounds plausible enough in theory. It, however, seems a little absurd to suppose that the Committee has resolved to spend £100,000 for the academic luxury of ascertaining the financial and economic possibilities of a railway across Persia. After a heavy outlay in preliminary survey and the formation of a definite financial group backed by Russian diplomacy, the evolution of a workable project is a certainty of the near future. The British Government, in view of "the more serious disadvantages to Indian position," will have to participate. Whatever may be the condition in regard to route, alignment and guarantee, a railway connecting India with the Caucasus will in all probability be built. It would, therefore, be worth while studying the new strategic, political and economic issues that it will bring into prominence in the problems of the Middle East.

It is necessary to bear in mind for a right understanding of the position that the proposal for the construction of the railway has emanated from Russia. Excepting the part of the country north of Ispahan, the proposed route lies through a vast stretch of desert. The whole undertaking, according to very modest estimates, will cost not less than 30 million pounds. As Lord Inchcape said in the House of Lords, the British or Indian section of the proposed railway would run through 920 miles of unfertile, unpopulated and waterless country, and the traffic that it would create would probably be sufficient to fill one truck in a fortnightly train. For an indefinite number of years it would have to be run at a heavy loss, which no sound financier would care to incur without a guarantee. As a purely financial and economic concern the railway would be an utter failure. It is, therefore, easy to conclude that the motive behind the project is mainly strategic and political. Russia holds northern Persia in her grip. The proposed railway would consolidate her power still further and bring the whole country within her sphere under her complete political subjection. What is, however, still more important is the radical change the railway will bring about in the Indian strategic position. By an inevitable process the new situation will result in an enormous accession of weight and influence to Russian diplomacy. The Muscovite will realise his long-cherished dream of dominating India and becoming the arbiter of the destinies of the Middle East.

Not a single politician in England, not even Sir Edward Grey, has been able to defend the proposed railway on the score of Indian strategy. All that has been said in defence is that such a railway was inevitable. Surely, the British Foreign Office must be held responsible for a situation that has entirely grown out of its control and direction. Here is a scheme, involving, as Lord Curzon observed, a more fundamental change in British policy towards India and the defence of India than any event in the history of India since the days of Lord Clive. To quote Lord Curzon again,

If the theories upon which this railway was to be constructed were accepted, all our views had been wrong. They were to be relegated to the limbo of obsolete and mistaken ideas, and we had to accept the opposite theory that the right policy was to open the frontiers on the west, to assist in a proposal which would directly connect India on its most vulnerable side with the outside world, which would destroy the value of Afghanistan as a buffer State (he would like to know the effect which would be produced on the mind of the Ameer, which would span the desert on which we had hitherto relied, which would turn the flank of Quetta and which would provide a route direct from the Russian base to the borders of India. The Russian troops would be brought 1,000 miles nearer to India than they were at the present moment, and Russia would be able to put troops on the Indian frontier before reinforcement sent from England could get to Bombay round the Cape.

Yet the Foreign Secretary can only say that the scheme has got to come some day and confesses in vague and halting words that he is powerless to stop its development. The Persian Government, under the circumstances, will be quite unable to guarantee the security of the line, and naturally enough, Russia will gladly undertake to police the part of the line in her own sphere. The British Government will also adopt similar measures and Indian soldiers will march up from Quetta to stare at the Cossacks across an imaginary line of demarcation. What happened in Manchuria will be repeated in Persia—the railway guards will be the advance posts of the armies of occupation and the country will be divided into real "protectorates" in due course. The attitude of the British Government in regard to the proposal seems to be based on the assumption that the policy of the Triple entente embodies an eternal principle of international relations and that Russia would for ever be a loyal member of the entente. The European situation has undergone tremendous changes during the last 20 years. There has been a constant shifting of the balance of power and the composition of the rival groups. What has so often and with such suddenness happened in the past may easily happen in the future. The only material consequence of the present complacency and indecision will be an enormous increase in the military burdens of India, and the general sense of insecurity will powerfully affect the internal peace and development of the country. The "nationalist" organs of India that have acclaimed the projected railway with more than Russian gusto will have to pay for their mysterious jubilations in groans and tears.

Curiously enough, very few references have been made to the possible effect of the railway on the position of the country in which it would be constructed and by whose guarantees it might be made to work. Lord Morley thinks that the railway would help the Persian Government in establishing ordered administration in the country. But, perhaps, he overlooks another result of the scheme which would render the very existence of the Persian Government a pathetic anachronism. Russia will become a virtual master of the country outside the British sphere and a formal annexation would become a mere question of diplomatic convenience. It is probable that Persia will be forced to furnish necessary guarantees for the railway. A poor helpless country will be dragooned in to paying dividends to the money-grabbing syndicates of Europe. The dumb misery caused by international finance has always been solemnly concealed beneath hollow assurances about "development" and "civilisation" of the countries it sets about to exploit. Persia has already lost her independence and sovereign rights. The big financial operation that is taking shape as the Trans-Persian Railway project will wipe her out of existence as a separate political organism. Russia and England will at last face each other over her prostrate body and decide the issues that the greatest British statesman have striven to avoid for upwards of sixty years. But Russia will have the initial advantage in as much as she would have set her own conditions and chosen her own ground.

The McCormick Case.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you seriously say that you don't know whether you did or did not?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you consider you did your duty as a Magistrate in not noting that?

Witness: Give me Mr. Buchanan's list and I will let you know.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you examine any witnesses that were not on Mr. Buchanan's list?

Witness: For the prosecution: I did not call all the witnesses on the list.

Mr. Hamlyn: You called witnesses who were not on the list?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And some who were on the list you did not call at all.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Some of those witnesses you called on behalf of the prosecution were McCormick's satellites and servants?

Witness: Particularise please?

Mr. Hamlyn: Mr. Clarke.

Witness: Yes, I don't say he was a satellite. He was his servant.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was under McCormick?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was McCormick's witness?

Witness: What do you mean? He was a witness that knew something about the case.

Mr. Hamlyn: About the abduction? And another witness you called for the prosecution was Ma Pe Yin?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Me Sone.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Hajee Rahim.

The Court: Were all these witnesses on the record?

Witness: These witnesses I have just mentioned were not on Mr. Buchanan's list.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Masulam?

Witness: He was not examined.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, Mr. Andrew, if the complainants had had an Advocate in Court, do you think he would have tolerated that procedure?

Witness: I cannot tell you.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, I put it to you, Mr. Andrew, that in disregarding the petition not to try the case you wilfully disobeyed an injunction of law?

Witness: I don't think so. I don't believe that.

Mr. Hamlyn: I go further. I say you wilfully disobeyed this injunction of law, that statutory law, in order to keep the case in your own hands?

Witness: Absolutely false (indignantly.)

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, you conducted the case for the prosecution?

Witness: I assisted the complainants as much as I could in the ordinary way.

Mr. Hamlyn: Impartially and unbiassed?

Witness: Absolutely impartially and unbiassed.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you in a bona fide way considered Clarke a witness for the prosecution?

Witness: He was a witness that could throw light on what had occurred.

Mr. Hamlyn: I will have an answer. Don't foist an answer on me.

Mr. Rutledge objected to this remark.

The Court to Mr. Hamlyn: Don't talk in that fashion about the witness foisting an answer upon you.

Mr. Hamlyn: I am entitled to get an answer to the question I put.

The Court: It is very desirable to avoid heat in a case of this kind.

Mr. Hamlyn: The only heat, Your Worship, I am suffering from is the heat of the Court, I am sorry to say.

Mr. Hamlyn to witness: You say that you examined Clarke on behalf of the prosecution.

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Why did you call him for the prosecution?

Witness: I did not call him.

Mr. Hamlyn: Your Bench Clerk called him?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Why did you call him?

Witness: I called him to throw light on the question whether there had been abduction or not.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you cross-examine him for the prosecution?

Witness referred to the proceedings and then said: No, I asked him no questions. I don't think any were required.

Mr. Hamlyn: "I did not ask him any questions. I did not think any were required." Well, did you ask the complainant to cross-examine him?

Witness: Yes, I did.

Mr. Hamlyn: You did not cross-examine him yourself because you thought it was unnecessary, yet asked the complainant to do so?

Witness: No, I had the deposition read out to the complainant in Malay and asked her if there were any questions she would like to ask.

Mr. Hamlyn: A little girl in the corner of the Court?

Witness: I asked the mother, Fatima.

Mr. Hamlyn: An uneducated ignorant woman? Did you ask her to cross-examine any other witnesses?

Witness: Yes, every one.

Mr. Hamlyn: You asked her after every one. There is nothing on the record to show that?

Witness: I don't think so. It is done as a matter of course.

Mr. Hamlyn: I see that at the end of Clarke's evidence that you apparently did call upon the complainant to cross-examine Clarke?

Witness: Yes, I asked her if she wished to ask any questions.

Mr. Hamlyn: You have got here "Cross examined by complainant. Won't ask any?"

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: You specially made that note after Clarke's evidence?

Witness: I don't remember.

Mr. Hamlyn: Well, you made it. Here it is (handing the proceedings to witness). You saw the dire necessity for this poor woman to have an Advocate?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Clarke's evidence was most damning against the little girl?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And so was Ma Pe Yin's?

Witness: Yes, not so very much.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Me Sone's, the mistress of Clarke?

Witness: I gave her testimony very little credit, except where she was corroborated by others.

Mr. Hamlyn: And McCormick himself took a very prominent part in the proceedings?

Witness: No part whatever.

Mr. Hamlyn: You say he did not cross-examine Aniah?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Why do you put "cross-examined by accused?"

Witness: Accused's Advocate.

Mr. Hamlyn: Why did you not put accused's advocate?

Witness: It is not usual.

Mr. Hamlyn: What was your object in having Mr. Buchanan there?

Witness: I called him there in case he was required to give evidence.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you did not call him to give evidence? His evidence was most material.

Witness: I did not take that view.

Mr. Hamlyn: He was there for the whole of the two days that this enquiry lasted.

Witness: Where?

Mr. Hamlyn: At your head-quarters, Mergui, I take it?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Have you any other headquarters besides Mergui?

Witness: (With a touch of irritability) Why waste time?

Mr. Hamlyn: (With some heat). Did you say "why waste time?" Will you answer my question?

Witness: Than Mergui? No, I must apologise. I wanted to know whether you meant the town of Mergui or the Court house. He was the whole time in Mergui.

Mr. Hamlyn: He must have been away from his headquarters for five or six days on that business?

Witness: He left on a Saturday and went back on a Saturday, a week.

Mr. Hamlyn: Then to take him away from his Sub-division for eight days was a serious thing?

Witness: I thought he might be required by the defence.

Mr. Hamlyn: By the defence you mean McCormick?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And he was not called at all.

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: I notice that with regard to some depositions in your Court that you placed blue pencil marks against them?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: When did you place those marks?

Witness: Most of them before writing my judgment, all of them I should say.

Mr. Hamlyn: Very well, I will take your answer. How many did you put afterwards?

The Court:—Did you say the blue pencil marks were all placed there before writing your judgment?

Witness: Well, I have not seen the marks yet.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do you acknowledge the responsibility for these marks?

Witness: Yes (Examines the pencil marks). Yes, nearly all of these were put in before I wrote my judgment. I cannot tell you which were and which were not. I rather think I made a few recently.

Mr. Hamlyn: What was your object?

Witness: Simply to mark some important places.

Mr. Hamlyn: Important points in your defence?

The Court: The witness is not on his defence.

Mr. Hamlyn: My mistake, Sir. I meant complaint.

The Court: Why did you not correct it then?

Mr. Hamlyn: You examined the accused after the evidence was recorded by you (Counsel reads from the proceedings): "Aniah says this—'I slept in the dining room all night and next morning Captain McCormick came downstairs and I said I must go home. The Captain said I must not go home. He then carried me upstairs and had intercourse with me. This was early in the morning. He took me in the room and had intercourse with me and I cried.'" This is rather a serious statement against Captain McCormick, is it not, Mr. Andrew?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Will you kindly explain the meaning of that tick next to that evidence (Proceedings handed to witness.) You see in the margin a tick?

Witness: I cannot explain it. I don't know how it came there.

Mr. Hamlyn: You say you did not put it, then it follows that someone else put it there?

Witness: No, I don't. I may have put it there.

Mr. Hamlyn: Is it your habit to tick passages?

Witness: I very seldom tick, I generally underline.

Mr. Hamlyn: Well, you did not make those ticks?

Witness: No. Because I am not certain. I may have done so.

Mr. Hamlyn: I see another passage ticked. "He gave me red medicine immediately after having had intercourse with me upstairs." Did you tick that?

Witness: I don't know how it came there.

Mr. Hamlyn: Those are very serious statements against McCormick?

(To be continued.)

Morocco.

News of the Week.

Mulai Hafid arrived in the cruiser Duchayla at Gibraltar on August 13th, where he re-embarked in the Macedonia en route for Marseilles. He transhipped on board the British steamer to avoid the appearance of being a French prisoner. His harem has arrived at Tangier.

The French newspapers say the abdication will take the form of a letter to President Fallieres. Mulai Hafid will receive an annuity of £15,000.

Reuter wires from Rabat:—Mulai Yusef, in whose favour Mulai Hafid has abdicated, was proclaimed Sultan on August 14th. Numerous salutes were fired. The inhabitants of the city, however, appeared to take little interest in the proceedings.

REUTER wires to London:—Mulai Hafid has abdicated in favour of his brother Mulai Yusef on 12th August. He will go to Vichy for his health and will probably make a pilgrimage to Mecca before taking up his residence at Tangiers.

The French in Morocco.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

SOME of the Parisian newspapers hitherto glibly optimistic as to the prospects of a speedy solution of the Morocco trouble seem to be waking up to the fact that France has begun a task far heavier than was originally calculated. One need not have any sympathy with the party politics of M. Jaurès to recognise that he has profoundly studied both the practical and ethical sides of foreign intervention in the affairs of this unhappy country, and that the conclusions he draws, however distasteful to the Partie Coloniale, are instinct with justice and commonsense. Such at least is the opinion of Morocco, which ought to know something of her own business.

We are now face to face with a new situation, the most grave in the modern history of the Empire. Mulai Hafid has handed over his country to France on the transparent pretext of a need for protection. The Moors, almost to a man, say, "We don't want your protection," and Morocco is prepared to fight on this issue. France's dilemma is obvious. She must either sacrifice her prestige by abandoning the treaty or crush Morocco.

In the course of conversation with one of the leading members of the local Ulema I noted down the following statement, which was made in reply to various questions on the burning topic of the day. "From our point of view," said this thoroughly qualified authority on Moslem law, "the Protectorate treaty is absolutely invalid, both on the ground of traditional Muhammadan Government and according to the precepts laid down for us by God in the Koran. No Sultan has the power to sell his country without the consent of his people, the people being represented by the tribes and cities which pay taxes, by the men who fight to keep order in the land, and by the great religious confraternities of which the Ulema are the mouthpiece. By whom is the monarch placed on his throne, whether he be Christian King or Moorish Sultan? By God and the nation. Can he reign save by the will of Heaven and his people? I see you have no answer to offer.

"Mulai Hafid was cajoled by the French into signing that treaty, knowing, as he must have known, that it was hateful to the nation. Then he declared his intention of abdicating, realising that a higher power had already condemned him. Protection? Against what, pray? Our little troubles with Spain are easily settled, either by a fight or by peaceful means. Germany is friendly to us, England equally so. The only nation against which we need protection is France. As for the Protectorate treaty, it is an accursed thing, and if Allah decrees that for our sins we must choose between French domination and extermination most of us will accept the latter doom. Paradise rather than hell! Jinna wala jehenama."

So, certain that death in holy war secures immediate admittance to the realms of eternal beatitude, the greater part of Morocco is prepared to fight, if need be, to the knife. The utterances of my Ulema friend may be taken, I think, to voice the views and feeling of the vast mass of his fellow countrymen. Indeed one sees evidences of the anti-Protectorate passion on every hand among all the big tribes and in all the cities. It has given el-Hiba his great chance of floating up to a throne, if it be only as Sultan of a resuscitated Sus al Akssa, the southern half of the ancient Moorish Empire, with a capital at Tarudant or Marrakesh, and dominions stretching towards the centre of the Sahara. It has given us a new Pretender in the Riff country, who possibly draws his munitions of war from the Spanish zone. The central provinces, such as Tedla, are openly and defiantly anti-French and anti-Makhzen. Marrakesh, the highland clans of the Great Atlas range, and the whole of Sus are the same. That poor Mulai Hafid realises the situation created by his complacent acceptance of the French policy is emphasised by his flight to Rabat.

One hardly knows whether to congratulate or to condole with France on the state of things which her policy of "pacification" has brought about. But as a highly intelligent Parisian remarked the other day: "In quitting Agadir Germany made us a pretty present, a gift which will cost us dear." It seems almost superfluous to add that the political ferment is disastrous to trade, especially in this district. Mogador depending almost entirely on the Sus provinces for its commercial life, and the traffic with that region being virtually suspended owing to Kaid Giluli having joined the anti-Makhzen movement.

Nationalist Movement in Morocco.

DESPITE minor discrepancies in the reports which filter through from the interior, one fact stands out clearly. The whole of the country is firmly, one may say furiously, hostile to the proposed French Protectorate. Whatever one's sympathies may be, there is no getting away from this fact, which neither France nor England can wisely ignore, seeing that on this issue the people of Morocco have the heartfelt support, moral if not yet material, of the whole Moslem world. Evidence of this comes from Algeria, Tunis, Tripoli, Egypt and Turkey, and from regions further east, not to speak of the Moroccan, Sudan and Central Africa, where the word has passed through the great Mahometan settlements that "Islam's only foe is France."

How this spirit is working to-day inside Morocco may be judged from recent happenings in and near Marrakesh, the southern capital, and in the southern provinces known collectively as the Soos (Sus) country. At Marrakesh itself Kaid Mtooki (or Mtugi), hereditary governor of Mtooka, the largest of the Great Atlas clans, or rather combinations of clans, seems to have made himself master of the situation on the popular cry "Morocco for the Moors," his principal rivals having lost all prestige among their own people by yielding to the promise of foreign protection, which just now is anathema. In looking forward to the events that are likely in the very near future it would be absurd to offer any definite prediction, so much hangs on a few ifs. But it is generally believed by well-informed observers that if the Marrakesh artillery be in good condition, with a fair stock of ammunition, under the handling of some smart Turkish or other European gunners who are said to be in his service, Mtooki will be able to offer a respectable resistance to the small expeditionary force which can be spared from General Lyautey's army for the intended occupation of the southern capital.

Further south, beyond the Atlas range, we have the mysterious Prophet of the Sahara, Moolai Hamed el-Hiba, advancing on Tarudant with his gigantic camel corps of "holy warriors," bent on the expulsion of the French from Moslem soil and the establishment of a new and saintly dynasty in place of the decrepit monarchy represented by the wholly discredited Moolai Hafid.

Persia.

News of the Week.

As proof of the disturbed state of the Bushire-Shiraz Road it may be mentioned that the telegraph lines between these towns have been interrupted this week. Communication between Shiraz and Teheran was, however, maintained.

Reuter learns on 10th August that Great Britain has agreed to make a further loan to Persia to assist the Persian Government to deal more effectively with the situation in the South.

The British advance to Persia is to enable Kavam-el-Mulk, Vice-Governor of Shiraz, to equip an expedition against Saulat-ed-Dauleh, who recently routed the gendarmerie, commanded by Swedish Officers.

Aprphas of the loan to Persia, it is stated in a Simla Report on 10th August, that the Teheran Government has been making efforts to secure six million pounds in the foreign market, guaranteed both by the British and Russian Governments, of which two millions were advanced some time ago, and representatives of the Persian Government in Europe are doing their best to secure the balance of the loan, which it is stated will be devoted to carrying out urgent reforms, including the re-organisation of the Gendarmerie. It is not known whether further advances have been secured.

Sir Davood Khan, Persian Consul-General, writes as follows:— "My attention has been drawn to the interview with regard to the present condition of affairs in Persia, and especially about the loan which it is expected to arrange with Great Britain and Russia, there being no question of raising it within Persia itself or otherwise. What I meant was that the Persian Government, as always, was most desirous of carrying out the measures of reform which would make for the peace and progress of the country, and the loan that the Persian Government desired was primarily to accomplish that purpose and therefore justify Great Britain and Russia in lending the money requisite to ensure good government and consequently bring about the beneficial conditions necessary."

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on 8th August:—Turkey proposes a mixed commission to settle the frontier dispute. Montenegro has accepted. Russia has hinted to Montenegro the expediency of avoiding a rupture.

The Porte on 9th August instructed its Minister at Cetinje who has gone to Cattaro to return to his post.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 10th August:—The Porte, replying to the vigorous remonstrances of Bulgaria, has promised a vigorous inquiry into the Kochana incident and the punishment of the guilty.

Reuter learns that Great Britain and Russia, through their representatives at Constantinople and Cetinje, used their good offices with Turkey and Montenegro to avert a conflict.

Reuter wires from Sofia on 11th August:—Excitement over the Kochana massacre continues, the press threatening and clamouring for war. There is a warlike agitation in Southern Bulgaria and meetings are being organised.

The Albanians have presented thirteen demands to the Government including restoration of arms, construction of roads, educational reform, assistance to agriculture and application of the revenues to local purposes. It is expected that the Government will accept.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on 11th August:—Fighting has been resumed between Turks and Montenegrins on the frontier. The former have been reinforced.

Reuter wires from Hodeida on 12th August:—The Italian cruisers Piemonte and Arctusa shelled the military building and camp outside the town throughout the day of 26th July. Two magazines exploded causing a conflagration which lasted two days. The damage is estimated at a hundred thousand pounds sterling. The casualties were three killed and five wounded.

Seismographs in England marked early in the morning of 9th August that a great earthquake had occurred in the east of Europe. The needle was displaced nine inches.

News has arrived in London of a prolonged earthquake in Constantinople and the vicinity. There is at present no news of any damage, although there was a sharp panic.

Reuter wires from Constantinople later on 9th August:—An earthquake was felt over the whole country between Constantinople and Adrianople. The centre of the disturbance is apparently the Dardanelles where the shock lasted thirty seconds. There is scarcely a building in Gallipoli or Tchanak, untouched. The Greek Church and mosque at Tchanak were destroyed.

The steamers report that the lighthouses at Ganos and Nora have disappeared. The villages adjacent are in flames.

The warships in the Dardanelles thought there was an attack by torpedo boats.

The fugitives report that in the village of Hora eighty were killed and 300 injured and in Myriophito 300 killed and 600 wounded. The former was destroyed. The latter and many others are in flames. Two villages were engulfed.

A lamp which was overturned by the earthquake shock caused a conflagration at Chorlu, on the Adrianople railway. Three hundred houses were destroyed. The earthquake shock was most severe on the south shores of the Sea of Marmora. The telegraphs through the Dardanelles are interrupted, but the Greek Vice-Consul sent a wireless message to his Consulate stating that several villages had been destroyed and that there had been many victims.

There was a fresh slight shock at Constantinople on 10th August.

Steamers from the Sea of Marmora report destruction of life and property in the villages of Herakliitta, Peristasis, Miriophilo, Hora, and others. Two, of which the names are not given, were destroyed by fire and the inhabitants are without homes, food, or water. A steamer and a torpedo boat have been despatched with provisions and medical stores.

Reuter wires from Paris on 11th August:—The Constantinople newspapers give the number of those killed in the earthquake disaster at a thousand and that of the injured at from five to six thousand.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 11th August:—The latest estimate of the killed and injured places the number at twelve hundred throughout the whole area. The shock was also felt at Smyrna but no damage was done. Fifteen thousand are homeless in the whole south-western part of the Vilayet of Adrianople which was the greatest sufferer from the earthquake. A thousand refugees have been admitted to hospital in Constantinople. Twenty mosques and other public buildings have been partially destroyed in the town of Adrianople.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—Three further earthquake shocks were experienced in Gallipoli on 12th August. The hotel was destroyed by fire.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 12th August:—The loss of life and destruction caused by the earthquake is more serious than was believed at first. The distress is intense. Whole families are stated to have perished either by the earthquake or by fire. The British Seamen's Hospital has sent stores and the Embassies have ordered the use of guardships to convey supplies.

Reuter wires from Sofia on August 13th:—A demonstration was held yesterday to protest against the Kochana massacre. The demonstrators marched in procession carrying black flags. Church bells were tolled and the shops were shut. A resolution was passed demanding that the Government should do its utmost to deliver the Macedonian Bulgarians from the Turkish yoke.

Fahreddin Bey has been appointed Turkish Minister at Cetinje.

Informal conversations have been taking place in Switzerland for some time in the hope of finding a basis of settlement for the Turco-Italian War. Nothing concrete has hitherto been achieved, but there is a general feeling of optimism and the end of the War may not be remote.

It is hoped that M. Poincaré's visit to St. Petersburg may contribute to the discovery of a formula acceptable to both sides.

According to the latest information received in London on August 14th, 791 persons were killed in the Turkish earthquake and 3,681 houses destroyed.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Constantinople, July 21.

An official telegram gives the following particulars of the torpedo attack on the Dardanelles:—"The vessels were able to get eight miles inside the Straits, and were first detected by a searchlight on the Turkish destroyer Kutahia, which immediately opened fire. Off Baikush-tepe the vessels, eight in number, came under the cross fire of the forts, and two were seen to sink, one plunging head first under the waters. Before reaching the Soghan-deré fort the Italians were compelled to turn tail. The commander of the fort sighted only five torpedo-boats, but confirms the disappearance of two of them. A lifebelt has been picked up to-day bearing the name Galibetia."

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, July 21.

An official announcement published here says:—"At midnight on Thursday a squadron, composed of the torpedo-boats Sepia Centauro, Astore, Climene, and Persco, succeeded in entering the mouth of the Dardanelles. The Astore, which was the last in the line, was discovered shortly afterwards, and the batteries on both shores immediately opened fire upon it. The squadron was continually exposed to the glare of about twelve searchlights. In spite of this, however, it boldly continued on its course.

"When the squadron had reached a point near Kilid-i-Bahr, the enemy's fire meanwhile continually becoming more severe, the Sepia, which was leading, struck a steel cable. After freeing herself from this she continued her course, but immediately ran into another cable. She succeeded in getting past this also. Beyond Kilid-i-Bahr there was a stretch of water strongly illuminated by searchlights, and our ships were subjected to a well-maintained fire, both from their land batteries and their warships. The intercrossing of the searchlights rendered it impossible to identify their ships and equally so to ascertain their approximate position. In these circumstances the commander deemed it useless to attempt an attack on the fleet, which would certainly have involved losses to most of our torpedo-boats, and considering also that he had fully succeeded in achieving the object of his reconnaissance he ordered the flotilla to return. The fire of the Turkish batteries, which had by now become more heavy, was continued until the squadron reached Cape Helle. Our torpedo-boats sustained merely trifling damage."

Dardanelles, July 21.

Sounding operations were begun to-day to locate the wreckage, but nothing was found save a lifebuoy bearing the word Climene.

The Climene is the name of one of the Italian torpedo-boats.

Vienna, July 21.

An impression decidedly unfavourable to Italy has been created here by the tardy Italian confirmation of the Turkish reports of an attack upon the Dardanelles. The military value of the attack or reconnaissance is not discussed, since it may bear some relation to ulterior Italian designs, but the contradiction between the first Italian denials and the subsequent confirmation of the Turkish reports is felt to require more adequate explanation than has yet been furnished.

Hodeida (via Aden), July 6.

The capture of the Farzan Islands by partisans of Seyyid Idrisi assisted by Italian warships is officially admitted. The Turkish garrison, 200 strong, and the civil officials were made prisoners and removed to Midi. Several guns and large quantities of munitions were taken by the insurgents.

Constantinople, July 25.

Uproarious scenes were witnessed in the Chamber to-day when the President read a letter bearing the seal of the Military League ordering him to retire and to dissolve the Chamber within 48 hours. Great excitement ensued and the Chamber asked for explanations from the Government. Nazim Pasha and the President on behalf of the Cabinet, said the Government would endeavour to discover and punish the authors of the letter. The Chamber accepted the Government's explanations and is awaiting a fulfilment of its promise.

The text of the letter was as follows:—"Your evil labours in the Committee and in Parliament have already done much harm. The officers of the League have learned of the bad advice you attempted to give the Sovereign. Unwilling to stain their hands with your soiled blood, we warn you that the army and the people demand the dissolution of the Chamber or, rather, of the theatre. Finally, failing compliance with this demand within 48 hours, we will do what is needed. It is unnecessary for us to address ourselves directly to the deputies, who are without worth or dignity." A scene of uproar followed the reading. Many deputies made speeches declaring that they were determined to remain at the posts to which they had been elected by the nation until they were removed at the point of the bayonet. Some said "Accursed be the authors of the letter. Such men are unworthy to belong to the glorious Ottoman army. They are too cowardly to sign their names to the document." Haladjian Effendi, in particular, distinguished himself by the violence of his abusive language.

Constantinople, July 23.

Ghazi Mukhtar Pasha, in his capacity as acting Minister of the Interior pending the arrival of Ferid Pasha, informed the Commandants of the Constantinople Police and Gendarmerie last night that they had been relieved of their functions. The intimation was conveyed by some 50 officers, one of whom, Colonel Yussuf Razi Bey, has been appointed in their place Commandant of both forces. The district commissioners of police were then summoned by telephone to headquarters, where a number of them were informed that the Government had ceased to require their services. They were relieved by military officers who for the present have taken over the administration of public security in the capital.

Despite, or in consequence of these measures, which were followed by the appointment of Colonel Assaf Bey as Commandant of the Constantinople garrison in place of Shehab-ed-Din Bey, Constitution Day has so far passed quietly, though the populace, fearing some incident, abstained from attending the annual review on the Hill of Liberty, where only a few hundred spectators witnessed Nazim Pasha take the salute.

Later in the morning an excellent impression was caused by the promulgation of an Imperial Iradeh announcing the abolition of Martial Law in Constantinople and the suburbs. The Council of Ministers was engaged last night in the discussion of a scheme for a general amnesty by a prompt settlement of the Albanian question by the withdrawal of the troops from the hill districts and the despatch of a commission under the presidency of the Albanian Senator Reshid Akif Pasha to confer with the insurgents, who, according to the latest reports, are fraternizing with some of the Kosovo garrisons.

Constantinople, July 23.

The Grand Vizier has addressed the following circular to the provinces:—"The officials are urged as their fundamental duty to safeguard effectually the provisions of the Constitutional charter, to enforce properly the other laws and regulations, to maintain order and tranquillity, to consolidate union by guaranteeing justice and equality to the whole population, to facilitate all applications to the Government, and assure all the inhabitants of the inviolability of their persons and rights."

To-day, the anniversary of the establishment of the Constitution, the town was gay with bunting. This morning a review of troops was held on the Hill of Liberty, the Sultan being represented by his chief aide-de-camp, Salih Pasha.

Constantinople, July 20.

Another Aeroplane for the Army has just arrived, and two more are said to be shortly expected. The first group of officers sent to France to study aviation have returned here, and it is now stated that others will be sent to England for the same purpose.

The 45 kilometers of line built by the Oriental Railway Company, prolonging its Baba-Eski branch line to Kirk-Killissé, was inaugurated yesterday by representatives of the Government and the Railway Company.

The Chamber of Deputies and the Senate have adopted, with little modification, a Bill presented by the Minister of Finance establishing certain war taxes.

The Chamber has also voted a law according a six months' moratorium to the Commercial Community of Damascus, victims of the recent conflagration in that city.

The Ministry of Public Works has approved the plans of the Baghdad Railway Company for the construction of this port, and the work will be put in hand at once.

The Treasury receipts for the financial year ended 13th March 1912, are given in an official publication, just issued, as £T30,374,119, compared with £T28,339,170 during the preceding year, and they exceed the budgetary provisions by £T2,618,377. The Customs receipts amount to £T4,696,614, and exceed those of the previous year by £T133,423. The steady growth in the Treasury receipts will be seen in the following table:—

1323—1907-8	£T23,914,268
1324—1908-9	£T25,175,818
1325—1909-10	£T26,986,406
1326—1910-11	£T28,339,170
1327—1911-12	£T30,374,119

The pourparlers between the Turkish Government and the French financial syndicate with reference to the construction of railways in the Black Sea regions of Asia Minor have for some time been at a standstill. The reason for this is that the Russian Government raised objections to the plan under which the railways were to be built nominally by Turkey, but in reality with the help of capital raised by a French financial syndicate. The Russians allege that this would constitute a circumvention of the agreement between Russia and Turkey according to which the former should have a preferential right to the construction of the railways in question, should the Turkish Government not themselves undertake the work. The Deutsche Orient-Korrespondenz now learns from Paris that one of the tasks before the French Premier, M. Poincaré, on his approaching visit to St. Petersburg will consist in obtaining the withdrawal of the Russian pretensions and in arriving at the assurance that no objections will be raised by Russia to the construction of the lines with the help of French finance.

The new Ministry has decided that telegrams and other communications addressed to the Sultan shall be immediately submitted to His Majesty. Hitherto such has not been the case and telegrams addressed to the Sovereign by the provincial armies never reached His Majesty.

The new Cabinet has further decided upon the suppression of all the provisional laws, including that concerning the liberty of the Press, sanctioned by Imperial Iradeh and brought into operation before Parliament assembled.

Salonica, July 23.

A proclamation has been addressed to the population of Northern Albania from the Sultan, in which he forbids the shedding of blood between frères fideles when a question affecting the existence of the Empire is not involved. The Albanians are therefore requested not to provoke punitive action by the army. The Sultan promises a Cabinet composed of practical, impartial, and influential statesmen who will be charged to act justly towards Albanian claims. The officers are requested to leave politics alone and to occupy themselves with the defence of the Fatherland. The Albanians have also received a reply to their telegraphic protest to the effect that the desired Parliamentary Commission is in process of formation and will leave without delay.

News from Albania has much improved. Not a shot has been fired since the appointment of the new Cabinet. To-day the rebels' leaders assembled at Prishtina and telegraphed their congratulations to the Ministers of War and Justice and the Grand Vizier.

The New Turkish Cabinet.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 22.

THE appointment of Mukhtar as Grand Vizier and the end which has thereby been made of a period highly charged with uncertainty have caused a general feeling of relief in Constantinople. The apprehension with which the recurrence to-morrow of the anniversary of the Constitution is regarded is disappearing. It is in fact not improbable that the proximity of this festival with the opportunities which it might afford to manifestations of hostile sentiments was a powerful factor in hastening the solution of the crisis. The composition of the Cabinet so far is as follows:—

Ghazi Mukhtar Pasha, Grand Vizier; Djemal-ed-din Effendi, Sheikh-ul-Islam; Nazim Pasha, Minister of War; Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha, Minister of Marine; Zia Bey, Minister of Finance; Gabriel Effendi Nuradunghian, Minister for Foreign Affairs; Hilmi Pasha, Minister of Justice; Kiamil Pasha, President of the Council; Ferid Pasha, Minister of the Interior; Mehmed Feizi Pasha, Minister of Evkaf; Said Bey, Minister of Public Instruction.

The Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs has been abolished, once more becoming merely a department.

The names of the new Ministers indicate that the Cabinet is one that fulfils the desire of the Sultan as expressed in his recent proclamation that it should be formed of "persons possessing a wide knowledge of affairs of State." It includes three ex-Grand Viziers—the veteran Kiamil, Hussein Hilmi, of Macedonian fame, and Ferid, whose inclusion in his quality of Albanian should considerably facilitate a satisfactory solution of the Albanian difficulty.

The new Grand Vizier's reputation is that of a soldier rather than of a politician. His successful generalship in the Russo-Turkish War brought him great popularity in the Army, in consequence of which and his liberal ideas he was practically exiled to Egypt as High Commissioner by Abdul Hamid. Doubtless the respect which his name still enjoys in military circles has been a potent factor in determining his choice as head of the new Government. On the proclamation of the Constitution he returned to Turkey and became a member of the Senate, of which body he has latterly been President.

With his appointment as Sheikh-ul-Islam Djemal-ed-din, who is a Liberal and a member of the Opposition, returns to an office which he held for many years under the old régime.

The new War Minister, who is believed to have accepted office without making conditions, is likewise a Liberal and member of the Opposition and enjoys the esteem of the Army. After a period of exile at Erzerum under Abdul Hamid he returned at the beginning of the new régime to be Commander of the 2nd Army Corps at Adrianople. A few days before Kiamil Pasha's fall he was appointed War Minister, and after a period as Governor of Baghdad has latterly been President of the Army Council.

Mahmud Mukhtar returns as Minister of Marine to the office he held in Hakkı Pasha's Cabinet, in which he did good work.

Nuradunghian Effendi, who has previously been Minister of Public Works, has been looked upon for some time as probable Foreign Minister in a moderate Cabinet in the event of Kiamil's not accepting the post.

With regard to the programme of the new Government, nothing is yet known definitely, but it is clear from the letter addressed to Mukhtar Pasha on his appointment as Grand Vizier that the Albanian question will be one of the first subjects which will be considered. In view of the fact that the treatment of this question by the late Cabinet was one of the principal causes which led to its ultimate fall it is natural that this should be so. "Since in certain localities, and especially in Albania, there exist discontent, difficulties, and complaints, the Government will have to inquire into the best procedure to follow, so that this illegal and unjust state of things may cease, while taking legal measures to reassure public opinion" is the text of the Imperial document.

The Ministry has been completed by the appointment of Damad Sherif Pasha and Reshid Pasha, ex-Ambassador in Vienna, as Ministers of Public Works and of Mines and Forests respectively.

General satisfaction is expressed at the appointment of Nazim Pasha to the Ministry of War. The remarkable influence of this sturdy soldier over the rank and file was never better manifested than during the period between 13th and 23rd April, 1909, when his appeals to the mutinous soldiery saved Constantinople from plunder, if not worse, while the energy shown by him at Adrianople in the preceding year made him a popular figure in the commissioned ranks. He had a splendid reception at the War Office yesterday, and was heartily cheered by the crowds on his way to the Palace to-day.

It is impossible to say that the period of internal tension is yet over, though the appointment of a Ministry composed of elder statesmen, several of whom enjoy the confidence of the great mass of the people, has undeniably had a calming effect.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 21.

A significant article in the Tanin to-day emphasises the importance of the Chamber in the present crisis. "The only rock of salvation during the tempest," says the journal, "is the Chamber, which represents legality. Illegal forces may triumph for a few days, as during the period of the mutiny in 1909, but in the end the Chamber must prevail. The dissolution of the Chamber would be a crime and a dastardly outrage on the Constitution. Those attempting to violate the Constitution are in danger of death at every step. Let deputies ignore the threats contained in the anonymous letters which they receive and remain firm, for the collapse of the Chamber would mean the loss of the last bulwarks against anarchy."

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The well-informed Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung gives the following account of the last moments of Said Pasha's Cabinet:—"The farce of yesterday's sitting of the Chamber, with its overwhelming majority in favour of the Government, has had no effect here. Its object was to demonstrate to the easily impressionable monarch that in the light of the large following of the Government he had acted unconstitutionally in requesting the Cabinet to resign. Thereupon the Cabinet made the last attempt to save itself by offering the portfolio of war to Mahmud Mukhtar, but at the last moment certain complications set in which prevented the scheme from being carried out.

"Even with the help of Mukhtar Pasha the Cabinet could only have lived for a few days more, as the Officers' League was determined not to yield a single inch. When demanding in the form of an ultimatum the resignation of Mahmud Shevket the League allowed Said Pasha's Cabinet ten days' grace to wind up its affairs. Yesterday was the last day of the term. The commander of the division at Djakova, as well as the commander of the First Division, just arrived from Constantinople, decided to make peace with the Albanians on their own account. They informed the commander of the Mitrovitsa Division of their decision, and he at once agreed with them. The officers of the three divisions thereupon telegraphed to the Sultan informing him of what had been done, and insisting upon the resignation of the Cabinet and the dissolution of the Young Turkish Committee. On the Palace inquiring who these officers were, more than two hundred officers sent in their names. The Constantinople authorities communicated with the commanders of the Uskub and Adrianople corps, but both could only confirm the information that the situation was untenable, and warned the Government that they would not be able to prevent the march on Constantinople if it took place. The military machine thus broke down in the hands of the Government, and if the worst was to be prevented the Cabinet had to withdraw."

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 24.

The effect of the accession to power of the new Cabinet is making itself felt in various directions. A more pacific spirit is manifested in Albania and nearer home. Salutary changes have been made in the personnel of the various Ministries, especially the War Ministry, while Hilmi, the new Minister of Justice, has given assurances that he will do all in his power to content the different nationalities of the Empire. The organ of the Entente Libérale will reappear to-morrow.

At present there is no sign of attempts at retaliation on the part of the extremist elements, but as a precautionary measure the place of the police on duty at Sirkedji Station and along the quays has been taken by soldiers. It is known that fiery speeches were recently delivered to the guilds of porters and lightermen by Omar Nadji Bey on behalf of the Committee, and it is presumably to overawe those who may have been impressed by his eloquence that the step has been taken.

In reply to telegrams addressed by provincial branches of the Committee of Union and Progress asking for instructions as to the attitude to be observed towards the new Cabinet, the central organization has stated that the party will support the Ministry if the programme conforms thereto in essentials, notably in regard to the maintenance of the principle of centralization. The reply clearly indicates a real or fictitious fear on the part of the Committee of Union and Progress that the Government reforms in Albania go too far in the direction of local autonomy, which is anathema to the centralizers of the Committee.

Vienna, July 24.

Austrian official telegrams from Turkey are being unaccountably delayed in transmission, some of them requiring as long as 34 hours to arrive from Constantinople. The measures taken by the Ghazi Mukhtar Cabinet to prevent further bloodshed in Albania are welcomed here, as are also the abrogation of the state of siege at Constantinople and the granting of an amnesty. The choice of Nuradunghian Effendi to be Foreign Minister is thought significant, inasmuch as he who signed the annexation convention with Austria-Hungary, may possibly have been selected, as a Christian, to sign with Italy a treaty of peace to which no Mussalman statesman would willingly append his name.

The semi-official view of the internal position of Turkey is expressed in the Pester Lloyd, which remarks that, just as the revolution of 1908 showed that Turkey was anxious not to die, so the task of this new régime must be to prove at the twelfth hour that Turkey is still able to live.

Berlin, July 25.

A Berlin telegram to the Cologne Gazette to-night says:—As far as the political estimate of the Turkish Cabinet is concerned, it will no doubt be possible to describe it as conservative and Anglophile, particularly as regards the personality of Kiamil. When, however, this circumstance is construed in various quarters as one of disadvantage for Germany that is a presentation of the facts which is devoid of real justification, inasmuch as German policy at the Golden Horn is in no wise in opposition to that of England, least of all in the question of peace; so that there is not the smallest reason to regard a movement among responsible Turkish statesmen in favour of England as damaging or disagreeable to us.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Sir Edwin Pears, speaking at a luncheon given by the Council of the Eastern Question Association, in the Whitehall Rooms, London, to celebrate the anniversary of the Turkish Revolution, said it was only fair to give the revolutionary party credit for the excellent results which they had brought about. After dwelling upon some of the blunders committed by the Young Turks, he said that in the place of a Government of doctrinaire Ministers, nearly all of whom were without experience, Turkey had now obtained a Ministry which was the best, the most accomplished, and the most respectable that the country had seen for the last 40 years. He hoped and believed that under the new Government there was going to be peace. There were now two alternatives before Ministers. If they dissolved Parliament and appealed to the country, he thought that they would get an overwhelming free vote. The second alternative was to advise the Sultan to suspend the Constitution. This, he was convinced, would be an unfortunate step.

Telegrams received from the Northern Albanian towns on 24th July report that the news of the appointment of the new Ministry has had a most excellent effect. The insurgents who have lately been massing in the Prishtina and Prizrend districts have agreed to a suspension of hostilities, and the markets are being reopened at all the chief centres.

A commission of Albanian notables is about to leave for the Kosovo province. It is composed of Reshid Akil Pasha and Suleiman Pasha, formerly Military Commandant of Mitrovitza, both Senators, and Ali Danish Bey, ex-Governor of Salonica and Deputy for Prishtina.

(LATER.)

Representatives from all parts of Albania are concentrating at Prishtina in great numbers with the intention of holding the conference previously reported. I understand that the authorities will endeavour to prevent the reunion by force of arms if necessary.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 23 (3.30 p.m.).

Not only the Independent Press, but even the Union and Progress journals, such as the Haqq and the Janî Turc, accord a good reception to the new Cabinet, expressing the hope that it will succeed in warding off the dangers of the present moment. The Tanin, by the pen of Babanzade Hakkî Bey, stands alone in formulating reservations. It admits that it would be opportune to support the new Cabinet, but only on the condition that it shows that it is not a "cabinet of hatred and vengeance," and does not make a radical departure from the programme of the party of Union and Progress.

This attitude is an exact reflection of the currents of opinion in the Unionist majority in Parliament. Certain deputies declare that it is a patriotic duty to support the Cabinet, while others express the view that only a few days after having given a vote of confidence to a Cabinet of diametrically opposed tendency, they cannot support the new Ministry without dishonouring themselves in the eyes of the whole world.

In diplomatic circles it is persistently thought that the second current of opinion will prevail.

Two new Ministerial nominations are announced that of Damad Cherif Pasha to the Ministry of Public Works, and that of Rechid Pasha, former Ambassador in Vienna, to the Ministry of Agriculture, from which Aristidi Pasha withdraws.

At a Council of Ministers, which sat until a very late hour last night, it was decided to raise the state of siege in Constantinople and to prepare a decree of general amnesty for the political delinquents who were condemned to exile by the court-martial. It was also decided to cease military action against the Albanian insurgents and to send to Albania a commission of inquiry and conciliation under the presidency of Rechid Aakif Pasha.

It is officially announced that the chief of police has resigned, and been replaced by an officer of the General Staff, Major Raissih Bey. All the police commissaries of the district will be dismissed, and provisionally replaced by officers.

The city is decorated with flags for the fête of 23rd July, and there is no abnormal excitement.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

At the end of a long article, written before the Cabinet crisis, detailing the demands of the opponents of the Young Turkish régime, M. Georges Gaulis, the Constantinople correspondent of the Journal des Débats, who is a close observer of Turkish political life, says:—"What is remarkable in this political action of the military is that if it is directed against somebody it is not directed in favour of anybody. In the poverty of personalities from which Turkey suffers the officers do not seem to have fixed their choice upon anybody who could represent their aspirations at the head of the Government. If the Cabinet of Said Pasha falls, it may well be that Kiamil Pasha will come back with his retinue. It will then be a singular irony to see the same man brought back by the officers whom the officers deposed in 1909. It is a sort of fatality which binds the fate of Turkey with the two Viziers so are often succeeded one another under Abdul Hamid, in virtue of some natural balance of power.

"The East remains still attached to its patriarchal traditions. The prestige of age is very considerable there. Thus, one of the grievances felt against certain Ministers is that they are exceedingly young. They have acted and worked and run all the risks of an active career. Yet the Grand Vizier, who is responsible for the policy of the Cabinet, has not incurred very great reproaches. Nobody seems to think that this Government, which has done so little fruitful work, has been directed by a man who for thirty years had no other concern but to obtain and to keep the favour of his sovereign. Has he ever thought of anything else than of sticking to office, since the new régime, in a singular paradoxical spirit, confided to him its destinies? These latter could not have been placed in hands more experienced in conjuring away difficulties for the sake of a philosophy of power that is purely negative. In the course of his government he has not checked anything that was youthfully imprudent or inexperienced; he discouraged, however, much that was inspired by a spirit of reform and organisation. And yet it is not he who is being called upon to account for the inertness of the Government."

("PRESS ASSOCIATION," FOREIGN SPECIAL.)

Constantinople, July 23.

I had an interview to-day with Husein Hilmi Pasha, the new Minister of Justice, who said that the new Government had determined to act strictly within constitutional and legal limits. It would not attempt to rectify the illegalities of the late Government by fresh illegalities, but would solve them by constitutional means. They had not yet had time to draw up a programme, and consequently would not present themselves to the Chamber for a day or two, but would immediately do whatever it was in their power to do administratively. Thus the suspension of the state of siege had been ordered without delay, but a legislative measure would be necessary for the grant of an amnesty. The Sultan could pardon the exiles and political prisoners, but only an amnesty could restore to them the full exercise of civil rights. The Government was anxious to restore the bonds of fraternity uniting the various elements of the nation.

In regard to the question of the dissolution of the Chamber the Government was also determined to act legally. Any illegalities in the matter of the election of individual deputies would be investigated, but no general measure such as a dissolution was contemplated. Of course, in the event of a conflict with the Chamber the Government would have a legal weapon in its hands. It is the intention of the Government to repeal all the illegal measures of its predecessors, such as the press law and the law against public meetings. They believed in the wisdom of granting the fullest liberty of speech and of the press. If the country was unfit for the free expression of opinion, it was also unfit for a Constitution.

The Sultan's Proclamation.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 19.

AFTER the selamlık to-day a proclamation was read to the Turkish troops on behalf of the Sultan as Commander-in-Chief of the land and sea forces. The following is the text:—

"In consequence of resignation of the Cabinet, and in conformity with the constitutional law, I have, after consulting the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber, invited Tewfik Pasha to take the post of Grand Vizier. I desire and I regard it as necessary that the new Cabinet should be composed of personages with a wide experience of matters of State and with independent views, free from all influences.

"Yesterday certain demands were put forward in the name of certain officers, demands contrary to the constitutional charter and the supreme rights of the Caliphate, which ought to be respected by all. Convinced that there is not a single soldier in the army, of which I hold the supreme command, who could formulate claims contrary to the constitutional charter to which he has sworn fidelity, I suppose that the soldiers who for the moment have forgotten their military obligations compose only a trifling minority, in whose behalf demands, originating no doubt in misunderstandings, have been advanced. It is the duty of the soldier to observe discipline, order, and obedience, which constitute the basis of his attachment to the Caliphate and the Imperial Throne. Those who are invested with this quality should hold themselves aloof from politics, carry out the orders of their superiors to the letter, and devote their lives, and, if necessary, sacrifice them, exclusively to the defence of their country. To act otherwise is to commit treason towards the nation and the country.

"These grave incidents have led to the development of certain tendencies which have encouraged the enemy, who dared last night to approach the gates of the capital. These are facts which constitute a warning. I promulgate the present irade, charging the Minister of War to read it in person to the entire garrison of the capital and to make it known to all the Imperial troops."

Turkey's Difficulties.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

AS MIGHT have been expected, the grave crisis through which Turkey is passing has revived the hopes of her foreign enemies. The Novoe Vremya prints from its Sofia correspondent the following message:—"The resignation of the Turkish Cabinet is the subject of passionate discussions in the Government and diplomatic worlds here. The conviction is universal that the future Cabinet will last but a short time, and that the anarchy will so grow as to make a European Conference inevitable. It is the general opinion here that a European Conference is the sole rational way out of the present confused position of Turkish affairs. Otherwise armed intervention in Turkish affairs by the Balkan States is not to be avoided."

The significance of this message is made clear by a note in the Temps, which says:—"Conferences between former chiefs of bands and officers of the Bulgarian army who formerly belonged to the Macedonian Committee are being actively pursued, having for their object to organise an insurrection in Macedonia, and to bring about by these means an intervention of the Powers. The signal for the resumption of revolutionary activity will be given at a suitable moment by the secret committees in Macedonia itself. The Macedonian emigrants established in Bulgaria will organise themselves in order to assist the movement materially and morally; it will also try to influence the authorities in order to induce them to change their policy towards Turkey."

In its turn, this Bulgaro-Macedonian activity has an interesting side-light thrown upon it by the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung, who writes thus:—"The development of the Albanian problem is being watched with anxiety in the diplomatic world. It is feared, should the Ministerial crisis be prolonged, that the Porte may not be in a position to find a normal solution at all. The Albanian question is obviously becoming unmanageable for Turkey. Every day that passes without a solution brings new and greater demands on the part of Albania. It is seriously feared—and the fear is apparently based on good information—that should Albania, with or without the consent of Turkey, become autonomous and embrace in her autonomy the vilayets of Janina, Scutari, Monastir and Kosovo, the Macedonian question would then cease to exist for the Balkan States and the Albanian would take its place. The Balkan States will certainly not allow such a moment to pass without taking measures for the defence of their historical rights. The military preparations of Bulgaria, Montenegro, Serbia and Greece, accompanied as they are by concentration of troops, deserve, from this point of view, the closest attention."

Lastly, there deserves to be noticed, if only for the purpose of "registration," the publication by the Roumelie, the Salonica organ of the Young Turks, of the text of what purports to be a secret treaty between Austria and Bulgaria, concluded by them in 1898 for a period of 15 years. The following are alleged to be the provisions of its chief clauses: Article 3 requires of Prince (as he then was) Ferdinand to resist all Russian encroachments, and pledges Austria to resist the Pan-Serb idea of the restoration of the Old Serbia. By Article 4 Austria undertakes to support Bulgarian aspirations in Eastern Macedonia and the vilayet of Adrianople in return for Bulgaria's respect of Austria's "rights" in Novi Bazar, the vilayet of Uskub, Albania, Western Macedonia, the vilayet of Salonica and Chalcidice. Article 5 provided for support to be given by Bulgaria against Turkey, and, if need be, Serbia and Montenegro, should Austria decide to annex Bosnia-Herzegovina, in return for Austrian support in the matter of proclaiming the independence of Bulgaria and of liberating Eastern Rumelia. Article 6 forbids Bulgaria to enter into political or military alliance with any Power not allied to Austria, who, in return, pledges herself to assist Prince Ferdinand in proclaiming himself Tsar. Article 7 places upon Bulgaria the obligation, should a war break out between Austria and Russia, to preserve strict neutrality and close her territory and her ports to the Russian forces. The last three articles are alleged to be the most important. One provides that in case of Turkey attacking Bulgaria, Austria will occupy Old Serbia, Albania and Macedonia; and in case of Turkey attacking Austria, that Bulgaria will occupy the vilayet of Adrianople and march on Constantinople. Article 9 provides that in the case of the downfall of the Ottoman Empire Austria will seize Novi Bazar, Old Serbia, Albania, Eastern Macedonia and Salonica, with all Chalcidice. Lastly, Article 10 deals with the possibility of an armed conflict with Serbia. Should the war be between Serbia and Austria, Bulgaria will occupy Pirdi and Nish; should the war be with Bulgaria, Austrian troops will march upon Belgrade and Kreguevatz. At the end of the war Serbia is to be partitioned. The entire western portion of Serbia, from a line from Drina and Morava to Nish and Passarevitch will pass to Austria; the other, the eastern half, will fall to Bulgaria.

Young Turks and the Powers.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 2.

THE present situation in Turkey will lead to many different impressions, according as it is considered from the point of view of the war with Italy, or the nature of the internal and foreign situation apart altogether from the possible outcome of the war. The question of the war, or, more exactly, of the terms of peace which will lead to its conclusion, is gradually becoming more and more complicated and obscure. In spite of, and perhaps indeed because of, the extension of the activities of Italy to the Archipelago, and her occupation of almost all the Southern Sporades, the tone of Moslem popular opinion, which is reflected in the Chamber of Deputies and in newspapers of every shade, is more and more opposed to any cession of territory to Italy, or to any negotiation which would lead to a diminutio capitis of the Sultan in Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. Italy on the other hand, appears up to the present equally stubborn in her resolution to keep in force the decree of annexation; and consequently the endeavour to find a formula which will suit both the Turkish Chamber of Deputies and Italian public opinion forms one of the most discouraging tasks that diplomacy has ever been called upon to undertake. A particularly authoritative member of the Turkish Cabinet told me the other day: "I assure you that I have been racking my brains to find a solution; but I cannot." It is my belief that very many Ministers of Foreign Affairs could make the same confession. Turkish popular opinion is a new factor in the Eastern question—an unexpected and somewhat disconcerting factor—but one, nevertheless, which Western Chanceries and to a still greater degree the Turkish Cabinet itself, cannot treat as a negligible quantity.

Now, contrary to what has been generally said, the Turko-Italian war, begun as it was by a foreign Christian Power, without provocation, and with the avowed object of subjecting by force a purely Moslem population, which detested the infidel, had all at once become extraordinarily popular throughout Asiatic Turkey. A Caucasian friend of mine, on whom I can rely, and who had taken part in the electoral campaign in Anatolia, told me when he came back that in any little village where he stopped the first question put to him, even by the poorest peasant, was invariably, "We shall not give up one inch of territory to the Italians, shall we?" The result of this was that everywhere through the Ottoman Empire the war led to a political truce of God. It was tacitly agreed that so long as the Government connected with the Party of Union and Progress should continue to oppose an energetic resistance to Italy, no hostility was to be shown to it, even though the Opposition might not have sympathised with its previous political policy. Such was the decision come to by the Arabs, the Druses, and, in fact, almost the whole of the Moslem Opposition, with the exception of a few Albanian politicians who were defeated in the last elections, and whose consequent bitterness has not yet been overcome. The war thus became, so far as the Turkish Parliament was concerned, an occasion for an enormous Government majority, and consequently, for the Government, a cause of authority and prestige. This fact would perhaps be of only transient importance if the war had not had still another effect. The Party of Union and Progress now appears to understand that its Power would be merely ephemeral if the majority it commands could only exist by means of a political truce, which would come to an end with the announcement of peace. It is, therefore, visibly endeavouring to ensure the maintenance of its majority, even after the cessation of hostilities, by a marked change in its methods of government. Nothing in this regard is more characteristic than the attitude of the Minister of the Interior, Hadji Adil Bey, towards Macedonia and Albania. Recognising that there must be "something rotten in the State of Denmark," he went to see personally what it was, taking with him as witnesses of his policy of conciliation not merely the British official, Mr. Graves, previously mentioned, but also the Special Correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, whom he particularly invited to form one of the party.

The young Turkish Minister travelled slowly and carefully through all the vilayets of Macedonia and Albania, and in spite of the occasional rifle-shots that marred his travels here and there he returned to the capital without any feeling of rancour, and without any idea of violent repression. He declared himself, on the contrary, to be quite satisfied with the reception he met with generally; and, what is much more important, he stated that before claiming from the Albanians the fulfilment of their military and fiscal obligations towards the State, the State should first think about carrying out its own duties towards Albania. The Minister further declared, not only in the Chamber, but also to the correspondents of influential European papers, that both as regarded military and fiscal matters he would show himself tolerant to the last degree, so long as the Albanian provinces had not attained the economic and intellectual level of the vilayets which had prospered under the former Administration, as, for example, those of Broussa and Smyrna. In the same spirit of good sense and tolerance another mission of inspection is to travel through the vilayets of Anatolia, where conflicts between the Kurds and Armenians make insecurity as chronic as it is well known. Mahmud Essâd Effendi, the Minister of the Imperial Land Survey Department, is spoken of as the head of this mission, and all those who are acquainted with this statesman will have no hesitation in acknowledging that he will bring to the fulfilment of his task a broad and indulgent mind.

When I add that a newspaper like the Tanin, so closely bound up with the Party of Union and Progress, and with such a national reputation, has taken to supporting the plan of a return to external collaboration—which formed part of the policy of the Kiamil and Hussein Hilmi Cabinets, and was abandoned by the Hukki Cabinet—and that in this direction it has been followed not only by the Sabah, a very moderate newspaper, edited by Christians, but even by the Jeune Turc, which has also a reputation for violent chauvinism, we shall assuredly be led to the conclusion that the party of Union and Progress shows every sign of an evolution in the direction of genuine political wisdom; for it even seems to be curing itself of that dangerous malady which tends to xenophobia, a malady which made the friends of Turkey despair when they thought of the glorious example of Japan.

Always setting aside this obscure and disquieting question of the outcome of war, can we say that everything is improving in the Turkish situation and that there is no cloud on the horizon of the Ottoman Empire? Far from it. Turkey is now in the presence of a danger which we may term historical, viz., a recrudescence of fanaticism, before which the Government appears for some time to have given way, and which threatens to imperil the work of reform—the only work, as is unanimously admitted, which can possibly make Turkey strong and prosperous internally and entitled to sympathy from external sources.

The rising of the 13th April 1909, breaking out amid cries of "Sheriat ister!" ("We demand the sacred law"), the political assassinations which accompanied it, the march of the army of Salonika on Constantinople which that day of blood brought about, the rapid and brilliant victories of Mahmud Shefket Pasha, and the energetic repression which followed them, might all have combined to prove to Europe that Young Turkey, understanding how grave a matter it would be to allow the fanatics to act with a high hand, would take up a strong attitude towards them clearly and definitely. Nothing of the sort happened. By an evolution which is found extremely surprising by those who know nothing of the motives that animated it, the Young Turk party gradually assumed the attitude of a Government of bigots—became almost, so to speak, puritanical in their cult of Moslem traditions, and almost timid in their desire to please what would have been called in France in former times the "ultras" of the Clerical party. Ardent professions of faith in the Young Turk newspapers on the occasion of all religious feasts, severe measures made known in edicts issued by the Sheikh-ul-Islam against young Moslem women who wished to dress in European fashion, penal measures decided upon by the Ministerial Council against all who did not take part in the fast of Ramadan, a monster religious meeting organised in the form of a public prayer, and presided over by the Sultan and his Ministers on that Balkan plain where, in the Middle Ages, Islam vanquished Christianity—such is the spectacle presented by a Government whose leaders were brought up in Paris, London, and Vienna on theories of the most severe rationalism, and who appeared to be deeply imbued with a modern conception of the State. Some Students of Turkish affairs thought they could see the cause of this devotion in the remembrance of April 13th, and the danger of death in which the Young Turk leaders were placed as the result of their acknowledged indifference in matters of religion—in what may be called, in a word, the power of fanaticism. Part of the truth is certainly there, but not the whole of it. There is a political idea behind what has been wrongly looked upon as an incomprehensible betrayal of the cause of progress. This idea is the hope of being able to give to the Ottoman Empire at least a partial popular unity on the basis of the only single homogeneity contained in it, viz., the common faith of the Turks, the Arabs, the Albanians and the Kurds. It is hoped to amalgamate those diverse races in a single one by using their fervent support of Islam as a cement, and thus forming a compact mass which will impose respect both on an internal opposition of separatist tendencies, or on the cupidities of foreign Powers.

I have called this a political idea in opposition to the mere desire for personal preservation; but if only practical and beneficial ideas have any right to this appellation, the term may perhaps be undeserved. That this idea is insufficient to bring about the fusion of the diverse Moslem races in the Empire, however, facts have sufficiently demonstrated. The pious language of the Young Turk newspapers, the puritanical measures of the Government, the great Mussalman demonstration on the Plain of Kossovo, did not prevent the guns from going off in Albania, in the Hauran, at Kerek, and in the Arabian Peninsula. But there is more than this. Anyone who has glanced through the history of the Ottoman Empire with a view to ascertaining the causes of the constant and often tragic checks which reforms attempted by enlightened Sultans met with, are well aware that such checks were always due to the opposition of two elements which were blind partisans of the inertia of a routine ensuring them prestige and profits; the military element, represented by the janissaries, and the clerical element, represented by those priests or theological students who are usually known as hodjas.

From the reign of Sultan Mahmud I. the ancient military element has not existed. The janissaries have been replaced by an army of the ordinary European type, and the officers, who have become the most Liberal element in the Empire, were the determining factors in the Revolution of 1908. If the janissaries have disappeared, however, the hodjas remain, and the submissiveness which the leaders of the Young Turk party to-day think it a good policy to show to them has inspired the fanatics among the hodjas—for there is a small minority of liberal-minded men among them—with an audacity the grave effects of which have already been seen, and which may even result in the Ottoman Empire being ruined in the eyes of European opinion, by making it appear that Turkey is a country incapable of raising herself to the level of European culture and the modern conception of the State. Systematic opposition, from motives of a purely religious order, to the endeavours of the Government to Europeanise Ottoman justice, and to rationalise its legislation, the inciting of the people against the methods of administration, and even against the introduction of modern methods of hygiene on the European model, the emphasising of the necessity of a return to the Moslem conception of the State, and the strict application of jurisprudence as revealed in the Koran, the exaltation, in a word, not, certainly, of barbarism, or even of tyranny, but of a purely theocratic Middle Age; such is the attitude to-day of the immense majority of the Moslem clerical element, the hodjas, who appear to have learned nothing and forgotten nothing since the far-off days of the Sultan Mustapha or the Sultan Selim.

There lies the danger. For if these fanatics prevail, not only will the fusion of even the Moslem races not take place—for facts have shown that a common faith did not prove the sovereign cement it was expected to be—not only will Turkey be condemned in the public opinion of the civilised world as having been attacked by the most mortal of maladies, viz., an incapacity to adapt herself to circumstances, but in addition, and what is an infinitely more serious matter for her, she will give rise to much disquietude among those European Powers possessing many Moslem subjects, such as England, France and Russia, as being the dangerous source of a blind, a hateful, and, when the first opportunity offers, an aggressive fanaticism.

Must we, then, become pessimistic about Turkey's future? We know very well that for some time past circles which had at first been full of hope and sympathy have fallen into pessimism on this point. But our opinion is that Young Turkey is not going to be snipwrecked, as has been said. She is passing through a period of arrested activity—perhaps of reaction—nothing more. And these are our reasons: If adaptation to circumstances, i.e., the adoption of contemporary civilisation and of the modern conception of the State—is opposed in Turkey by the majority of the hodjas, it has on its side the two most powerful factors in any State—legality and force. For both the dynasty and the army are, in the main, on the side of the Constitutional party, divided though the counsels of the latter now are.

If, again, culture and progress have against them the Islamism of the hodjas, they have the real Islam on their side—the ancient, orthodox Islamism, permitting of freedom of thought in matters of dogma, under which flourished the splendid tolerance and the admirable artistic, scientific, and literary movements of the great days of Baghdad and Cordoba. This is what explains the presence, amongst the declared Progressives of the New Turkey, of great doctors of law such as the former Sheikh ul-Islam, Djemel-ed-Din Effendi, Sahib Mollah, Moussa Kiazim Effendi and the Senator Monastirli Ismail Hakki Effendi.

From the day when Young Turk politicians recognise that the supporters of fanaticism have everything to lose and nothing to gain, that the sole enduring bond among the diverse peoples of an empire is unanimity of sentiment in the feeling of wellbeing resulting from an enlightened, tolerant and rationally organised Administration, represented by competent and efficient agents, and that the most efficacious safeguard against European intervention is the acknowledgement by European public opinion that Turkey is a country which, from the point of view of public order, the administration of justice, and the measures for the preservation of health and efficient sanitation, has nothing to learn, for example, from Switzerland or Belgium, to mention countries which are physically feeble, but which are so strong morally that not even the Great Powers of Europe would venture to attack them: the day when, imbued with these ideas, the Young Turks decide to fall back on the army and the dynasty, and to struggle firmly and perseveringly for culture against fanaticism, the only remaining obstacle to progress will be at once swept aside, and the "historic danger" will fade as by magic.

For the fanatics, who respect nothing but force, before which they humbly bow down, will then show themselves as humble and meek as they did on the day when Mahmud Shekhet Pasha entered Constantinople. When this ignorant fanaticism gradually disappears before the approach of reason, Turkey will adopt, and this time for ever, a line of conduct which, of course, still leaving her a Moslem State, will transform her into a State of order, justice, tolerance and reason; a State which, to cite once more examples which can never be cited too often, will one day rise to the cultural level of the Moslem empires of Baghdad and Cordoba. This will be more than sufficient to assure to Turkey prosperity, prestige and security, and to Europe, in consequence, an enduring peace.

The Arabs at Zanzur.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

IN A long and detailed account of the battle at Zanzur, twelve miles from Tripoli, on June 8th, the correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung with the Turco-Arab forces draws a very flattering picture of the condition and the military worth of the latter. The position which the Turco-Arabs had been trying to fortify with the inadequate means at their disposal was at last taken, but only after a long and strenuous resistance. The Italian brought to bear upon the defenders overwhelming numbers and all the most modern engines of war. "More than nine hours," writes the correspondent, "did the unequal fight last—unequal in every respect. On the one hand, almost a superfluity of highly trained officers, a superabundance of ammunition and artillery, the latest instruments of war and of observation, troops used to disciplined firing, motor and rail connections for the conveyance of reserves and ammunition and the despatch of the wounded, and a strong covering at the rear in the shape of warships. On the other hand, just a few officers, a handful of Arabs, with but a small quantity of ammunition, knowing no discipline in firing, and driven to economy in the use of cartridges, with no backing from machine guns and artillery, lacking all means of observation, relying solely upon camels for the supply of fresh ammunition, and without any of the modern means of intelligence. In these circumstances the achievement of the Turco-Arab forces is something deserving of the highest admiration. The losses on both sides were equally heavy. The Arabs had to deplore 200 dead and 400 wounded. On the Italian side no fewer than 100 dead and 500 wounded must have fallen. Three days after the battle about 20 unburied Italian soldiers were still lying about in front of one of the Turkish trenches at the Maamora heights. It is, however, characteristic of the temper of the Arabs that in the night after the battle they demanded to be led against the Italian position before the latter was ready. This with but tolerably equipped troops could have been well undertaken; not, however, here in the prevailing conditions.

"And what is the importance of this murderous battle for the ultimate outcome of the war? None whatsoever. The Turco-Arab forces, it is true, had to evacuate their position at Zanzur and concentrate at some distance. The Italians themselves, however, do not believe in their ability to hold either Zanzur or the Maamora heights, and have confined themselves to fortifying a position to the north of Zanzur, about two kilometres long and 200 metres wide, which is crowned by one single marabout. Zanzur itself lies about 1,000 metres before their front, and is visited in the daytime by the Italians and in the night-time by the Arabs, who go there in search of palm wine. If the Italians do not make up their minds to take the offensive and advance into the interior the war may last for years. The Arab has now realised that it is absurd to throw himself against fortifications and guns, and that such assaults involve sacrifices which are not commensurate with the object aimed at. And as the occupation of the coast has not the slightest influence on his mode of living, it is certain that Italy will obtain no great results with her present tactics. One thing, however, the Italians must have learned by now—that the Arab is a much better trained soldier than he was a year ago. Economical in the use of cartridges, skilful in the use of cover, experienced in the use of the repeating rifle, the Arab of to-day, full as he is of courage and contempt for death, is a totally different warrior from the 'native' known in other colonial wars."

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says:—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him.....Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

Persia.

REUTER wires from Teheran on the 16th August :—The Persian Government has replied to the Russian demand for concession to construct a railway between Julfa and Tabriz with an extension to Urmiah. The answer is not considered quite satisfactory because it raises the question of the legal incapacity of the Government to grant concession without the sanction of the Mejliss.

REUTER wires from Teheran :—The Swedish organisers of the gendarmerie are not discouraged by the reverse sustained at Diringan. They have framed a scheme for sending 95 gendarmes under Swedish and Persian officers to Fars in the spring. It is believed that the sympathy of Mukbir-es-Sultaneh, the new Governor of Fars, will facilitate the task.

Morocco.

MULAI HAFID, ex-Sultan of Morocco, arrived at Marseilles on the 15th August. He was received with military honours.

Reuter wires from Paris :—Considerable anxiety is felt in France with regard to the situation in South Morocco owing to the activity of the Pretender, El Hiba. All Europeans have left Marrakesh except the French Consul and Vice-Consul. The task of the Resident-General is an arduous one. This new revolt coming at a critical time and the impossibility of despatching troops to repel El Hiba's, may delay the pacification of the whole country.

THE Moorish Pretender, El Hiba, has been proclaimed Sultan at Marrakesh.

The Europeans who left Marrakesh on account of unrest due to the activity of the Pretender, El Hiba, were stopped near Safi and compelled to pay a heavy ransom.

Reuter wires from Tangier on 22nd August :—The pretender Elhiba entered Marrakesh on the 18th instant, after fighting with Kaidelglawi, who remained loyal to the French.

El Hiba besieged the house in which are the French Consul and French police instructors.

Reuter wires from Paris on 23rd August :—The Council of Ministers has considered the events at Marrakesh and it is understood that it has decided not to extend the field operations to the Southern Capital.

China.

A CRISIS is arising in Peking owing to Yuan-shi-kai's having the two Hankow Generals summarily decapitated on a charge of promoting a fresh revolution. The Southerners are furious and have induced the Assembly to demand explanations from Yuan-shi-kai failing which they will impeach Yuan or the whole Government.

The execution of the Hankow Generals has caused a violent outcry and will probably lead to a decisive trial of strength between Yuan-shi-kai and the Assembly. The executed Generals were very prominent in the Wuchang rebellion but were recently suspected of promoting another rising. The accounts of the execution make an appalling story, volleys being poured into the bodies until they were disembowelled.

The Week.

France and Russia.

M. POINCARÉ is returning to France. An official communiqué, published in St. Petersburg, says the result of the conversations between the two Governments has re-affirmed that they are in complete agreement and that the ties uniting them were never stronger. They have recognised that the entente, consecrated by unchanging feeling, can be progressively adapted to all necessities which can be foreseen. The alliance remains a precious guarantee of the maintenance of peace and equilibrium in Europe.

England and Russia.

THE Russian Foreign Minister following on his visit to Paris on the 15th September will come to England on the 23rd September and will spend five days at Balmoral.

The Triple Entente.

SPEAKING at a Municipal banquet at Dunkirk on the 21st August, M. Poincaré said that time had given fresh vigour to the Franco-Russian Alliance. This Union has been completed and broadened by the cordial understanding with Great Britain. None, however, can see an aggressive purpose in the pacific grouping of three friendly Powers. It is by a policy of wisdom, sangfroid and Reuter wires from Shanghai :—Dr. Sun-yet-sen left for Peking on the 19th August, General Suanghsing We had arranged to accompany him but declined to go at the last moment at a protest by Yuan-shi-kai after the drumhead court-martial. Dr. Sun-yet-sen was entreated not to go but he insisted.

Reuter wires from San Francisco on the 20th August :—Sons and daughters of Sun-yet-sen, who are now here, allege that their father has been assassinated at Peking by troops supposedly under orders of Yuan-shi-kai. There is, however, no confirmation of the report.

Reuter wires from San Francisco :—The rumour of the assassination of Sun-yet-sen is unfounded. It originated in placards displayed in the Chinese quarter.

REUTER wires from Peking :—The Assembly declares that the explanations offered in connection with the execution of the two Hankow Generals are unsatisfactory and demands the attendance of the Premier and the War Minister on the 23rd August. The Government are remarkably unconcerned in the face of the violent hostility and are prepared to take strong measures. They maintain that they possess proofs of the guilt of the executed Generals. In the meantime the Southern papers are fanning the flames of party strife.

News lately received from Kashgaria on the 22nd August shows that matters have apparently settled down there, though the Chinese soldiers are not altogether in hand. The position in Chinese Turkestan is, however, much better than in Yunnan and Szechuan, where civil authority is non-existent.

A message to the Times from Hankow, on 22nd August, says that local opinion is that Changchinwu, one of the executed generals, was a troublesome rascal who deserved his fate. The incident is regarded as emphasising satisfactory relations between General Li Yuang Hung and Yuan-shi-kai, the former having requested the latter to carry out the execution.

Reuter wires from Peking :—On the 21st August Yuan-shi-kai refused the demand for the attendance of the Premier and War Minister in connection with the execution of the two Hankow Generals and suggested instead that the Hupch Deputies should visit him.

The Assembly sat behind closed doors and apparently moderate counsels prevailed. The motion for impeachment was dropped and another was agreed to on Yuanshi-kai's suggestion that the crisis be regarded as passed.

The disbandment of troops is steadily proceeding throughout the Yangtse Valley. Ninety-nine per cent. of the population urgently desire quietude.

Tibet.

RELIABLE news has been received on the 21st August via Gyantse that the long drawn out struggle between the Chinese and the Tibetans at Lhasa has at last ended and that peace has been concluded upon terms which appear to be very reasonable. All Chinese troops beyond the Amban's ordinary escort are to leave Tibet at an early date via India. Their arms and ammunitions are to be locked up at Lhasa under the seals of both parties and the Nepalese Resident. The Chinese traders are to be allowed to remain at Lhasa.

Afghanistan.

News received from Kurram Valley states that a gang of Mahsuds raided the village of Basata on the 12th instant driving off a number of cattle and kidnapping a Turi boy. The Kurram Militia killed two of the raiders and rescued the boy who was slightly wounded. The villagers co-operated in the pursuit and captured three men with their rifles and recovered all the cattle.

The Amir is extending the system of collecting revenue in kind instead of in cash. It has now been applied in the Northern and Western Provinces, grain and shusa being accepted from the cultivators.

Reserves of forage for military purposes are being formed at the headquarters of each district.

Jahandad Khan Ghilzai has been invited to return to Afghanistan where his family remained when he took refuge in Kurram. His sons are still in detention at Kabul but the Amir seems willing to release them as soon as their father puts in his appearance.

A frontier correspondent confirms the recent reports as to the insecurity of the road between Dhakka and Jellalabad owing to the presence of tribal gangs of robbers. On the night of the 9th instant a Mohmand caravan carrying piece goods was looted at Giridih Khas, and on the following night an attack was made on the transport depot at Haftchab and some animals were carried off. A mounted patrol was also killed, his horse and rifle being taken. The gangs are apparently growing bolder and the local officials seem unable to deal with them. Large caravans are unmolested as they are able to defend themselves.

Haj Pilgrims.

REUTER wires from Perim :—Cholera has broken out among the Indian and Javanese pilgrims on Cameran Island.

The Public Services Commission.

MR. SLY, Commissioner, Berar, who has been appointed to the Royal Commission, is due back from leave in England six weeks' hence. By then the time will be ripe for his being placed on special duty, as much will have to be done in advance to arrange the programme of the Commission.

Hindu University.

THE total amount realised up to the 10th August for the Hindu University is nearly Rs. 8,86,000. The total expenditure is Rs. 13,800 nearly. The Honorary Secretary, Dr. Sundar Lal, has asked the Maharaja of Durbhanga, President of the Committee, to fix a date and place for a meeting of the Executive Committee to consider Sir Harcourt Butler's letters and the preparation of a draft constitution such as the community would like to have.

The Hon. Pundit Madan Mohan Malaviya has left Allahabad for Benares and will thence proceed to Calcutta to discuss with the supporters of the Hindu University movement there the situation created by the Secretary of State's discussions regarding the Universities.

The Aga Khan.

H.H. THE AGHA KHAN is proceeding on a visit to South and East Africa. This will prevent his standing for election as a representative of the Bombay Muhammadans in the Viceroy's Legislative Council.

Khan of Mardan.

(FROM THE "STATESMAN'S" LONDON CORRESPONDENT.)

IN THE House of Commons on the 9th August Mr. A. MacCallum Scott asked the Under-Secretary for India with reference to the recent arrest and imprisonment without bail of His Highness the Khan Bahadur Khawaja Muhammad Khan, Chief of Hoti, upon a serious charge, whether he was aware that the judge of the High Court of Bombay in discharging the accused stated that the Khan was arrested on nobody's complaint and that the whole procedure seemed to be most irregular and arbitrary.

Midnapore Case.

IN AN article on the Midnapore case, the Times says, on the 22nd August that the result accentuates the necessity for an urgent and searching investigation into the personnel and methods of at least some branches of the Calcutta High Court by an eminent judicial authority from England. The Court, the Times says, has always included and does now include Judges of the highest attainments and legal qualifications; but at present it needs to be purged of amplification that at sometimes aims not solely at the administration of law but at the gratification of political predilections. The article severely criticises the gross latitude allowed to Counsels, especially Indian Counsels in the Indian Courts.

The "Burma Critic"

IN accordance with the orders of the Chief Court Full Bench which quashed the committal to the Sessions of Mr. Channing Arnold and ordered further evidence to be recorded, the District Magistrate on the 20th August resumed the hearing of the case in which Mr. Arnold is alleged to have defamed Mr. G. P. Andrew, Deputy Commissioner of Mergui, in two articles which appeared in issues of the Burma Critic. Mr. Guy Rutledge appeared on behalf of the complainant assisted by Mr. C. Gaune and Mr. C. Hamlyn and O. Campagnac for Mr. Arnold.

Before evidence was recorded Mr. Rutledge stated to the Court that Mr. Arnold had published another libel on the complainant on Saturday the 13th August's issue. The statements were absolutely unfounded and absolutely false and it aggravated the offence and he would have to take such steps elsewhere as to stop that sort of thing while the case was pending. On the last occasion counsel said he wished to tender Captain Finnie. He had him here now and he intended to tender him now.

Mr. Hamlyn strongly objected to his cross-examination being interrupted and His Worship agreed with him.

In the cross-examination by Mr. Hamlyn the complainant said if Mr. Buchanan, Sub-Divisional Officer, ever wrote the diary in Iniah's case, it would be a most important document. He denied ever in his life sending a cypher or code wire. He had received only one such wire on Government business from the Commissioner of Mergui. He was on perfectly amicable terms with Captain Finnie. He knew nothing of witnesses having been terrified into changing their previous statements in the case. It was a pretty audacious thing if an accused person went to a police officer's house and terrified him. Witness did not understand Captain Finnie's anxiety to get Mr. McCormick out on bail. Captain Finnie and Mr. McCormick were on ordinary social terms. Witness did not say he had not paid visits to Mr. McCormick before the trial.

Mr. Hamlyn wanted to quote here a passage from a verbatim report from the Burma Critic of the last day's proceedings.

Mr. Rutledge objected to that report being quoted as being from the same paper which had published libels on the complainant.

Here Mr. Arnold in a state of great excitement shouted out that he would not be accused of falsifying evidence by anyone; that he would not take a lie from Mr. Rutledge or 20 of him and finally invited Mr. Rutledge to step out and settle the matter.

The Court called the accused to order and threatened to bind him down the keep the peace.

Mr. Arnold apologised profusely and the cross-examination was proceeded with. The hearing will be resumed to-morrow.

Further cross-examination of complainant was recorded by the District Magistrate on the 21st August.

Mr. Hamlyn, Advocate for the accused, throughout the day cross-examined on various matters appertaining to the allegation made against his client.

The complainant said he discharged McCormick as his motive was pure and philanthropic. Witness certainly called it pure for a man to take another person's child and examine and treat her. He did not think it outrage on the modesty of a female if done with pure intention. There was a hospital 8 miles away. Witness did not desire to answer counsel's hypothetical questions as to what he would do if a man treated his daughter or sister in the same manner. It was true McCormick kept the child in his custody until the 15th July, 1911, and treated her for disease. The girl's father had died without seeing her. It was true Ina made a charge of being raped by the Assistant Surgeon two days after. He believed it was true that McCormick went over to see Sherard a couple of days afterwards. Sherard denied even making a statement that he was terrorised by McCormick who toyed with the revolver. Sherard denied it to Finnie who held the inquiry. He had no personal knowledge of the allegation that Ina was examined for five hours. It was a lie that the police inquiry was conducted with the utmost secrecy. He was not present but he knew about it from the police diary. Further examination will be concluded to-morrow.

The District Magistrate on the 22nd August continued the hearing of the case.

Mr. Andrew was subjected to a searching cross-examination for several hours. He denied that Mr. McCormick was an intimate friend of his. He stayed at Mr. McCormick's house when at Victoria Point. He would see any man guilty of abduction or other serious offence go to jail with complacency. He declined to answer the question whether he would try a friend. He would not try his own brother. He had no anxiety to try the case. He did so because it was his duty. If there was a case against Mr. McCormick, the Chief Court would try him. The complainants in the case against Mr. McCormick did not charge witness with partiality. He could not say if they sent two telegrams to the Lieutenant-Governor to that effect. No enquiry had been made as to who stopped them and where and when they were stopped. He would rather not express his opinion on whether the ignoring of a petition by the Commissioner was a grave scandal. Witness denied that irregularities and illegalities had been committed by himself and the police. He took exception to the allegation by the accused that offences had occurred and were overlooked by the British officials. The article was grossly unfair. It was all lies and a tissue of falsehoods. Witness had explained to Government on the 6th October 1911, certain statements made in an anonymous letter to the Lieutenant-Governor. The case is proceeding.

The Soul's Aspirations.

"Like a sick eagle gazing on the skies."

—Keats.

As a sick eagle gazes at the skies
And flaps his wings with impotent desire
To soar sublime where yonder orb of fire
Through boundless space on whirling pinions flies;
And struggles sore—through growing weakness ties
His wings and talons to the rocky spire,
His wonted perch—till the vain efforts tire
His slackening muscles and his closing eyes;
E'en thus, the Soul, on lofty flights intent,
Shakes her weak wings in passion's trammels bound,
And seeks to rise; but, all her ardour spent
On fancies vain that idly flit around,
She cannot gain the starry firmament,
Where Glory calls, and sinks upon the ground!

NIZAMAT JUNG.

TETE À TETE

The issues raised by the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler's letter to the President of the Moslem University Constitution Committee are so grave and fundamental that they can only be decided by a direct reference to the will of the whole community. The Constitution Committee, in its recent meeting at Lucknow, rightly came to the conclusion that its scope was limited to framing a constitution for the proposed University on the lines laid down by the Moslem University Foundation Committee. It now rests with the latter body to decide, after carefully ascertaining the views and wishes of the Mussalmans, whether a fundamental change of principle in the evolution of the project would be at all acceptable to the community. We have no doubt ourselves as to what the verdict of the community will be. However, the whole question has entered a stage at which any irresolution or confusion of objects would spell an irretrievable ruin to the cause of the University. The views and ideals of the Mussalmans have never been ambiguous or vague in this respect. Still, however, it is supremely important at this juncture that the Moslem public should express its views on the Secretary of State's decisions in a tangible and decisive form. With this end in view, we have devised a method to collect the votes of the Moslem subscribers of the Comrade on the important issues that the promoters of the Moslem University have been called upon to solve. We publish elsewhere in our advertisement columns a "Voting Paper" which, we trust, our Moslem readers will fill in, cut out and forward to us as early as possible. The results of the votes thus received will be regularly published in the Comrade every week. We have every reason to believe that our Moslem readers who comprise, we are glad to say, an important section of the Mussalmans, fitted alike by education and aptitude to pronounce on the delicate and vital questions now before the community, will record their vote after the fullest consideration of the issues involved. By this method we will be able to hold an unmistakeable proof of what an important and educated section of the Mussalmans thinks about the matter. We would like to request those of our contemporaries that reach a considerable number of Moslem subscribers, to adopt this method and collect their votes for the purpose we have indicated. This is, we are convinced, one of the surest ways of bringing home to the indifferent and the sceptical the strength of the Moslem views and the character of the Moslem feeling on the subject.

WE EXCHANGE the Comrade with almost all the leading papers of Turkey and Egypt and we must confess that it is a source of great pleasure to us to find that its leading articles and editorial notes are extensively reproduced and quoted in these contemporaries. We have recently received very flattering attention from one of these, the Servet-i-Finoun, an illustrated weekly journal of Constantinople, which has published a photograph of the Comrade staff. After giving a description of some of the men in the group, it says:—

"We have great pleasure in publishing this portrait of the staff of the only Muhammadan paper in India distinguished for giving news about Turkey. The photo has been specially sent to us by our Calcutta correspondent. It is easy to appreciate the awakening that has taken place in the Moslem world of India, if one pays attention to the intelligence radiating in the faces in the group. These co-religionists of ours are making great strides in intellectual and material progress under the English regime. There is between them and us a positive community of race and religion. The signs of progress and development visible in different parts of the Islamic world are a source of pride to us, and we should try to emulate them. The Comrade is published in English exclusively for the Islamic community. The contents of the paper, specially its printing and get-up, point to the progress the Muhammadans of Calcutta have made in science and arts. We might say that even in our Fat-Takht (Capital) there does not exist a weekly paper containing such extensive and varied information. The Comrade is not an illustrated paper; it is purely a paper for study. The Servet-i-Funoun prays for the continuance of the success and prosperity of its Indian Moslem contemporary, and conveys from here its sentiments of cordiality. We fear our contemporary has somewhat misunderstood the catholic character of the Comrade and has also done some injustice to other Indian contemporaries while saying of us things which no lack of modesty can make us believe of ourselves. It is, however, our hope to deserve some of these compliments in our future career. We express our heartfelt thanks to the Servet-i-Funoun and reciprocate its good wishes.

We publish in "The Moslem University Supplement" an open letter to the Mussalmans from "An English well-wisher" which, we are sure, will be read with great interest. The writer has a first-hand knowledge of the educational condition of the Mussalmans, and his deep sympathy with their efforts to ameliorate that condition is beyond question. His disappointment at the refusal of the Government to grant powers of affiliation to the Moslem University is as great as that of the Mussalmans themselves. In considering the course the Mussalmans should now adopt, he has been led to make certain practical suggestions. Now that the Government has decided to withhold powers of affiliation from the University, it would be, in the opinion of the learned writer, more manly, courageous, and reasonable to have no University at all, but to apply the funds to the promotion of elementary and secondary education amongst the Mussalmans. There is no doubt that Moslem education requires enormous and systematic efforts in these directions. But the Moslem University project represents an entirely separate movement, which is based on the deep-seated conviction of the Mussalmans that their supreme need is to evolve a district type of higher education for their community. The true secret of the hold of Aligarh on popular sympathies is that it represents that ideal and has led the way. The funds have been subscribed on the understanding that the ideal has at last come within sight. To divert the money to any other channel would amount to a breach of a solemn trust. Even from a practical standpoint the need for a University where the educational ideals would materialise is greater than the multiplication of schools and colleges on the lines of the existing State institutions. The growth of a common centre where the type of education would be evolved in accordance with the needs of the Mussalmans would give much more powerful impetus to Moslem education throughout the country than the random growth of aimless institutions in different places. The Moslem educational problem cannot be treated piecemeal. The inspiration of Aligarh has been so fruitful because of its generous idealism and its ample and unifying purpose. If the Mussalmans would fail to get a university of the type they have all along laboured to create, the money might best be spent in building a mausoleum, on the portals of which might be inscribed the words: "Here lies an ideal done to death."

THE British Foreign Office Blue Book on the horrors committed by An Economic Inferno.

"white men" engaged in collecting rubber in Peru, forms a gruesome and ghastly reading. Some idea might be given of the iniquities perpetrated by quoting a few of the facts which make up Sir Roger Casement's sad tale of the utter inhumanity of modern money-grabbers. It is almost incredible, but none the less true, that the "natives," 90 per cent. of whom bear marks of brutal caning, are being so ruthlessly exterminated by the Peruvian Mammon-worshippers that their population has fallen from 50,000 to 8,000 during the last six years. Smiting or even kicking in the face of the poor "natives" is a most commonplace occurrence, "flogging to death or to putrefaction is frequent," and murder by starvation is not uncommon. To suffocate to death by pinning the victim under water affords innocent pastime to some of these "captains of modern industry," while instances are known, to quote Sir Roger Casement, of "innumerable murders and tortures of defenceless Indians, pouring kerosine-oil on men and women and then setting fire to them, burning men at the stake, dashing the brains out of children and again and again cutting off the arms and legs of Indians and leaving them to speedy death in this agony." In another passage Sir Roger says:—"Such men had lost all sight or sense of rubber gathering, they were simply beasts of prey who lived upon the Indians and delighted in shedding their blood." We will spare the reader a further recitation of this blood-curdling record. Nor have we any mind to heighten the colour—already lurid enough—of "this most entirely devilish narrative" by any comments of our own.

We earnestly urge on the powers that be that such foul blots on Western civilisation should be sternly wiped off on the earliest possible occasion. We refuse to believe that this state of affairs is a natural concomitant of the pioneering of modern industries and that humane and necessary remedies "can be gradually applied to better the position of the defenceless natives." We are confident the British public will not allow its conscience to be lulled into sleep by any facile logic of "economic unmoralness." Such absolutely abnormal conditions require measures of abnormal expedition and severity to remedy them. It will not do to say that in the present stage of economic evolution the multiplication of intermediaries, the growth of the capitalist, the well-defined line of demarcation between the "returns to capital, land, labour and organisation" and the "exportation of capital" to distant money markets, reduce the "personal responsibility" of the investor or justify him in "asking no question" as to how his regular dividends are produced. For if really such atrocities are the natural results of modern economic evolution—though we wholly call that statement into question—then it is high time humanity paused in its feverish race for material "progress" to consider if that "progress" were not being too dearly bought.

THE Moslem University Foundation Committee will have to meet at an early date to consider the new situation that has arisen in regard to the Moslem University project and to decide the fate of the whole undertaking. Needless to say that the meeting would mark an important and historic occasion, inasmuch as it would deal with the issues that go to the root of the educational ideals of the Moslem community. The Foundation Committee has a very extensive membership and it should not at all be difficult to call together a large and representative gathering of the Mussalmans from all parts of the country. The place of meeting should be conveniently accessible to all. We think it would be generally approved if the meeting is held at Lahore. The capital of the Panjab is a centre of considerable Moslem activity in the north; and those who still remember the impressive scenes of enthusiasm that marked the visit of H. H. the Aga Khan must feel sure that the Panjab Moslems will do all what they can to render the meeting a success. The date for the meeting should be fixed with due regard to time and circumstances and the necessary arrangements should be carefully thought out beforehand. We think the Dusserah holidays about the middle of October would be a suitable time for such meeting. It is unnecessary to say with what deep anxiety and expectancy the Mussalmans would await the decisions of the meeting. We are sure it would be worthy of the occasion, win the confidence of the Mussalmans and strengthen the hands of their leaders to guide them with ability and courage through a period of grave uncertainty and doubt.

IN OUR issue of the 13th July we drew the attention of H. E. the Viceroy to the highly objectionable practice of European visitors strolling within the precincts and in the courtyard of the Jumma Masjid of Delhi without either taking off their boots or putting on boot coverings. This week we have received from a correspondent a defence of the conduct of the Managing Committee in the matter which we gladly publish elsewhere. It seems that the Committee have been guilty, not so much of culpable neglect, as of tame acquiescence in a state of affairs in which their forefathers had been acquiescing before them. After thorough enquiries we find that this outrage on Moslem religious susceptibilities is being perpetrated for years, despite several strong protests made against it by the Muhammadans. Government has been repeatedly approached to put a stop to such desecration of the sacred precincts of the mosque, but somehow it did not consider that the gratitude of a community was a valuable enough asset to be secured at the cost of a very slight inconvenience to an occasional globetrotter. We would be the last to object to the Government's uniform solicitude for the convenience of sightseers. But we would like to point out, what is, however, only too patent, that a mosque is a place of worship first and a sight for the globetrotter afterwards. No amount of antiquary interest or gaping curiosity can possibly be held to justify a violation of its sanctity. Such indifference to Moslem susceptibilities might not have been so difficult to account for in the days just following the Mutiny, when, notwithstanding the generous help received from the Muhammadan States in quelling the rising and the uniform efforts made by Muhammadan gentlemen of the calibre of the late Sir Syed Ahmed Khan in protecting unfortunate Englishmen and appeasing the mob, the Government persisted in looking upon the Muhammadans as rebels; but it is little short of reprehensible in these days of peaceful progress. After its desecration by Nicholson, the mosque was in the possession of Government for three years and during that time it was wholly under State management. But we fail to see why even fifty years after its restoration to the Moslem community the Government should still insist upon controlling its management. Surely, it cannot be said that the Muhammadans are no longer competent to be entrusted with the independent management of their own ancient mosques. We trust the Government will soon see its way to hand over the management of the mosque to the Muhammadan public, just as it has long since handed over the mosque itself. But apart from this question, we insist that the refusal of the Government to make a rule in accordance with the wishes of the Mussalmans does not wholly absolve the Management Committee, of all blame in the matter. For even if such a rule did not exist officially, there was nothing to prevent them from putting up a private notice and personally requesting the visitors to desist from a practice which outraged Moslem feeling, and we are sure that no visitor, possessing ordinary decency and good sense, would have gone out of his way to offend the Moslems. Nor could the Government have any possible objection to such a procedure. In fact, we are surprised to find that the Government should have even refused to pass the necessary official regulation. Unfortunately, even a Viceroy like Lord Curzon, who was so particular about certain matters, could not see his way to do more than forbid the wearing of boots inside the roofed portion of the mosque. Everybody knows that every inch of the mosque, whether roofed or unroofed, is sacred and should be guarded from desecration. Delhi has long been the centre of Moslem civilisation in India. It is now to be the capital of the whole continent. We trust the new Delhi Administration will take an early opportunity to remove such a dark blot on that professed policy of religious toleration which has been one of the bed-rocks of the British Rule in India. We think more highly of the average European than either Lord Curzon or his predecessors seem to have done, and we can assure the Government that the required regulation will not be at all resented by such visitors to Delhi as have any claim on the consideration of the Government. The Moslem public feels very strongly on the subject, and they certainly have a perfect right to raise a general protest against a desecration the like of which, we might be quite sure, the Government will not suffer to be perpetrated in a place held sacred by the Christian citizens of the British Empire. We hope the good Christians are not forgetting the great Biblical Commandment about doing unto others as ye would have them do unto thee.

WE CANNOT but admire the tactics which some of our Tory British contemporaries have been adopting to bring pressure to bear on the Nicholson Committee and compel it to declare that the result of its "consideration of the military policy, administration and expenditure in India" is the decision that the status quo should be maintained. We had occasion some time back to notice in our columns an article in the Pall Mall Gazette by a well-known "expert" on Indian affairs, which was an obvious attempt to induce the Commission to prejudge the case which it had been instituted to thoroughly investigate. After such laudable efforts to hinder the Committee from entering upon their deliberative duties with an open mind, the Pall Mall Gazette had been resting on its oars and awaiting the development of events. But, now that the time for the presentation of the Committee's report is drawing near, our contemporary has been again roused into activity by the necessity of teaching the innocent schoolboys of the Commission the duty they owe to "the Saxon race" and the British Empire. In its issue of the 9th July the Pall Mall Gazette has published a hopeless rignmarole on the "Danger of Reduction" of the Indian army from the pen of another of its patent "experts." The article starts with an amusingly transparent attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the British Public regarding the origin of "that refuge of an embarrassed administrator—a Commission." We are sure it is nothing short of a wilful misreading of history to say that the proposals for reduction in the Indian army expenditure have grown out of the exigency of "facing a Budget to which the poppy cannot contribute an income of millions." Persistent efforts for reducing Army expenditure in India have been made by almost every Indian politician of note for more than a generation; whereas the gradual dwindling away of the Opium Revenue is a factor which has had to be reckoned with only recently. Nor can we subscribe to the view that any attempt has been made to "conceal the serious objective of the Commission by giving it an air of expensive determination." We have all along been under the impression that the appointment of the Commission was a frank and earnest desire on the part of the Government to effect economy in public expenditure. The "expert" has ranged into quite a marvellous array a battalion of arguments which are meant to prove that if the Nicholson Committee is guilty of any such "treason to the Saxon race" as, he believes, seems to be contemplated by the Government of India, it will "inaugurate the final stage of the decadence of the British race as a world-power." Perhaps the fibre of the "Saxon race" depends for its strength on bloated armaments in India. We fail to see how, if "money had to be found," any considerable economy could be introduced into the Indian Budget without "the army obviously having to provide the saving." And we are sure that if our doctrinaire friend had been a little more conversant with practical Indian politics, he would have realised that economy is perfectly called for in the military expenditure of a country, where the army swallows up almost a third of the total Budget, especially when that country has just started on a forward march of social, political, and economic progress. It seems to us a peculiar twist of logic—and of conscience—to say that the poor Indian ratepayer should be called upon to finance ambitious schemes of establishing "central piers in great arches of Empire," of propping up whole structures which would else "crumble," of perpetuating the "integrity of great Imperial triangles," of transforming the Indian Ocean into "a great Inland Sea" of the British Empire, of "keeping the great Pacific Islands as the white man's home," and of generally counteracting all modern "threats not only to British commerce and to British greatness, but to the very existence of the British kindred in Australia and New Zealand." The Jingo alarmist is never so happy as when he finds an occasion to talk of "the Empire in danger" and of the bogies that surround it. True, India, no less than Canada, aspires to be a "conscious partner in the burdens and the rights of the Empire;" but that does not, we believe, entail any duty on India to relieve the colonies of theirs or to rectify, by financial help, the blunders of the British Cabinet over the question of "the British control of the Pacific" or "the abandonment of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean." We are confident that the Nicholson Committee will not lend an ear to all this facile rhetoric of evil presage; but will deliver a calm, unprejudiced judgment over the question of the relation of military expenditure and military efficiency in India.

WITH the death of General Booth the closing chapter is reached of the first phase of a world-wide social movement, which, in its way, is a no mean contribution to that evolution of a higher, a purer,

General Booth. and a more peaceful humanity of which the 20th century shows such unmistakable signs. As Commander-in-Chief of the Salvation Army, General Booth wielded a salutary influence on the lives of a portion of the flotsam of human society. As a boy of 15 he startled Nottingham with his open air preaching in the cause of the fallen and suffering humanity. "Charity must begin at Home" and General Booth originally confined his energies to the up-lifting of the slum population of the East End of London. But as the movement gathered strength, it spread rapidly all over England, and to-day it has established itself as a permanent institution all over the world. Some idea of the magnitude of the work done by the Salvation Army, of which General Booth has all along been the guiding spirit, might be formed by noting the fact that it has corps, circles and societies in no less than 56 countries in both the hemispheres of the globe, which minister to the physical and moral needs of 11,000,000 human beings of all races and all creeds. The organization which the Army has evolved for the moral elevation of the submerged classes of society is marvellous alike in its magnitude and its perfection of details. There are 900 social institutions which publish periodical temperance literature in 21 languages with an aggregate circulation of well over a million copies. The staff of the Army consists of 21,000 officers—men and women—who are carrying on their work even in the most backward parts of the world and trying to bring back the lost sheep to the fold of Christianity. Among the numerous institutions which the Army has established for the attainment of its objects are the temperance lecture halls, the farm colonies for the employment of the backsliders, the rescue homes for fallen women, the poor man's banks, the prison-gate brigades, and the city colonies for the reclamation of the dregs of the slum population. And all these various institutions are everywhere displaying a sleepless vigilance in their eminently humanitarian work in bringing back erring humanity to the paths of righteousness by persuasive eloquence, salutary attractions, and healthful employment. In fact statistics go to prove that in most places where the different agencies of the Army have been working for some time, crime and drunkenness have perceptibly decreased. In India, the beginning of the movement dates back to 1882 and, considering the dense ignorance and stolid conservatism of the country, has achieved remarkable success in helping the "untouchables," with whom India is teeming, to attain to a higher level of humanity. And even when we are least in sympathy with its ideals, and are disposed to question the desirability, at least as far as India is concerned, of the methods adopted by some of its local officers, we are always glad to acknowledge the wholesome influence the Army has been exercising over the "criminal tribes," the "untouchables" and the discharged prisoners in India.

THE HON. MR. JUSTICE ABDUR RAHIM'S recent speech at the Southern India Muhammadan Educational Conference was a brilliant combination of abstract reasoning, lofty idealism and business-like counsels of practical utility. It deserves to be read and pondered over by every Moslem who is at all interested in the past, the present and the future of his community. While recalling the glorious achievements of Islam in the past, regretting their present state of universal degeneration and exhorting them for a great forward march, Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim did not forget to show the line along which work should be done in order to accelerate the advent of that Islamic Renaissance the first "murmurs of which are clearly audible." We are in perfect agreement with Mr. Abdur Rahim's view of the causes of the present backwardness of the Mussalmans—as, in fact, we are with most of the views he expressed. "For 500 years Muhammadans occupied the very summit of glory." In the sciences and the arts, the indebtedness of the modern world to Islam is acknowledged by all unprejudiced savants. And as a great moral force, Islam has demonstrated its potency wherever it has gone. "The motive power" which was responsible for the great ascendancy of the Muhammadans in the past was not to be found in the peculiarities of race, colour, climate or local history, but in one great idea, viz., "Islam." "Islam," said the learned speaker, "was a great liberal and civilising influence. By placing religion on Reason as its foundation, it had effected the emancipation of the human intellect." But he confessed that "he has never known a time when the prestige of Islam stood so low" as it does to-day. This fall he attributed to moral degeneration, phariseism, superstition, the absolute and despotic power assumed by Moslem States, an exaggerated attention to forms, intellectual lethargy and the general disregard of the animating principles of Islam. He also rightly regretted the tendency to moral sang-froid and general want of purpose and determination shown by the present generation of Moslem youths in India. But "at the same time," while deeply lamenting this state of affairs, Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim assured his audience that "the situation was not by any means without hope." And we perfectly endorse his view that a great promise of ultimate salvation is to be seen in the "unmistakable signs around us of the return of the spirit of Islam in the community" and join with him in reminding the Moslem leaders that "our first and foremost duty is to do all that we can to ensure the spread of this spirit among the people." Apropos of this, Mr. Abdur Rahim expressed the hope "that one of the leading features of the new University, when it is established, will be a systematic study of our religion and religious sciences, that it may send forth men of culture who will also command the respect and confidence of the community in matters of religion." That, we have always said, is exactly our own view of what the Moslem University should do. Mr. Abdur Rahim rightly laid great stress on the study of the history of Islamic civilisation as a great steadying factor in education. He regretted the present position of the fair sex in the Moslem community and strongly advocated the advancement of female education. He pointed out the high position which women held in Islamic society in the past, and cited history to prove that they fully qualified themselves for it by the "eminence they attained as rulers of territories, in fields of battle, in wise statesmanship, in theology and jurisprudence, in philosophy, poetry and rhetoric." "We shall never satisfactorily solve the problem of education," he continued, "unless and until we fully recognise the necessity of educating our girls no less than our boys." We fully appreciate Mr. Abdur Rahim's zeal for the gradual emancipation of the inmates of our zanana and are particularly gratified to see that he does not advocate any hasty revolution subversive of the present constitution of society, but the rational procedure of a steady effort to bring the two sexes to an approximately common level before any steps are taken in the direction of practical emancipation. Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim pointed out that "here in India the Government of the country, though run by foreigners, cannot be justly charged with being obstructive to reform and progress." But he reminded the Moslems that, while the "Government could do much more to help the Muhammadans in the matter of education," than it has as yet done, it "should be carefully considered what exactly the Government can do," "recognising the limitation that what is asked should do no injustice either to the Government itself or to any other community." He concluded an eminently suggestive address with the following remarks:—"There is no reason why you should not be able to gain for the Moslem community a respectable place among the civilised nations. We have an invaluable heritage; our religion has made plain for us the path of progress, let not obstinacy and prejudice blind our eyes and paralyse our wills. We all love Islam. Remember its good name is at stake. I appeal to you in the name of Islam to devote yourself heart and soul to the cause which we have met here to advance. Combine and organise your efforts; do not falter, and, God willing, we shall attain our goal."

The Comrade.

The "Pioneer" and Affiliation.

It is no secret that the Thunderer of the Services has long ceased to love the Aligarh that it was at one time never tired of admiring. Aligarh's first offence was the students' strike in 1907 against the ill-considered and vacillating action of Mr. Archbold and the admittedly unsympathetic attitude of Professor Gardner-Brown, both of whom have had to leave Aligarh and both of whom have since then been provided with even more lucrative appointments by the benign Government. The second and even less forgivable offence of Aligarh occurred in 1909 when the European Staff followed the example of the students by striking and, in sympathy with Mr. Archbold, sending their resignations, not to their employers but to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, threatened the Trustees of the College with a representation to the Local Government demanding intervention. The Trustees did not give way to Mr. Archbold and the Staff and successfully resisted the mighty Sir John Hewett, who was inclined to favour Mr. Archbold. Since then Aligarh has not had a good word from the Pioneer and this "friend" of the Mussalmans has never forgiven them the audacity of dispensing with the services of one English employé and accepting the "resignation" of another.

There was, therefore, nothing for them to be surprised at when the Pioneer for eight months wholly ignored the great efforts of the Mussalmans to collect funds for their University. In the issue of 2nd September 1911, we noticed in detail the first comments of the Thunderer of Allahabad and our readers could not have forgotten the gentle correction to which we were then compelled to subject our tremendous contemporary. We shall here only remind them that according to the Pioneer the schemes of "denominational" Universities were "regarded in well-informed quarters as inconsistent with established educational policy." It successfully disguised its good wishes for their success in the prophecy of Cassandra that "the prospects of the schemes for Muhammadan and Hindu Universities do not seem particularly bright." Then turning to its pet, the Aligarh College, the Pioneer stated that "the view that the constitution of the Aligarh College, which submits candidates for the degrees of the Allahabad University, can be made to fit an Aligarh University giving its own degrees, indicates an ignorance of elementary facts." It then favoured us with referring to "the opinion of many competent persons whose interest in education is deep and sincere"—no doubt as deep and just as sincere as the Pioneer's—"that Muhammadan and Hindu Universities are undesirable in themselves." And, as the sting of the scorpion is in its tail, the Pioneer concluded with a sentence which defied both syntax and sense. "To those who see promise in teaching Universities with religious instruction, any movement which is political rather than educational in aim must stand condemned."

A certain class of persons have no memories, and it must have been a shock to the Pioneer to discover that a little over five years ago, it had written a leading article warmly well-coming the earliest proposal of a Hindu University, although it had the same taint of "denominationalism" that it and the proposed Moslem University have to-day, and was even then just as "inconsistent with established educational policy" as it and the proposed sister University are at the present moment. The Pioneer had then opened its welcome in these eloquent words: "Difficulty is experienced as a rule in giving approval to the proposals which emanate from the Indian National Congress. To the scheme for establishing a Hindu University, however, the most cordial encouragement may be offered." The same scheme which was condemned in 1911 as denominational was in 1906 accepted as "non-sectarian" and admitted to "combine the best in the East and the West." Even the declaration that it would be "conducted on national lines by national agency" did not then savour of sedition. As a matter of fact, the Pioneer, which must have now rejoiced at the statutory inclusion of a large number of Europeans on the teaching staff of the proposed Moslem University, was then rather glad that the new Hindu University would, as a matter of course, dispense with all European co-operation, since otherwise some vexatious doubts might arise as to the just apportionment of praise for its successful inauguration and management," and that "Hindu influence would be supreme." In 1911 the Pioneer thought that "it is quite certain, we imagine, that Government will not allow any University to grow up which is not under adequate control, much less that it will recognise its degrees." But in 1906, in spite of the absence of European co-operation or of State control it had emphatically approved of "the most liberal constitution of this new centre of learning." As regards the prospects which in 1911 did not seem "particularly bright," it had said in 1906 that "it is a bold conception but financial difficulties will fade away before the generosity of the distinguished and wealthy members of the great Hindu community."

What the leading article of 6th January 1906 had not flatly contradicted has, however, now been contradicted by the editorial note on affiliation which we reproduced in a prominent portion of our last issue. For the lion now roars as gently as a sucking dove, and this hirling of the Services can find no other objection in "the ambitious schemes" of these denominational Universities but the practical objections pointed out by Sir Harcourt Butler. The Member for Education claims for the Government of India a "deep interest in the movement" which in the opinion of the Pioneer stood condemned less than a year ago. If, then, the promoters of the movement are disinclined to share the views of the Member for Education, the Pioneer may rest assured that it would convert nobody by feebly echoing his objections and softly cooing to the promoters of these Universities about their "thoughtful and evenly balanced minds."

Has the Pioneer forgotten the objections it raised to such Universities less than a year ago that it feels the necessity of hatching this cuckoo's egg of the objection to affiliation? Or is any stick good enough with which to beat the Mussalmans? Be that as it may, we would request the Allahabad Thunderer to rest assured that we shall not let it lie in peace. The "revealed truths" of other days shall be rescued from the oblivion to which it seems to have consigned them, in order to shame the devil. The very first objection to affiliation advanced by Sir Harcourt Butler and echoed by the Pioneer is that "a University with branches all over India would lead to competition and probable conflict with older territorial Universities." This is 1912. In 1906 the world was very different indeed, for wrote the Pioneer:—"We are persuaded that the scheme will excite no jealousy. Existing Universities can go on serenely, confident that the birth of a sister institution will enhance appreciation of their own work." People who are in the habit of contradicting themselves are not likely to leave the resources of crooked interpretation untapped, and the Pioneer would hardly scruple to explain away the advice to older territorial Universities to "go on serenely" by asserting that it never contemplated a University with the power of affiliation. We shall, however, prevent at least one terminological inexactitude in embryo if we cannot wipe away those of which the Pioneer is already delivered. If it turns to its glowing leader of 6th January 1906, it would find in line 19 and 20 of para. 2 a reference to the "noble University with branch colleges in many parts of India." Its establishment was to be the test of the capacity of the Hindu members of the National Congress to do constructive work. Let us contrast the words of 1906 with those of 1912. In 1906, "if the Hindu members of the National Congress establish a noble University with branch colleges in many parts of India, and govern it so wisely that it becomes a model for other seats of learning, they will do more than can be accomplished by many speeches to prove that they possess a considerable share of the creative and administrative qualities to which claims have been made." In 1912, however, "a university that would try to mother the whole country, or rather the students of a particular religion in every province, would set itself an impossible task." It is said that in the course of seven years every part of the human constitution is renewed and physiologically the person whose body undergoes this change is an altogether a new man. This would not certainly justify perjury after every seven years, but even if it did, the Pioneer may well have waited till the 6th January 1913 to contradict its statement about a "noble university with branch colleges in many parts of India."

The Pioneer wrote—less than seven years ago—that "indeed, it may be said that one of the chief features of the proposal is the challenge it gives to critics who assert that the Congress deals in words spiced a little with sedition and nothing more." If anything, it was the Pioneer itself that had often enough thrown down the gauntlet before Indians of all creeds and all schools of politics. Now that both the great communities and political parties of India have lifted up the gage, the valiant Pioneer comes hurrying on and says: "I had dropped my glove accidentally. Please return it to me if you have picked it up."

Egypt.

I.

Many a superficial critic of contemporary affairs has disposed of the Egyptian problem by setting it down as another "Riddle of the Sphinx." The simile may do credit to his sense of the word-image, but it offers no guidance to a serious student of Egyptian affairs. Nor is the problem, in its salient features and general character, very difficult to understand. It is only one of the examples—a very pronounced and complicated one, no doubt—of how a country's destinies can be permanently affected for good or evil, when a confluence of circumstances sweeps it into the vortex of cosmopolitan finance tempered by imperialism. Egypt furnishes the best object-lesson of the truth of the inexorable law of history that father's sins are visited on his children. The Khedive Ismael mortgaged the revenues of his country to the money-lenders of Europe and paved the way for the bondage of his people. The State verged on bankruptcy, and in sheer alarm the creditors urged their respective governments to secure the payment of their bonds. The European control was imposed on the finances of Egypt; and in order to keep the country solvent and keep down anarchy and chaos, Great Britain undertook the duties of international police. The Khedive was in any circumstances to be kept on the throne lest an internal revolution might bring in a new order of things and a tyrannised and exasperated people might repudiate the engagements of a ruler who had recklessly squandered away national patrimony. The Financial Control tightened its grip by degrees and Great Britain assumed through her Agent and Consul-General the administration of Egyptian finance. How the sovereign authority of the Khedive declined and the government of the country passed virtually into the hands of the British Agent, assisted by a large staff of "advisers" and "inspectors", is a matter of recent history. The problem of Egypt was in its initial stages mainly financial. Modern finance is, however, a trusty handmaid of modern imperialism. British interference, ostensibly to help the Khedive against his rebel army, led to the military occupation of the country. The occupation has grown to be indefinite and, if some of the imperialists of England are to be believed, it is going to be permanent. The presence of British troops in the country against the wishes of the people and without any legal sanction, and the virtual exercise of sovereign power by the British Agent who possesses no locus standi from the point of view of international law or right, form the crux of the problem at the present time. The financial aspect of the situation has been completely overshadowed by the far-reaching moral and political issues that have come into existence during the past thirty years of British domination over Egyptian affairs. The problem is unique only in the sense that, from the political standpoint, it is a paradox. The legal status of the country is that of an autonomous province of the Ottoman Empire governed by a hereditary Viceroy. Yet the province has been declared neutral when its Suzerain is at war with Italy and the Turkish officers are arrested and deported if they happen to be passing through the country on their way to the Tripolitan frontier. The Khedive is legally vested with absolute powers in the internal administration of the country. Yet the initiative of sovereignty has virtually passed into the hands of the British Agent and all important decisions on Egyptian affairs are taken by the British Foreign Office.

The strong agitation that is now going in the British Press for a large increase in the Army of Occupation, the methods of the masterful regime introduced by Lord Kitchener and the recent trial and heavy punishment of the men charged with plotting against the Khedive, the British Agent and the Prime Minister, have considerably increased the anxiety of those who have been watching the course of affairs in Egypt with abiding interest. The one outstanding fact of the recent Egyptian history is the growth in the activity and power of the British Consulate. Lord Cromer was a dictator of Egypt for more than a generation and brooked no interference in his ways. Nevertheless, he was careful to preserve old forms of authority and contented himself with pulling the strings from behind the scenes. But Lord Kitchener has dispensed with every outward form that preserved the amour propre of the people, has relegated the Khedive to a passive rôle and himself stepped forth as the virtual ruler of the land. His triumphal progresses through the provinces, after the manner of a potentate, receiving State officials and waited upon by provincial notables and deputations of the people cannot be entirely innocent of design. The British Agency is emerging out of its status as an indirect, though powerful, influence behind the throne and is rapidly converting itself into a source of direct authority and power. Various other indications are abundantly forthcoming from other quarters which greatly strengthen the impression that the idea of evacuating Egypt has been definitely abandoned by the British Government. What visible legal form the Occupation may take in the near or distant future, it would be a futile speculation to forecast. It is enough for practical purposes to remember that the oft-repeated and solemn pledges of successive British Ministers of the last century have passed into the limbo of forgotten ideas, that the British hold on Egypt is daily strengthening, that the ideal of "Egypt for the Egyptians" is more than ever unthinkable to the British imperialist and that, profiting by the existing uncertainties of the European situation, an early attempt might be made to "regularise" the relations of Egypt with Great Britain. Frankly enough, the last contingency is based purely on our calculations of the supposed or real exigencies of the British Empire. At any rate, it must be frankly admitted that the British interest in Egypt is mainly governed by the imperial and diplomatic needs of England. It was never a purely philanthropic interest. To-day it has grown plainly and loudly "imperial." Yet, apart from the Egyptian national interest, the question has some weighty moral and legal aspects which it should not be entirely profitless to consider. The Cairo correspondent of the Pioneer, who passes his days in rapt adoration of Lord Kitchener as the modern Pharaoh, has a passage of refreshing candour about this question in his recent "Egyptian Notes." He says:—"We are strengthening our hold on Egypt: our weak protestations that we should 'shortly evacuate,' are luckily things of the past; and now that a Liberal Government has on at least three occasions within the last two years either expressly or by inference disavowed that policy of sentimental hypocrisy, there is precious little fear of its ever being revived. If anything, this attitude of 'shortly leaving' has been in the main responsible for the political agitation in Egypt, for it encouraged Young Egypt to indulge in false hopes and to put faith in our protestations which were as insincere as they were impossible of realisation. The one unanimous view that Egypt takes to-day of the decision to create a torpedo station at Alexandria is that it spells good-by to all their hopes of release from the British yoke."

This plain unvarnished statement of the Imperialist attitude of to-day bears a strange contrast to the "sentimental hypocrisy" which is associated with some of the greatest names of recent British history. Immediately after Tel-el-Kebir, British statesmen of the day assured the world in solemn and unequivocal language, that the British force would be withdrawn from Egypt as soon as the internal peace was secured. In view of what is being preached now, and how the "protestations" of responsible British Ministers are being repudiated as "insincere," it would be worth while quoting textually some of the pledges given to Europe and the world about British intentions in Egypt. The quotations would be useful, if for the only reason that they would afford an interesting glimpse into a chapter of modern imperialism. The official pledges were made at different times and on different occasions and their number is legion. We only select the following as they are plain and emphatic in their import:—

"I, admiral commanding the British fleet, think it opportune to confirm without delay once more to your Highness that the Government of Great Britain has no intention of making the conquest of Egypt, nor of injuring in any way the religion and liberties of the Egyptians. It has for its sole object to protect your Highness and the Egyptian people against rebels." (Sir Beauchamp Seymour to Khedive Tewfik, Alexandria, July 26, 1882, published in the Official Journal of July 28.)

"I can go so far as to answer the honourable gentleman when he asks me whether we contemplate an indefinite occupation of Egypt. Undoubtedly, of all things in the world, that is a thing which we are not going to do. It would be absolutely at variance with all the principles and views of H. M.'s Government, and the pledges they have given to Europe, and with the views, I may say, of Europe itself." (The Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone in House of Commons, August 10, 1882.)

"You should intimate to the Egyptian Government that it is the desire of H. M.'s Government to withdraw the troops from Egypt as soon as circumstances permit, that such withdrawal will probably be effected from time to time as the security of the country will allow it, and that H. M.'s Government hope that the time will be very short during which the full number of the present force will be maintained." (Lord Granville, December 29, 1882; Egypt, No. 2 (1883) p. 33.)

"The very fact of our having endowed the country with representative institutions is a proof of our disinterestedness. It is the last thing we should have done had we desired to retain its Government in leading strings; for, however irresistible may be the control of a protecting Power when brought to bear on a feeble autocracy, its imperative character disappears in the presence of a popular assembly." (Ibid., p. 83.)

"The uncertainty there may be in some portion of the public mind has reference to those desires which lead towards the permanent occupation of Egypt and its incorporation in this Empire. That is a consummation to which we are resolutely opposed, and which we will have nothing to do with bringing about. We are against this doctrine of annexation; and we are against everything that resembles or approaches it; and we are against all language that tends to bring about its expectation. We are against it on the ground of the interests of England; we are against it on the ground of our duty to Egypt; we are against it on the ground of the specific and solemn pledges given to the world in the most solemn manner and under the most critical circumstances, pledges which have earned for us the confidence of Europe at large during the course of difficult and delicate operations, and which, if one pledge can be more solemn and sacred than another, special sacredness in this case binds us to observe. We are also sensible that occupation prolonged beyond a certain point may tend to annexation, and consequently it is our object to take the greatest care that the occupation does not gradually take a permanent character. . . . We cannot name a day, and do not undertake to name a day, for our final withdrawal, but no effort shall be wanting on our part to bring about that withdrawal as early as possible. The conditions which will enable us to withdraw are those described by Lord Granville—restored order in the state of the country and the organisation of the proper means for the maintenance of the Khedive's authority. . . . The Right Honourable gentleman (Sir S. Northcote) has treated us as if we intend to stay in Egypt until we had brought about institutions which would do credit to Utopia. We have no such views. . . . In popular language we mean to give Egypt a fair start, and if we secure its order, supply a civil and military force adequate to the maintenance of order and with a man on the throne in whose benevolence and justice we have confidence, with institutions for the administration of justice under enlightened supervision and in fairly competent hands—if we have made a reasonable beginning towards legislative institutions into which is incorporated some seed of freedom our duty may be supposed to be complete." (Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons, August 9, 1883.)

and pledged to Europe; and if a contrary policy is adopted it will not be by us." (Lord Derby in the House of Lords, February 26, 1885.)

"It was not open to us to assume the protectorate of Egypt, because H. M.'s Government have again and again pledged themselves that they would not do so. . . . My noble friend has dwelt upon that pledge, and he does us no more than justice when he expresses his opinion that it is a pledge which has been constantly present to our minds. . . . It was undoubtedly the fact that our presence in Egypt, unrecognised by any convention, . . . gave the subjects of the Sultan cause for a suspicion which we did not deserve." (Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords, June 10, 1887.)

After reading these extracts no doubt is left in the mind as to the character that British occupation was intended to assume in its early history. No language could be more emphatic in meaning and more transparent in intention. It was, however, left for a Liberal Secretary of State of to-day to almost repudiate in so many words the spirit of the declarations in which his predecessors had pledged the honour and good faith of England. Sir Edward Grey has defined the attitude of the present Liberal Government to the Egyptian question in the following words:—

It was the policy of H. M.'s Government to maintain our occupation of Egypt, because we cannot abandon without disgrace our responsibilities which have grown up around us.

It is now plain, even to the meanest understanding, that a change has come over the temper of the ruling classes of Great Britain, and Egypt is being held, not as a trust to be discharged, but as a dependency to be governed. Scores of writers and politicians have sprung up who have discovered the supreme importance of Egypt in the scheme of British imperialism. The "responsibilities" which Sir Edward Grey cannot abandon without "disgrace" must be very weighty, indeed, when they can justify the successors of Gladstone to override all moral considerations and political engagements, which he held so sacred and binding. If Sir Edward Grey refers to the "responsibilities" that constitute the political axioms of latter-day imperialists we can understand what he means without admiring his Liberalism and we can have little reason for surprise. Foreign occupation of a weak country has never been justified on any other ground than that it is useful and beneficial for that country. We have often heard of the benefits of the British occupation of Egypt, of the growth of material prosperity in the land, of the honest and successful administration of its finances, of the duty of managing the affairs of the Egyptians who are incapable of understanding their own interests, of the dangers of the country relapsing into chaos in the event of evacuation, and of the need of Egypt to be governed by some benevolent despot as the Orientals generally are unfit for self-government. All these questions constitute a text apart, and we intend to deal with them or rather with the results of the British Occupation in Egypt in our next. We may only remark here that a plainer method would be more appropriate and surely more effective if it is necessary to convert Egypt into a British dependency. The Egyptian problem does not now stand alone. It has become a part of the general problem that Sir Edward Grey has created for Europe. In his game of counterpoises and manoeuvring on the diplomatic chess-board, Egypt has become a useful pawn.

British diplomacy, under the influence of a few masterful officials of the British Foreign Office and a number of scare-mongers of the British Press, is rapidly changing its centre of gravity. The Tueton, armed to the teeth and driven by an imperious economic necessity, is casting about for "places in the sun." This is the one fact of the situation. Diplomacy, in search for "balances" and "equilibriums," is revolving round this central reality. Methods have passed into ideals and instruments are being cherished and perfected for their own sake—such is the mad obsession that has turned the diplomatist into an artist. The materials that he spends his life in moulding into finished products as treaties, alliances and conventions, are the elfin shapes that come to birth in the region of high diplomacy when diplomacy becomes a pure art. Every profession tends to become a close corporation, and the diplomatic corps of a great European Power lives in a world of its own creation to-day. It is a machine run by the specialist, who would rather wipe a country out of existence than suffer any change in the mechanism of his theory and logic of international relations. As a creature of flesh and blood, he tries to see the direction in which the world is moving. Deep in the shadows of his profession, he begins to take the direction for granted and sets about to make sure that the world does not move away on a different course. Egypt is in the vortex of this diplomacy and its fate will be decided, it may be, by some obscure pressman who is clever enough to make the "German bogey" raise its head in the Valley of the Nile. The military "expert" who thinks Egypt necessary for his scheme of Imperial defence, the cotton syndicates and the financiers who are interested in the country's "development," the "Imperialist" who talks of "civilization" and thinks it a "disgrace" to take the "whiteman's burden" off his Herculean shoulders, and, above all, the diplomatist who bases his calculations of the future on the wisdom of these compatriots of his, have declared Egypt to be an indispensable factor for the safety of the British Empire and the imperial glory of the British race.

"From the first we have steadily kept in view the fact that our occupation was temporary and provisional only. . . . We do not propose to occupy Egypt permanently. . . . On that point we are pledged to this country

CORRESPONDENCE

Visitors to Delhi Mosque.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

DEAR SIR,—Referring to your comments on page 29 of the issue of your widely circulated paper of the 13th July 1912 on a letter of one of your South African (born Indian) correspondents, by name Mr. Husain Davood, expressing his sorrow and disappointment with the Muslims of Hindustan and complaining of the want of religious zeal amongst them by referring to the fact of his having seen, on the 30th June 1912, a European lady and gentleman walking about in the courtyard of the Jama Musjid, Delhi, with their boots on, I wish to say that the said correspondent, while speaking generally of the apathy of the Mussalmans to their religious duties, expects the Imam of the Musjid to put up a few notices asking visitors to take off their boots at the entrance. And you, while upholding the remarks of your correspondent, think that if the Committee in charge of the mosque realized their duty, framed necessary rules in this behalf, and enforced strict observance thereof, no visitors, European or Indian, will deliberately go out of their way to give offence to the Mussalmans. I beg to point out that it is no fault of your correspondent or yourself to be unaware of the circumstances and conditions under which the use of the said mosque was allowed to the Muhammadans of Delhi. The fact is that the management of the mosque is entrusted to a body of Muhammadan gentlemen subject to the orders of Government and there do exist rules and standing orders in connection with the management which are duly observed. I admit that the practice referred to by yourself and your correspondent is sorely touching to the feelings of all the Mussalmans; but you know that at the time of the Restoration of the mosque the Government did not allow them to bind European visitors to the necessity of taking off their boots or shoes at the entrance of this holy but historical mosque evidently for the reason that great inconvenience might be caused to the said visitors in laying bare their feet. Accordingly this violation of the sanctity of the mosque, though offensive to the generality of the Moslems was suffered to continue. The Mussalmans generally, and the Managing Committee of the mosque specially, ever since the Restoration, have been fully alive to the necessity of having the said practice discontinued; but they have not yet fully succeeded and I may tell you that the Managing Committee, strongly prompted by their own religious susceptibilities and those of their co-religionists, made strenuous efforts in representing the matter to the notice of the Government of India during the Viceroyalty of His Excellency Lord Curzon, and succeeded so far as to have the conditions of Restoration altered, so that European visitors are now asked either to take off their boots or put on the boot coverings when entering the marble quadrangle termed "Jammat Khana" by your correspondent. It is surely admitted on all hands that the Courtyard is as sacred in the eye of the Moslems as any other space inside the mosque, and your idea of inviting the attention of His Excellency the Viceroy with due deference to the feelings of Islam is surely laudable. But I see that you are not justified in your remarks about the indifference to the matter of the members of the Managing Committee of Jama Musjid, Delhi, whose work in the cause of Islam generally, and in the interests of the mosque in question specially, has never given cause for any complaint, and who are as mindful of the feelings of their co-religionists as all true Mussalmans should be. Had the Managing Committee of the mosque been neglecting any of their legitimate duties the Mussalmans of Delhi must have first of all raised a cry against them. But as they know that the interests of the mosque are carefully watched they are quite satisfied with their work.

Under the circumstances I hope you will do justice to the endeavours of the Mosque Committee by changing the view held by you.

Lord Kitchener and His Friends.

LORD KITCHENER has certainly been unfortunate in the friends who have undertaken the duty of advertising his recent Egyptian work. Lord Cromer used to do that part of his diplomatic business for himself, but the new British Agent, gifted with a less attractive pen, has been obliged to leave the task of praising himself to others: and they have made, it would seem, a sad mess of it.

To say nothing of Mr. Garvin, who with somewhat wild headlines, records for us most afternoons in the Pall Mall Gazette the Field Marshal's Viceregal progresses through Lower and Upper Egypt, we have had two articles of a more seriously inspired character in the pages of The Fortnightly Review, and these have been a cause of trouble. To the first was given the exceptional honour of anonymity. It consisted of a laudatory and highly coloured picture of Lord Kitchener's inner thoughts and plans for Egypt, which had every appearance of being derived from Lord Kitchener's entourage, if not from himself. It let us into the secret of the great soldier's appointment to Cairo last summer, representing it as, what it doubtless was, a military precaution forced on the Government in view of the impending raid on Tripoli. Lord Kitchener's prime business, it was explained, had been to keep Egypt neutral during the coming war, to prevent that country from being made a base of military operations by Turkey or any assistance from being given by the native government and people adverse to the Italian plans. In this difficult task the new Agent had been entirely successful, not by mere military force, but still more by an astute diplomacy. While pretending to be sympathetic with Turkey, whom our Government was unwilling to quarrel with, he had been able, by a series of dexterous moves, light hints, and covert threats, to discourage Egyptian patriotism and hinder its more dangerous manifestations; the full weight of his open severity he had reserved for those presumptuous organs of the Egyptian press who were for helping their co-religionists in the war, and for the Nationalist leaders, whom he had successfully prosecuted, imprisoned, and driven into exile. Lord Kitchener had thus rendered a notable service to his Government and to Italy, where, by the way, he is just now being entertained with banquets and demonstrations of gratitude as an acknowledged friend. It was an alluring picture of a strong military personality, endowed with gifts of the most subtle as well as the most strenuous kind, and addressed to Englishmen, it obtained its full object of popularising an already popular hero.

Unfortunately, however, there was another public to be counted with, besides the public at home. The article, reproduced at Cairo and Constantinople, became the cause of unexpected embarrassment. The candour of the writer had been largely overdone; he had repeated words and phrases wounding to Muhammadan ears and diplomatically incorrect. Lord Kitchener had been represented as expressing a hope that it might fall to his official lot to be entrusted with the eventual annexation of Egypt, and this, though it was a sentiment nine Englishmen out of ten were ready to applaud, proved more than Sir Edward Grey, sound Imperialist though he was, was as yet prepared to endorse. Lord Kitchener was obliged to repudiate his admirer's article as at all inspired by him.

To-day in the July number of the same Fortnightly Review we have another friend and admirer also affecting intimacy with the Field Marshal's inner thoughts, who has given us the benefit of his still better knowledge, correcting and reproving his fellow panegyrist and drawing a picture altogether different of their common hero. Sir George Arthur scoffs in his articles at the notion that military considerations played any part in Lord Kitchener's appointment to Egypt, or that they had since been his chief pre-occupation there. Still more he scoffs at the wider views of Imperialist ambition attributed to him by the anonymous friend. On the contrary, Lord Kitchener, he tells us, is the most "correct" of diplomats, one who would never venture to give vent to any unauthorised opinion in international politics. In his real heart the conqueror of Omdurman is less soldier than administrator, less politician than philanthropist, and the love he bears to Egypt is one of an altruistic kind, for only doing good. He has no ambition but to make the fellah happy, and, if he has used a certain military rigour in putting down the "pestilential publications of the native press," it has been solely in order to wean the Egyptians from politics they do not understand, to agriculture at which they are experts, and to a calm consideration of practical reforms—a homely, unambitious aim, and one worthy of a member of that glorious band of Englishmen—and not the least of British soldiers—who are running our Eastern Empire on the lines of the "White Man's Burden."

I should not venture to intrude myself in the domestic quarrel thus raised between Lord Kitchener's two admirers, were it not that Sir George Arthur goes out of his way to attack me while attacking the other, as being in some way connected with the trouble. He reproaches me because, in a letter I recently wrote to the Manchester Guardian about Lord Kitchener's press prosecutions, I omitted any word of praise for his hero's philanthropic schemes and high moral standpoint. These, when I wrote my letter, had not been officially announced, and my subject was not these, but the demoralising influence on Egypt by his elimination of the honest and more patriotic elements in the native ministry, and by a violent straining of the law in order to secure political convictions. I had commented also on Lord Kitchener's exaggeration of his political rôle in Egypt and assumption of an authority there not properly his own. I do not hope to make a convert of Sir George Arthur, but I will try to explain to him what our English international position in Egypt really is. He, in common with most military Englishmen, evidently imagines that Egypt is already a British Dependency, and that the fact of our having so long maintained a British garrison at Cairo has given us a legal title to possession which cannot be challenged without eccentricity. He speaks of me on this head as bizarre, and of my opinions on Egyptian matters as neither "sane, nor competent, nor candid." If he will take the trouble, however, to examine the case with any care, he will find that it is his, not my position that is in contradiction with realities.

Not only are we English without any title to Egypt in international law, but it is exceedingly improbable that, in the ultimate settlement of the Near East, Egypt will become permanently ours. Egypt—I do not speak of the Soudan—is a Mediterranean province, and will follow Mediterranean fortunes. We have not even such prospective claim to it as a local English Colony would give, and in the partitioning of the Ottoman Empire, should such a misfortune happen, it is not we whose title would be the best as heirs. The foreign population established on the littoral is Greek, Italian, French, anything you will, except English. English rule may be better than the rule of these—I do not say the contrary—but we are withdrawing our fleet already from the Mediterranean, where we have no Colonial settlements, and Egypt will sooner or later have to follow suit and be withdrawn from. If, therefore, a philanthropic regard for the native Nile population is to be our guide—and Sir George's defence of Lord Kitchener's policy is an appeal to philanthropy—our duty clearly is, not to treat the fellah as an interesting subject for experiments in fatherly English administration, which can at best be only temporary, but as a free man who must be encouraged to think and act before long for himself. Education in self-government is his only protection against the terrible fate of being merged in the general gulf of European demoralisation which has overwhelmed the other Muhammadan populations of North Africa. It cannot be either wise or kind to keep the Egyptians in close leading strings, to forbid them to think on any political subject, and to insist that they should occupy themselves with nothing but the cultivation of their fields, a coddling policy which would leave them unarmed and helpless to such tender mercies as the French have shown to the Muhammadan fellahin in Algeria and the Italians to those in Tripoli. Either European Power if it got possession of the Nile, would rob the fellah of his land altogether, and replace him with a foreign colonial scum imported from Europe.

This consideration of the political situation is in itself a sufficient answer to Sir George Arthur's attack on me. But, as he challenges me on wider ground, that of what he calls the "moralities," I am glad to meet him on it and discuss with him the case of practical philanthropy. I beg him to believe that I am not so incompetent an authority on the subject as he supposes. It is one, on the contrary, which has occupied my best attention for close on forty years. During thirty I have been a landowner in the Delta and have thus acquired some practical knowledge of what the fellah needs and, I may add, of what he is likely to gain from English philanthropic experiments. I have witnessed a whole series of such experiments from the time of the Dual Control downwards, watching their rare success with pleasure, their more frequent failure with sorrow, and occasionally even suggesting ideas myself to the authorities. Some of the schemes announced to-day as due to Lord Kitchener's initiative I recognise, as having been in the minds of native reformers as long ago as in Arabi's time. Thus, I think I could prove to Sir George Arthur, if he would allow me, that I brought before Lord Cromer in 1883 the case of recovery at law, and advocated precisely Lord Kitchener's remedy for the debts of the fellahin. Lord Cromer entirely agreed with me at the time, and said that it should be a first object of his care. Yet twenty-nine years have passed since then, and nothing whatever has come of it. I shall not grudge my praise to-day, if Lord Kitchener succeeds in driving this matter through; but it is too much to ask me to throw up my cap all at once for a scheme which is still in embryo. I notice that, at this very moment of my writing, it is announced in the Egyptian papers that, under pressure of a moneylender's deputation, Lord Kitchener has been obliged, since his report was printed, to abandon half his proposed remedy. The scheme, which was to have included five-acre holdings, is to be limited now to those of two and a half; also I see all mention omitted of what is an absolute necessity of the case if it is to give any immediate relief, that the indebted fellah should be started with a clean financial slate. Without it greater ruin may result.

Again, on another question of morality, I think I could show Sir George Arthur that in the year 1893, being prayed by the villagers around me, Moslems to a man, to prevent the establishment of drink shops among them in connection with a railway about to be opened, I took their petition to Lord Cromer, and, as before, obtained his hearty sympathy, but with an equally futile result. The Egyptian Prime Minister of the day happened to be a somewhat "fanatical" Muhammadan, and there was no difficulty at all with him. Nothing lay nearer his heart than to prevent scandals of village drunkenness. It was not his fault, but the English Agency's, which trifled with the case and raised difficulties on the ordinary excuse of being obliged to respect the capitulations. I pointed out in vain to Lord Cromer that, the offenders being Greeks, the thing could be put through by simple police regulations, and that it was ridiculous to suppose that the Hellenic Government would go to war to enforce the right of their subjects to demoralise these villagers. Lord Cromer, however, was bent at the time on making up a general case against the capitulations which interfered with him in other ways, and he preferred to let the drink matter go on and accumulate as stronger evidence for their abolition.

It has been the same all along in Egypt with other immoralities. I wonder whether Sir George Arthur has read the latest book on Egyptian affairs, To-day in Egypt. Its author, Mr. Alfred Cunningham, is as devoted an admirer of Lord Kitchener as Sir George is himself, and as advanced a British Imperialist, yet this is his description of what Cairo has become under our thirty years' management of its affairs. I quote with reluctance a few paragraphs, omitting the most realistic passages:—

"If ever," Mr. Cunningham writes, "a city deserved the name of Modern Babylon it is Cairo; in fact, it is questionable whether Cairo in the light of twentieth century civilisation is not infinitely worse than the ancient city referred to. To one who has seen most capitals of the world, new and old, and many other cities which have an unsavoury notoriety, there is none to compare with Cairo in the degradation, vice, and depravity which are permitted to exist and flourish, even in the very midst of the city under the very nose of the authorities, who make no attempt in the name of morality and decency to check these evils. . . . At the south-eastern end of the public gardens is what is popularly known as the Fish Market. The greater part of this district is given up to grog shops, cheap cafes, low class music-halls, and brothels; and such brothels! . . . Check by jowl with these scores of flaming foreign hells, full of their gaudily dressed occupants soliciting from every window of the thronged streets below, is the quarter where the native prostitutes dwell, and even this quarter has been invaded by the more degraded of their European sisters. Their dwellings are hovels of the vilest description. . . . Dirt, vermin, vice, in their most loathsome forms, are here; and these animal dens with their fearful occupants, are under police supervision! Here every form of immorality is practised. . . . This suppurating moral cancer is permitted to exist and spread every form of loathsome disease not only through Egypt, but even to the Soudan. The evidence of every medical man who has practised in Egypt and served in the Soudan will confirm this. It is perhaps undesirable for numerous reasons that Great Britain as the tutelary power should seek to impose upon Egypt its own peculiar legislation with regard to the control of vice of this nature. . . . but it is impossible to believe that if the British Adviser, backed by the British and other communities, suggested a measure for the purification of this district, he could not but be successful. . . . It is begging a most important if distasteful question for the British Adviser to blind his eyes and wrap himself in his diplomatic mantle, saying it is not his business. If a few views of the 'Fish Market' in Cairo by night could be produced throughout Great Britain they would raise such a storm of disgust and indignation that the demolition of this quarter and the deportation of the bulk of its occupants would occur in a very short time, in spite of the indifference of the British Agent and the Egyptian Ministers, and the existence of the Capitulations. The whole thing is a blot upon our Administration in Egypt, and discreditable to the British religious bodies in Cairo who profess to ignore it. It is a disgrace which is felt keenly by all patriotic native Egyptians, for such a cancer comes upon them from without, and they alone are powerless to regulate or destroy it."

In quoting this passage—and I have left out the most terrible details—I would make the following remarks, and I beg Sir George Arthur to consider them from a philanthropic point of view. First, it is an absolute truth that the whole of this abomination is due to the British occupation. Though before the occupation there were immoral quarters in Cairo, they had all been swept away by Arabi's Revolution in 1882; the brothels, the drink shops, and the other public indecencies. It was against these leproses of Europe that the Revolution was largely directed.

We English re-established them after Tel-el-Kebir, and thereby are solely responsible, and they have flourished under our rule exceedingly. Secondly, I will remark that the writer, a strong admirer, as I have said, of the English occupation, testifies that the British Agent is indifferent to their existence: nor do I see improvement in this direction, however moderate, mentioned as being among Lord Kitchener's proposed reforms. It is likely enough that, as in Lord Cromer's time, the abominations are being allowed to continue as an accumulating case against the capitulations with a like political end in view, philanthropy notwithstanding. Thirdly, all this has been going on in Egypt proper for thirty years. Mr. Cunningham tells us the same horrors have been introduced by us more recently in the Soudan where the capitulations are not in force. I emphasise that refutation of the capitulation excuse. In the Soudan England is all powerful, the country is under military administration, and for its conquest and occupation by our troops Lord Kitchener himself is the person more than any other responsible. Is it possible that Lord Kitchener as a soldier considers these things to be a military necessity outside the action of his philanthropy? Or, as I myself think, is not this the invariable and unavoidable result of substituting Christian for Moslem rule in Muhammadan lands?

To go on to other and cleaner matters, let us see what Lord Kitchener is actually doing at this moment for the provinces. All the telegrams tell us that he is constructing motor roads. In this he overrides every consideration of expense, and will brook not a day's delay; here, I suspect, we have his real preoccupation far more truly indicated than by what Sir George Arthur ascribes to him. These broad highways of European civilisation, whatever else they may effect, will certainly not be to the fellah's moral elevation; they will be to him like that other "broad road" which we are told "leadeth to destruction." They will spread the moral diseases of the capital wherever they are taken. It is hardly pretended that they will add to his material good, though they will be built at his expense. In their lighter aspects they will attract European tourists; in their more serious they will be a convenience to Lord Kitchener on his tours of inspection; but we may be quite sure that to his military mind their overwhelming reason for immediate building is the military one of increasing the British Army's mobility and strength. We may put them aside altogether in speaking of philanthropy. Of his other schemes in project or begun we have, of course, the great drainage works which are to cost five millions sterling. These he has insisted on inaugurating with much pomp in person, and it is claimed for him as a great proof of his care for fellah interests.

What, however, is the history of this notable and costly enterprise? I will give it in a few words. Lord Cromer in the early days of his administration followed lines in Egypt economically sound. He was adverse to every kind of speculation, he denied himself short cuts to wealth, he would have nothing to do with mines or industrial enterprises, and he limited his interference with the ancient agricultural ways of the fellah to a better distribution of the existing water-supply, a less burdensome collection of the land tax, and an abolition of the corvées levied irregularly by the rich upon the poor. Above all, he discouraged the excessive growth of cotton, preferring to that speculative and exhausting crop, the production of a larger food supply. If he had remained content with this wholesome moderation and had paid off little by little the public debt, he would have indeed earned the fellah's gratitude, and laid the foundations of a really prosperous agricultural State. Unfortunately, he yielded to influences stronger than he could contend with; in the later years of his proconsulship he launched agricultural Egypt on a showier and less certain line of economy. In order to increase the revenue and pay for the conquest of the Soudan, and also in order to satisfy Manchester's demand for Egyptian cotton, the Assouan dam was designed and built, with other costly experiments of irrigation which have transformed good Father Nile to his more glory but less advantage. Much official credit was to be won by this, and much English profit. In vain the native Press protested; it doubted the experimental figures, it doubted the engineering wisdom, it doubted the economical results. Native opinion was not listened to, and English pressure prevailed. The outcome of the experiment has been in three ways destructive of the fellah's well being. It has turned Lower Egypt from being a corn-producing country into a vast cotton field, where the few rich have made themselves richer and the many poor have been brought to greater poverty. All Lower Egypt is now an appendage of Manchester; for the first time in her six thousand years of labour, foodstuffs are being imported into the country. The price of living has been raised fourfold over what I knew it first, while the rate of wages is little higher than it was. The landless poor are in an unhappy plight. Secondly, and most disastrously, it has changed the landed fellah's laborious hoarding habit into one of speculation; he is alternately well off and in poverty, and is consequently more hopelessly than ever in debt. Nor is this all the evil. It has been discovered that the native Press was right. The English engineers had miscalculated their business grossly; they had supplied abundant additional water, but they had made no provision for its being drained away; all the lower lands of the Delta were becoming water-logged, the land was poisoned with salty infiltrations, the cotton crop was becoming deteriorated in quality, and was, moreover, a prey to the cotton worm. I think it was Sir William Willcox, who first declared some years ago that it would need an immediate expenditure of another £7,000,000 to undo the evil done and restore the injured lands to their ancient fertility. Manchester became alarmed at this, and the drainage works are the result.

Of course, I am very glad to see Lord Kitchener undertaking this job which has been long overdue; I should, however, be better pleased if instead of putting himself forward as the representative of England in bestowing a generous gift on Egypt, he had taken the more modest line of treating the matter as an act of reparation for an error and a wrong. I do not doubt Lord Kitchener's sincerity in desiring to see the low lands of the Delta once more prosperous, but I demur at treating it or his energy in the destruction of the cotton by pure philanthropy. I see the Manchester mill chimneys too clearly in the background.

There is only one thing else for me to allude to in Sir George Arthur's article. He tells us Lord Kitchener on his personal initiative is taking up the case of how to check infantile mortality in the villages. With this I should like to sympathise unreservedly; but I am something of a eugenicist, and am a little suspicious, not of the philanthropy, but of the ultimate result of good. There are some few evils in the fellah's life which can be doubtless mitigated by medical treatment. Ophthalmia is one of them, and medical aid on that point can be of certain use without the danger of any corresponding evil. But to submit the villagers to a general course of doctoring and hygienic treatment is a somewhat perilous experiment, whoever undertakes it. Looked at broadly, we find the Egyptian fellah living under insanitary conditions the same as he has had to face during all the thousands of years of his dwelling on the Nile. Yet in spite of these he is robust and vigorous; he is long-lived and exceedingly prolific; he increases in spite of every seeming disadvantage. It is quite certain that he dislikes and fears the sanitary regulations imposed on him by modern science; he generally manages to escape from them. I cannot help suspecting he may be right. How if it should happen that Lord Kitchener, or, let us say, the wisest medical opinion in England, should be doing him an unconscious wrong and impairing his racial vitality.

But I will say no more. The real point of disagreement between me and Sir George Arthur is probably this: he believes in the advantage of what is called European civilisation, especially English civilisation, for the Muhammadan world; I do not. It may have the best intentions, but it does only harm. I believe the worst Muhammadan misgovernment to be a lesser moral corruption for a Muhammadan people than the best Christian rule. We English have a duty of reparation to the Egyptians. We destroyed their fighting strength at Tel-el-Kebir for an Imperial interest of our own, and we owe it to them, to make them once more a nation capable of self-defence in provision for the day of our departure. Our immediate moral duty should be to transfer our own military guardianship to that of the Sultan's troops, make terms for the Egyptians with Europe and withdraw with the least possible delay.—WILFRED SCAWEN BLUNT, in The Fortnightly Review.

Anecdote.

JONATHAN SWIFT, the Dean Swift so well known to fame, dearly loved a joke, and constantly inflicted them on his friends and servants. Sometimes they were kindly enough, and sometimes quite the reverse. In "Martha, Lady Giffard," Julia G. Longe gives an amusing example of the former kind.

Once when the dean was travelling in Ireland he found himself obliged to stay the night at a wayside inn. In the morning, when his servant brought him his boots, he saw that they had not been cleaned: he asked why.

"I thought, sir, as you were going to ride, that they would soon be dirty again."

"Oh!" said his master. "Very well; go and see to the horses." The man obeyed, and in the meantime the dean ordered the landlord not to give his servant any breakfast. When the man returned his master told him to bring the horses round.

"But, sir," remonstrated the man, "I have not yet had my breakfast."

"Oh, that is no matter," replied the dean, cheerfully. "We will start on our journey, for it is certain that if you were to have your breakfast you would soon be hungry again." And he took him breakfastless away. We may suppose that he never again neglected to clean his master's boots when on a journey.

The Moslem University.

"The University of Aligarh."

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE MUHAMMADAN COMMUNITY.

No ONE can be surprised at your keen disappointment at the recently announced decisions of the Government regarding the constitution of your proposed University. But some of us who wish you nothing but well, are surprised that you had not seen before that this disappointment was in store for you. The letter of the Sub-Committee of the Constitution Committee to Sir Harcourt Butler shows, however, that your leaders are at last fully alive to the fact that the scheme of the Muhammadan University is in danger of breaking down altogether, and it is high time that you, the Community as a whole, should realise that the University you have dreamt of can never be yours. For these decisions, declared to be irrevocable, rob the scheme of all those features which roused your enthusiasm and obtained your practical support.

What was the ideal you had before you? An All-India Muhammadan University; a University that should be the centre of culture and education for the Indian Muhammadan world; a University in which the intellectual and religious ideas most precious to you as a Community should find their free scope and their highest expression; a University that, in its universality, its true learning and its Muhammadan atmosphere, might perhaps in time, revive the glories of Cordova and Seville, of Bagdad and Cairo.

This was your dream. But what must now be the reality? Simply Aligarh College, somewhat enlarged and dignified with a new (and empty) title; Aligarh College shorn of its comparative freedom and bound with the red tape of a Government Department; the "University of Aligarh" (save the mark)—local, small, fettered, "cribbed, cabined and confined."

For it is to this that these decisions will reduce your ideal. What was to be "The Muhammadan University," is now to be only the "University of Aligarh;" what was to be a University for All-India, is to be confined to one small place and forbidden to affiliate other Colleges in other parts of the country; what was, above all, to be a University whose special aim should be the free development of Education on Muhammadan lines and according to Muhammadan ideals, is simply to be another Government University, under the direct control of the Governor-General in Council, which, of course, means the Minister of Education and the Education Department. Don't you see that if you go on with the scheme in its present altered shape you will simply be providing the Government with yet another Government University, entirely at your own expense? If you care to do this, of course it will be very kind of you; but it will scarcely be what you first intended to do. Is this to be the result of all your enthusiasm, toil and sacrifice?

It is not for me to criticise the motives of the Government in this matter. No doubt they are sincere in their desire to secure the efficiency of the education provided by your University and in their distrust of your ability to manage a University of your own, without their paternal supervision and control. They are probably sceptical of your organising capacity, and possibly think that some day such an independent centre of intellectual activity might become a centre for voicing inconvenient political opinions. Perhaps they are right! But why did they not tell you so from the very first? It would have been kinder and more straightforward if, when you first approached them two years ago, the Government had told you, with English frankness, that they did not like your scheme and would never sanction it except under the conditions which they are now, in a belated and piecemeal fashion, laying down. But they professed to smile upon your plan and applaud your enthusiasm; and the only condition they imposed then was the practical one that you should first provide the necessary funds. I wonder if they calculated on your proverbial impulsiveness (forgive me), and thought that, long before the necessary thirty-five lakhs had been realised, you would have grown weary of your toy, and would be attracted by another? To your honour, however, you have not grown weary; but with an enthusiasm and self-sacrifice that has surprised and delighted your English well-wishers (and they are many), you have practically raised the money and fulfilled the Government condition. And now, when you come asking for the final granting of your Charter, you find these new and unexpected conditions imposed, which are well calculated to rob you of the result of all your toil. Yes, and you are given to understand that these impossible conditions are not all; more of the same kind are on the way; so that the more you yield, the more you will have to yield. It is the fable of Hercules and King Eurystheus over again; every "labour" Hercules accomplishes simply means another more difficult one imposed.

You can now have no doubt as to what is the real attitude of the Government to your University. You may protest against these alterations in its constitution; but it is no use. The decisions, as Sir Harcourt Butler tells you, are final and irrevocable. If you still go on, and allow this travesty of your ideal to be established, you will find still more formidable difficulties ahead. Will the "University of Aligarh" be allowed, think you, to compete with the existing Government Universities successfully? The Aligarh degrees may be excellent; but will they have the same "Open Sesame" magic in rolling back the doors of Government employment to their possessors as the degrees of Calcutta and Allahabad and Bombay? If the Government, in filling a vacant post, has to decide between two men, otherwise equal, one of whom holds an Aligarh degree and the other a degree from a Government University, will it not be tempted to give the preference to the latter? I am afraid the majority of Indian students look on degrees simply as keys to Government Service; and when they (and their fathers) discover that the Aligarh key does not open the lock as quickly and surely as the Government University key, I fear that their patriotic loyalty to their own University will not be strong enough to hold them to it. Your sons will fight shy of their own University as being an inferior road to Government employment, and then, where will your University be?

You have reached a crisis; and, before it is too late, you must pause and consider seriously whether, in view of all these facts, it is worth while going on with the scheme. Nay: you must consider whether it is right to go on. Those of you who have given the money, did not give for this; and your donors have a right to say: "Either use our money for the purpose for which we gave it, or give it back to us to be used more wisely in our own localities."

Why should Muhammadans in Bombay, Calcutta, Madras and Lahore give money, badly needed for local educational work, simply to enlarge a single College in the United Provinces and bring it more completely under Government control?

If you will be wise, you can still turn your disappointment into a lasting benefit instead of allowing it to become a lasting regret. Thirty-five lakhs of rupees is a large sum, but Muhammadan Education is backward enough to need it all. Some of your best friends, even from the first, were doubtful whether the formation of even such a University as you desired was the very wisest way in which to spend such a sum of money to advance Muhammadan Education.

With your Primary and Secondary Education so weak, to begin with, a University seemed like trying to build a pyramid from the apex. Now you have a chance of retrieving what some of us felt was a mistake. You can now honourably abandon your University scheme altogether. No one can accuse you of cowardice or fickleness. You have done splendidly and shown a courage and determination beyond praise. It is not now your fault that what you strove for cannot be realised. What the Government offers you now is not your scheme; and you would show cowardice and inconsistency, indeed, if you accepted it. You are now perfectly free to say that, rather than spend this money in establishing what you do not want, you will give up the University idea altogether, and, with the consent of the donors, devote the money to the same objects (viz., the improvement of Muhammadan Education), but in a different way. Let this money be formed into a great Muhammadan Educational Fund, to be administered by a carefully appointed and representative Trust; and let it be devoted to building Islamia primary, secondary and high schools, and establishing Islamia Colleges, all over India, wherever they are needed most, and to improving the efficiency of those that already exist. Such solid work could be done in this way as would establish the education of the Muhammadan Community on a sound basis for all time.

If you do this, you may yet be thankful for this disappointment. This money was badly needed for your ordinary educational work; but, perhaps, it could never have been raised except in response to a romantic appeal. Now you have it, do not waste it on this mockery of your hopes. Use it to establish the Education of your children on a solid and lasting foundation, in some such way as I have suggested. Believe me, your best friends will honour you for having the moral courage to refuse to stultify yourselves, for the sake of a false consistency, by obstinately going on with a scheme that is in danger of becoming a laughingstock and a snare.

Yours sincerely,
AN ENGLISH WELL-WISHER.

Press Opinions.

The "Statesman."

IT SEEMS clear that the Government of India have involved themselves in a most unfortunate quarrel with the Muhammadan Community who were already irritated by the course of events in Persia and in Europe, and by the reversal of the Partition of Bengal. The present misunderstanding might have been avoided if the Government had from the first made up their mind what was to be their policy in relation to the proposed sectarian Universities. More than a year ago we pointed out that if funds were collected, and a propaganda carried on for the establishment of such Universities, the refusal of the Government at a later stage to grant a Charter on acceptable terms would provoke deep resentment. The Government, however, did not define their attitude. What they did was to state that they would allow a Muhammadan University at Aligarh and a Hindu University at Benares to be established, provided that a sufficient endowment fund were raised and that the constitution and curriculum were framed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State. It seems probable that they did not at the time seriously consider what educational requirements it would be necessary to demand. They relied, and not without some reason, upon the likelihood that the sum needed for an endowment could not be raised. This somewhat cynical method of putting off the day of decision has, unluckily for the Government, proved illusory. To the surprise of everyone, the Muhammadans, though not a wealthy community, threw themselves into the movement with a zeal which compels admiration and subscribed towards the University which was to revive Muhammadan culture with a wonderful generosity and self-sacrifice. The undertaking became the supreme effort of a people who knew how much they had lost by backwardness in education and who were resolved to make good the deficiency. The enthusiasm displayed was prompted by two considerations. In the first place, the type of education evolved at Aligarh has won the confidence of the Muhammadan community all over India, and, as a consequence, there is a general desire that Muhammadan education everywhere should be shaped and inspired by the University in which the ideals of Aligarh are to be embodied. Hence, the appeal put forth in behalf of the proposed University laid stress on the fact that every locality would benefit by the movement, and it is a credible supposition that no small part of the list of subscriptions was contributed in the belief that Aligarh was to be a beneficent and active centre of Muhammadan education. In this way the funds accumulated until, in spite of all discouragements, the prescribed minimum of 30 lakhs was laboriously got together. Great care was taken to frame the constitution of the University in such a way as to anticipate and meet the objections to which the creation of a sectarian University naturally gives rise. Provision was made for external examiners to secure the maintenance of a high standard. Liberal powers were vested in the Viceroy, who was to be the Chancellor of the University. A large proportion of European professors was stipulated, and their tenure of office was duly safeguarded. When, therefore, the promoters of the University, with their cherished funds and their enlightened constitution came before the Government to claim a fulfilment of the promise made earlier, they had no great misgiving as to the issue. But their optimism was quickly disabused. It was laid down that no affiliation of schools or colleges to the University of Aligarh would be permitted. Further, the promoters were told that the Viceroy was not to be Chancellor and that the powers vested in him would be exercised by the Governor General in Council. And, to accentuate the disappointment even the name of a Muhammadan University was declared inadmissible. The refusal to allow the character of the University to be disclosed in its title was not perhaps a grave matter. Aligarh has a world-wide repute and the name speaks for itself. Presumably, moreover, some compromise could have been arrived at in regard to the powers vested in the Viceroy. It is manifestly unfair that the authority entrusted to the Viceroy personally should be passed over in its entirety to the Education Department. The difference between the Viceroy as an Englishman or Scotchman of rank and distinction and the Viceroy as an expression which signifies the Government of India is obvious. The one is unofficial, the other official; and the reluctance of the promoters of the University to pass from unofficial to official control is justifiable. But the crux of the situation is the question of affiliation. The funds have been gathered on the assumption that affiliation would be sanctioned, and there is already an outcry from nearly all India against devoting money subscribed for the common advantage to the glorification of a single favoured College. It is possible, therefore, that the refusal to grant affiliation may be the death-blow of the whole scheme. Some may suspect that the Government of India were throughout cognisant that with this weapon they could give the project a paralysing stroke. It is more probable, however, that the idea occurred to them after they had approved in principle the formation of a Muhammadan University. More mature reflection perhaps showed them that a University whose organisation would unite Muhammadans all over India might become a political force of undesirable strength and magnitude. Or the growing erudition of the Education Department may have brought to light the fact that the affiliation of external schools and colleges is inconsistent with the establishment of a teaching and residential University. In this view they are undoubtedly right, nor can there be any question that the type of University which India now requires is one in which the University can exercise a direct and effective control over the instruction and daily life of the student. But, however justifiable may be the requirements of Government, the delay in making known the fundamental conditions which they intended to impose on the new University is inexcusable. It is difficult to see any way out of the tangle, and there is certainly no departure from the original scheme of the University which will not rouse strong resentment among Muhammadans throughout India.

The "Empire."

From everything that has come to our cognisance since we last wrote on the subject of the Government and the Mahomedan University we gather that the authorities are now face to face with another agitation which has at least as much the appearance of going on as the agitation against the partition of Bengal. The Comrade in its latest issue openly scoffs at the announcement that the decision of the Secretary of State must be taken as "final" and adds:—"Surely the Government knows that the Committee can recognise only one mandate, and that is the mandate of the entire Moslem community." These bold words are, we understand, being backed up by deeds. We learn from sources which we believe to be trustworthy, that a meeting of the Foundation Committee will be held at an early date to finally settle the attitude of the community upon the question. It is regarded as certain that the Committee will decline to accept the truncated scheme now put forward on behalf of the Government, and this refusal will be immediately followed up by the holding of protest meetings all over India and by the sending of a deputation to England.

In other words, the Mahomedans are about to take a leaf out of the book of the anti-partition agitation, and, judging from the aspect and demeanour of the leaders of the movement, they are even more confident of success. We are informed that there has been the utmost difficulty in holding back the community as a whole from demonstrating, and that the moment the signal is given the agitation will burst upon the country full grown. The advocates of the Mahomedan university have more than 30 lakhs in the Bank. A professor from Aligarh is now on his way to Burma to collect some more, and we are informed that it is proposed to use the interest on the thirty odd lakhs which have already been got together, partly to agitate in favour of the original scheme, and partly to begin the equipment of Aligarh so as to get it into a state of readiness against the time when, as the promoters fully believe will happen, the interdict is withdrawn, and Aligarh becomes the nucleus of a system of higher education which will embrace the whole of India. In short, the Mahomedans of India, led by most of the wealth and education in their ranks, are preparing to force the Government to reverse its final decision in the matter of their University.

We must confess the outlook does not strike us as altogether reassuring. Agitation symbolises unrest. Unrest tends to grow, and to attract to itself interests and aim which its original promoters did not contemplate. An agitation among Mahomedans has, moreover, always held graver potentialities than among Hindus, and it is impossible to ignore the influence which recent developments in the Near East have had upon the opinions and feelings of Indian Mussalmans. We do not profess to know enough about the science of education to be able to say whether the concession of a central Mahomedan university at Aligarh would conflict with the educational interests of India as a whole to such an extent as to warrant the Government in continuing to oppose it at all costs. But if, as seems probable, its opposition proceeds, not so much on educational as on political grounds, we venture to question its wisdom. Whether the growth of communal self-consciousness on the part of the Mahomedans is a thing to be deprecated or not, it is certain that that growth will not be retarded, but rather accelerated by the somewhat erratic opposition which is being offered to this particular scheme.

The "Tribune."

The spirited reply of the Constitution Committee of the Mahomedan University to the letter of Sir Harcourt Butler shows that that body has no intention of accepting the decision of the Secretary of State without protest and is fully prepared to voice Mahomedan feeling on the subject. The Committee takes exception to the restriction of the power of affiliation and to the power of the Chancellor being vested in the Governor-General in Council. It also requests that the naming of the University may be reconsidered. The names given to the two Universities are Hindu and Mahomedan Universities and there is no reason why the Government should change them into Benares and Aligarh Universities. The promise of a liberal Government grant has not effected the firmness of the Committee. It is curious that the Hindu University Committee has so far made no reply to the Education Member's letter. The Maharaja of Durbhunga is now himself an official and he cannot with propriety reply to Sir Harcourt Butler. The remarkable change that is noticeable is that the Hindus appear to be content to let the Mahomedans fight out their battle for them. Only a few years ago it was the other way about. The Mahomedans did not join the Congress because they were aware that they would have their full share if any benefits resulted from the agitation of the Congress while they avoided being called agitators by refraining from joining the movement. When, however, the reforms were conceded they agitated for preferential treatment and succeeded in getting it. Since then they have been steadily feeling sure of their position and have lost no opportunity of asserting themselves. In deference to their protests Mr. Montagu had to withdraw the remarks he had made in the House of Commons about Pan-Islamism. On the present occasion they are right and the general Mahomedan feeling seems to be that rather than have a cribbed and confined Mahomedan University it will be preferable to have none at all.

The "Punjabee."

The refusal of the Government of India to permit the Aligarh University to affiliate mofussil colleges has, as we anticipated, created bitter disappointment. The Comrade discusses the situation in a four-column article and regards the Government of India communiqué as the "Ukase of the Czarism" which takes long "to cure the loyalists of their belief in the Government's kindly consideration." It is suggested this decision is due to the evil advice of Sir Theodore Morison, who in 1898, was favourable to the idea of affiliation. Our contemporary is surprised why Sir Theodore has changed his opinion in 1912 about the Moslems of India whom he knows pretty well. The Comrade says:—

"Not a single argument has been brought forward by the Secretary of State or the Government of India against the phalanx of reasons and yet a final decision has been arrived at. Are we not then justified in suspecting that the Government does not desire the spread of Aligarh Movement? If so, may we not ask what Aligarh has done to deserve this suspicion? It has not turned out Khudiram Boses and Kanhaialal Dutts. It has produced no Dhangra and no Savarkars. Its teaching has been a byword for loyalty and the conduct of some of its Governors has even savoured of subservience. More than a generation of India's 'patriots' has taunted it on the score of trying the sweet uses of flattery. Yet the Government honours patriots and humiliates the subject of their jibes. Such is the statesmanship of to-day and we shudder to think of the destination to which, in certain contingencies, it may lead the Mussalmans of India."

The last reference is a mysterious threat which taken along with the repetition of certain forgotten names may mean anything. But surely there is no room for so much bitterness and bad feeling merely because the power of affiliation is denied to Aligarh. It does not mean that the Benares University will be given what has been denied to Aligarh. And moreover between 1898 and 1912, even the loyal Moslems in India have changed a little. Sir Theodore Morison who knows them, ought to have reasons for considering that affiliation of mofussil colleges is now needless. In 1898 there was no Pan-Islamic movement in India and Mr. Amir Ali had not established the patent text: "Mussalman first, Indian afterwards." When an Arab was wounded in Tripoli the Dacca Moslem's body did not bleed. The cry of "down with Italy" did not produce distant reverberation in the plains of the Himalayas. All these have doubtless conjured up visions of political possibilities of Islam which even Sir Theodore Morison could not safely ignore. The Mahomedans thank their London leader, Mr. Amir Ali, for all this. The Hindus also suffer for this, but we are astonished that the Comrade does not see through it. It is apparent that the Indian Mahomedans must renounce Pan-Islamism before they can get all they want from the Indian Government.

The "Madras Times."

THE decision of the Secretary of State, that the proposed Hindu and Muhammadan Universities shall not have powers of affiliation outside the localities in which they are established, will, no doubt, come as a grievous disappointment to many of the supporters of the schemes, who expected that the two bodies would gradually assume control over all Muhammadan and Hindu educational institutions in the country. At first sight, the decision would appear to restrict the scope of the two institutions, for after all if then control is only to extend over the Colleges at Aligarh and Benares respectively, the number of student who come under their influence must necessarily be extremely limited. On the other hand—and this is the reason of the Secretary of State's decision—once grant an unlimited power of affiliation, and the raison d'être of the new Universities removed. The proposals to establish Universities at Aligarh and Benares came, not because there were not enough Universities in India (though this may be the case), but because it was felt that there was something vitally wrong in the present system, under which the existing Indian Universities are, to all practical purposes, nothing but examining bodies. It was felt amongst the more thoughtful Hindus and Muhammadans that, to fulfil its true purposes, a University must be something far more than a mere examining body—that it must, in fact, teach as well as examine, that it must not only impart knowledge, but mould character, and have a far more vital influence over the lives of its alumni than is possible when its only connection with them is the imposing and determining of educational tests. In these circumstances, and with these objects in view, it was decided, first by the Muhammadans, and later by the Hindus, to establish teaching and residential Universities, at Aligarh and Benares respectively, and the future of the two schemes rests entirely on the carrying out of these aims and objects, failing which, as far as we can see, the new Universities would simply be copies, and probably imperfect copies, of the existing institutions at Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta. Once permit the new Universities to affiliate Colleges outside their own area, and a blow is struck at the teaching and residential systems, which must result in their ultimate disappearance. Were the new Muhammadan University to have, say, one or two Colleges at Aligarh itself, and a dozen in different centres all over the country it would result, if not at once, in the course of a very short time, that the teaching and disciplinary functions of the institution would be subordinated to, and gradually crushed out, by the one pressing idea of examinations, which would be the only means of controlling the outside Colleges. With these possibilities in view, the Secretary of State has, very wisely in our opinion, decided finally against giving the new Universities powers of affiliation outside the localities in which they are established. Though, as we have said, this will no doubt come as a great disappointment to many of the more ambitious supporters of the schemes, they may take comfort from the fact that, restricted to the towns of Aligarh and Benares, the new Universities will be able to follow the high ideals they have set before themselves, and to carry out the residential system to the best possible advantage. The Muhammadan College at Aligarh is already recognized as one of the best educational institutions in India, and its alumni are carrying out its best traditions in their respective walks of life, so that, in India, to have been at Aligarh carries with it the same distinction as does a public school education in England. Though not quite as successful perhaps, the Hindu College at Benares is doing excellent work, and has attracted some of the best talent in India to its teaching staff. With these two splendid institutions already in existence, the new Universities ought to find little difficulty in building up a residential system similar to that prevailing at Oxford and Cambridge, and in becoming the best educational institutions in India.

The "Advocate."

On the eve of an urgent meeting called by the promoters of the Muhammadan University to consider the constitution of the University in the light of the announcement of the Government as to the power of affiliation, the Government of India through the Education Member addressed a letter to the Muhammadans which will be read with feelings akin to disappointment. That the letter has intensified the feeling of disappointment which the two previous communiqués had created goes without saying, and those who were present at the meeting held at Lucknow in the house of the Raja of Mahmudabad on Sunday last say that they found perfect unanimity among the Muhammadan leaders present from all parts of the country on all questions relating to the University. There exists a feeling that the Muhammadans have not received fair treatment. The resolutions passed by the Committee which we publish elsewhere show that the leaders are determined to have a University on the lines laid down by them and not one which the Secretary of State will be pleased to give them on the lines settled by him. They have resolved to submit a representation to the Secretary of State asking him to re-consider his decision on some points which are of great importance in regard to the future of the University. If the Secretary of State declines to re-open the question then the members will not press for a Charter. The question has thus assumed an aspect which is full of difficulties and all the resources of statesmanship will have to be brought together to solve in a manner so as not to lead to any friction or excitement in the country.

We must say that the letter of Sir Harcourt Butler has been rather late in coming. If the Secretary of State was unwilling to grant power of affiliation to the proposed University both for Colleges and Schools, if he felt that the University though denominational in the scope should be local, if it was thought necessary to give the Governor-General in Council powers which he has not reserved to himself in the case of any of the existing Universities, then the promoters of the movement ought to have been told about these things at an earlier stage. Even now the Secretary of State is not pleased to say what are the details which he has yet to settle. There may arise some difference of opinion in the settlement of the details. The Muhammadan University will be a denominational one. We do not understand how can mere change in the name make it non-denominational or territorial. The promoters have collected money from all parts of the country on the distinct understanding of its being an all-India movement. How can they now establish a University which will not appeal to their sense of communal patriotism and religious feeling? The one condition on which an all-India movement can be made successful is that it should appeal to people of all parts of the country and be not confined to one particular province. Everybody will sympathise with the difficult situation in which the Muhammadans have been placed and we trust that the Government of India will yet find out some means of taking them out of it.

The chief debatable problem relates to the power of affiliation. The promoters of both the Universities are anxious to have the power to affiliate colleges and recognise schools. We must frankly state our own views, which may or may not be in agreement with a large number of promoters of either of the two Universities, but they must be stated. The question of affiliation has to be divided into two parts, namely, one dealing with colleges and the other with schools. We are as keen about the Muhammadan and Hindu Universities having the power of affiliation as any member can be, but we find that the Government of India is not willing to grant this power over colleges for reasons stated by Sir Harcourt Butler some of which are weighty. We must for the present accept the power to establish only a teaching and residential University. We can make ourselves sure that the Government of India after some experience of the working of the Universities will give the power of affiliating colleges. There can be no finality in these the matter. We have to prove that the apprehensions expressed by Sir Harcourt Butler are not well founded. We have to establish colleges like the one at Aligarh all over the country, which is not an easy matter, and then go to the Government with the prayer that we may be given the power of affiliating these colleges. There is not a single Muhammadan college besides the Aligarh College which is run on the residential system. Hindus have none besides the Dayanand A. V. College and the Central Hindu College. It will take quite a decade for the two communities to found new colleges on the lines of the Aligarh or the Benares Central Hindu College. Then why should we now quarrel over the grant of the power of affiliation which we cannot use at once. The case with schools is quite different. If the Government insists on our admitting to the Muhammadan or the Hindu University only students who have received their education at Benares or Aligarh the restriction will be absurd. If the Government asks that our Muhammadan friends should make a beginning to start the University with such restrictions, then it will not be worth while to have the Charter. Indian parents will not send their boys in their seventh or eighth year at a distant from their own homes. The Universities if they are to effect the education of the country must be allowed to recognise or affiliate schools all over the country. They should be allowed to hold their own matriculation examinations to which students from all parts of the country may be admitted. They should have full power to admit students passing from the schools recognised by the present territorial Universities as also from schools that may be recognised by them. We hope it will be possible to persuade the Government to allow the affiliation of schools.

The Hindu will naturally support their Muhammadan brethren in all their efforts to get from Government favourable terms, but we think the principal work before the supporters of the Hindu movement is collection of funds. They should first get together Rs. 50 lakhs. Their collections are very poor. They must devote all their energy in the collection of funds, without which they can not even approach Government with any proposal. Such of their leaders as are willing to co-operate with the Muhammadans cannot do so unless they have in their hands the sum of Rs. 50,00,000. We are now sanguine that the Universities will come into existence. There will be some struggle but struggle in a righteous cause always succeeds. When the Government is convinced that on certain questions both Hindus and Muhammadans are united, we are sure it will meet them half way, and we hope Sir Harcourt Butler, to whom the credit of developing the two movements greatly belongs, will before laying down the reins of his present office, have the satisfaction of seeing the Muhammadan and Hindu Universities established.

The "Leader."

WE PUBLISH elsewhere the highly important letters addressed by the Member for Education to the Raja of Mahmudabad and the Maharaja of Durbhanga regarding the proposed Hindu and Moslem Universities. Sir Harcourt Butler therein communicates to the leaders of the two movements the decisions of the Secretary of State, which, of course, are binding upon the Government of India. In the first place Lord Crewe has decided that the universities shall be designated the universities of Aligarh and Benares, the denominational appellation being dropped. In the second place he disapproves of the Viceroy being the chancellor of either university and leaves it to the promoters to elect their own chancellor. In the third place Lord Crewe transfers to the Governor-General in Council the powers which the promoters of the schemes wanted to reserve to the Viceroy as chancellor. Fourthly the Viceroy or the Government will reserve no power of control over the appointment of professors. Fifthly, the Government of India will make a "liberal" grant-in-aid of the universities. Sixthly, the universities will have no power to affiliate colleges outside their own localities.

The Moslem university Constitution Committee met at Lucknow on Sunday under the chairmanship of the Raja of Mahmudabad and passed resolutions disapproving in toto of the Government decisions. The committee declines to delete the word Moslem from the name of the university, it declines to leave in the hands of the Governor-General in Council the powers which it would be content to reserve to the Viceroy, it objects to the condition that outside institutions shall not be affiliated, it still wants the Viceroy to be the chancellor of the university, and it has appointed a sub-committee to draw up a representation to Government in the sense of the resolutions it passed. We publish below Sir Harcourt Butler's letters and the text of the resolutions passed by the Moslem university Constitution Committee.

The attitude of the Moslem community as revealed in the resolutions passed at Lucknow on Sunday and the articles that have been appearing in the columns of Moslem newspapers such as the Observer of Lahore and the Comrade of Calcutta, is one of manifest, we had said determined disinclination to accept the Secretary of State's decisions as final, whereas the two press communiqués and the present letters of the Education Member leave no room for doubt, in our mind at any rate, that there will be no reconsideration of the decisions. Will the Moslem leaders then proceed with their scheme in the altered circumstances or will it rather be abandoned? Appearances point to the latter course as the more probable. What will the promoters of the Hindu university scheme do? Will they agree to delete the word Hindu from the name of the university? Will they agree to have a university with no power of affiliation of outside colleges? Will they agree to the other conditions? We do not know. Nor have we the desire to anticipate the conclusions of the committee of the Hindu university society. We can, however, say what we would do if we could influence the deliberations of that body. Speaking for ourselves, then, we have no hesitation in saying that the conditions may be accepted without disadvantage. Whether the university is expressly designated a Hindu university or simply called the university of Benares, everybody will know that it is the Hindu university, established wholly and exclusively by dint of the exertions of Hindu leaders and by the generous pecuniary support of the Hindu community only. We certainly would not sacrifice a noble, beneficent and grand educational scheme for the sake of a word. It would have lent fresh dignity to the university if His Excellency the Viceroy had been able to see his way to be its chancellor, but if this is not to be we see nothing wrong or inconvenient in the election of an eminent Hindu scholar as chancellor. Hindu leaders are not wanting who, by virtue of their learning, capacity, character, antecedents and status, are eminently worthy of filling the chancellor's chair with dignity and distinction. It is a valuable concession on the part of the Secretary of State to allow the university as an independent non-official body to have its own elected chancellor. Whether the powers reserved to Government be reserved nominally to the Viceroy or expressly to the Governor-General in Council makes hardly any difference in practice as it was not to be expected that the head of the Government of India would find time himself to exercise the powers reserved to him. In either case it would be the Department of Education of the Government of India which would exercise the powers. It is a further valuable concession that the Secretary of State has made in withdrawing the condition that the appointment of professors would be subject to the approval of the Viceroy. As a corollary to this and in order to make the concession of full effect, the Hindu university society may reasonably ask for the withdrawal of the condition about an adequate proportion of European professors being appointed. The aim of the promoters being to impart efficient and useful instruction, they will of their own accord appoint a certain number of competent European professors. The Secretary of State may take this for granted and withdraw the condition as being an unnecessary reminder of the amount of Government control that is imposed. If the Hindu university society accepts the other conditions, we trust Lord Crewe will not insist upon the retention of the one under discussion. We feel grateful for the offer of a liberal Government grant. If there will be no conditions attached to the grant which will be felt as an undue encroachment upon the independent exercise of powers by the university authorities, the grant may certainly be accepted, as they are not likely to have at their disposal so much money realised from the public that they will not know what to do with it. If however the pecuniary support will carry with it an excess of control and destroy the character of the university as a self-governing institution we should certainly advise the university to do without the proffered help. Lord Morley has told us that Gladstone "argued that defective instruction with freedom and self-government would, in the choice of evils, be better than the most perfect mechanism secured by parliamentary interference." And Disraeli said that if he were asked whether he would rather have Oxford free with all its imperfections, or an Oxford without imperfec-tions but under the control of the Government, he would reply, "Give me Oxford free and independent, with all its anomalies and imperfections." So do we say of the Hindu university. Lastly we do not regard it as a calamity that the university will not have the power to affiliate outside institutions. It need not be both an examining and a federal university and a teaching and residential institution. It is immensely more important that it should be the latter. It is not without advantage if the university authorities will concentrate their attention on the university colleges at Benares itself. A group of colleges imparting efficient education in languages and literature, in science and technology, in politics and history, in medicine, with all the teachers and students in residence, moulding character and evolving a higher type of man to take part in the national regeneration of this ancient land, is a picture that appeals to the heart and mind much more than a university with affiliated institutions scattered over a wide and large area, loosely related to one another and inefficiently controlled from the centre.

The reasons given for the Secretary of State's decisions are not so wanting in force that they can be summarily disposed of or attributed to motives that cannot stand examination. Let the Moslem leaders take what decision they may, it is our conviction that the Hindu leaders should not be discouraged by the contents of Sir Harcourt Butler's letters, that they should not think of abandoning their magnificent educational scheme, that they should continue unabated their endeavours to make up the required amount of money and hasten to materialise the project. And we earnestly trust that the subscribed amounts will pour in at an accelerated pace.

The "Beharee."

We may take it that the decision of the Secretary of State is final as regards two important questions in connection with the Hindu and Moslem Universities; firstly, as regards the question of affiliation and, secondly, as regards the name by which each of them will be known, if they should come into existence. To take the latter first, the Secretary of State has carefully refrained from giving any reason, for his decision that the contemplated universities should be known as Aligarh and Benares Universities. While he does not object to the principle of denominational universities why he should object to a denominational style and designation, it is difficult to see, and unless he desires that his decision should be accepted as the fatwas of an unreasoning and unbending mullah, he is bound to assign some reason for this strange decision. But whatever reason he may assign, or fail to assign, the decision has to be considered as final for the time being and the attitude of the originators has to be communicated to the Government of India. The question is if it is worth while to give up the whole undertaking, simply because of the change in the name. It seems to us that this is the least objectionable condition imposed by the Secretary of State and the change is not of such a character as to commend any violent opposition from the promoters of the two universities. On the other hand to many an intelligent, patriotic and thoughtful person the change of names proposed by the Secretary of State will come as a distinct improvement inasmuch as the denominational character of the institutions will not be so jarringly emphasised as in the case of the proposed names. And so far as Hindus are concerned the name "Benares" is as significant to them as the word Hindu and a Benares university in their case is perhaps more expressive than the name Hindu university. It calls forth immemorial associations connected with the holiest place known to them on earth, associations of learning, spiritual culture, devotion, faith and an inflexible spirit of attachment to the eternal and the REAL in existence, which even the word Hindu fails to do. Whereas the name "Hindu university" is nondescript, the name "Benares university" is more tangible and suggestive and carries to the entire Hindu population as close a significance as they might desire of the character of the institution. In the case of the Moslem university also the change is a distinct improvement as Aligarh has become the seat and centre of the hopes of the Muhammadan community, and "Aligarh university" can mean no more than a Moslem university for all practical purposes. Unless the Muhammadans of India desire that the Moslem University should be a bond of union between Moslems of the world, an institution of a pan-Islamic nature, they need not feel disappointed at the change of name. In case any of its promoters have been actuated to any extent by any ambition to make the Moslem university of India a centre of attraction and a focus of activity of a pan-Islamic type, they have every reason to hold that the name "Aligarh university" will do as efficiently for the purpose as the proposed name of Moslem university. But we do not believe that any of the chief promoters of the movement have been actuated by such an extravagant desire and the whole end and aim of the Moslem university movement is to promote the progress of Muhammadan education in India. That being the case both the Hindu and Moslem Committees can accept the change without impairing the object of the undertaking in any way whatever.

As regards the question of affiliation, as we have said before in these columns, the decision is deeply to be regretted. But if the choice is to be between having a Hindu or Moslem University as a purely residential and teaching institution and not having either of them at all, we have not a fraction of a moment's hesitation in accepting and urging the acceptance of a teaching university foregoing the right of affiliation. In fact we must admit that there is a good deal of force in the contention that a denominational university is not quite compatible with the constitution of an examining university, and if a denominational university is to be established at all, it is best to have it as a residential university. We admit that the objection raised by the Secretary of State that the means at the disposal of these universities of satisfactorily exercising efficient control over colleges that may be situated from Kashmir to Travancore, from Assam to Sind, will be too inadequate. Nor are we disposed to belittle the point raised by the Secretary of State that liberty of affiliation may lead to undesirable attempts on the part of colleges to change their affiliation from one university to another. Above all these considerations, there is no seriously controverting the fact that the need of the country in the sphere of higher education is the establishment of teaching universities and not of examining boards. What is really wanted is a seat of learning where examination would be completely subordinated to acquisition of knowledge and assimilation of what is taught, and where acquisition of knowledge is subordinated to the development of the higher faculties of research and enquiry. It is worth all the money we can spend to bring into existence one such university leaving the function of examining to the existing universities themselves. It is absurd that such an institution can undertake the work of examination, for its object is to impart knowledge of facts and methods in such a manner that the university may be said to exist to teach and not to examine, that it teaches, not to examine the candidate in the subjects taught but to develop the higher faculties of a student whose object of study is not to obtain a diploma but to narrow the domain of human ignorance and expand the realm of human knowledge. It may not be every one of those who go to such a university will become a student in this sense, but the ideal of the university is to create the atmosphere for students of this type and each such institution must be a self-contained one and can be neither affiliated to nor affiliate another. The promoters of the Hindu and Moslem universities may well devote their attention and their means to the bringing into existence of genuine teaching universities, rather than attempt to establish two glorified colleges to which inferior institutions may be affiliated. The two above conditions insisted upon by the Secretary of State are such as will be conducive to the good of the university scheme that has been before the public and we should earnestly hope they will be accepted by the promoters. We do not ignore the sense of disappointment such acceptance will engender, but that is due to the unpardonable lethargy of the Government of India in this matter; but apart from the fact that the expected constitution has not been granted, the restrictions themselves are thoroughly sound from the point of view urged by the Secretary of State and need not be understood as subversive of the utility of the institutions or the object entertained by their prime movers.

The "Mahratta."

Another press communiqué has been issued by the Government of India re the Hindu and Mahomedan communities:—"In view of the recent announcement, it is important to state that the decision in regard to the affiliation to the proposed Universities at Aligarh and Benares is the decision of the Secretary of State and is final." Soon after the original communiqué was issued limiting the power of affiliation of the new Universities, Hon. Pandit Madan Mohun Malaviya was reported to have said that the communiqué was not the last word on the subject and was likely to undergo modification, if a case was made out for such modification. We have had, immediately afterwards, the second communiqué, dispelling all hope of modification and setting the original communiqué on the pedestal of a "settled fact." It will be admitted, of course, that the purpose of a teaching and residential university will be much better served by concentrating institutions in one locality than by localising them in different places. At best, the question, however, is one of efficient teaching, and if a University takes the best precautions to see that the teaching in differently located institutions is up to the mark, there can be obviously no reasonable apprehension of separate localisation frustrating the purpose of the University. It would have been perfectly right for Government to have laid down stringent conditions for affiliation of other institutions to the new Universities, say, in the matter of the teaching staff and residence. Such a course would have given the Universities wide field of work and at the same time would have secured the object in view. That would have been a just demand for Government to make. It must be also noted that for the present at least, there is not a very pressing demand for affiliation in respect of these two new Universities. Government have graciously permitted the creation of these two sectarian Universities, and to secure the best results from them, for the immediate present, a scheme of local concentration would be more a matter of necessity than State compulsion. The question of affiliation may arise when the central bodies have shown good results. But in that case the solution also will not be very difficult. Finality is not to be thought of in the affairs of progressive institutions.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Rejoicings are proceeding in Bulgaria to mark the jubilee of the reign of King Ferdinand. His Majesty reviewed the army at the ancient capital of Tirnovo and delivered a speech emphasizing the need for a pacific policy. The speech has had a tranquilizing effect on the population.

The German Emperor has given ten thousand marks for the relief of the sufferers in the recent earthquake.

The Ecumenical Patriarch has wired to the Archbishop of Canterbury appealing to British generosity.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on August 17th:—The Christians have risen in the Turkish district of Berano. They seized two villages and plundered the town. The Turkish troops replied by cannonading the Christian villages. The Christians thereupon attacked and razed three Turkish blockhouses on the Montenegrin borders. Fighting near Berano is going on day and night. Both sides have suffered heavily. The Turks threaten to exterminate the whole Servian Christian population in the revolted district.

Reuter learns that Austria-Hungary has invited the Powers to take part in an exchange of views with regard to the condition of the Balkan Provinces of the Ottoman Empire.

Count von Berchtold's invitation to the Powers to take part in an exchange of views with regard to the Balkan provinces is much commented on.

The inspired Austrian press is careful to explain that intervention in the affairs of Turkey is not contemplated. Austria merely wants to assist Turkey to carry out her desire to conciliate nationalities and convince the latter of the necessity for facilitating the task of appeasement. There is no idea of summoning a European conference and the conversations will be conducted by the Ambassadors.

The European press generally gives a cautious approval to the suggestion. Some attribute it to a desire to anticipate the action of Russia as a result of the conversations at St. Petersburg. It is regarded as significant that Count von Bechtold is returning to the European fold which Count von Aehrenthal shunned.

The Austro-Hungarian continues to emphasize that there is no suggestion that the Powers should intervene in Turkey's affairs. The only desire is to ensure quiet in the Balkans till the new Turkish Government has been given full opportunity to meet the demands of the various nationalities in the Turkish Empire. At the same time the Powers will give pacificatory advice to the Balkan States.

Count von Bechtold's action is regarded as inexplicable in Constantinople because there is no question of decentralisation in Macedonia or grant of autonomy to Albania. The demands of the Albanians to which the Porte has agreed are in accordance with the existing laws. Further developments in connection with Count von Bechtold's proposals are considered impossible.

A state of panic prevails at Uskub which a large force of Albanians have entered and are pillaging and releasing the prisoners. They now threaten to march to Salonika. Three thousand are reported to have reached Kiuprili.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—The Government in a communiqué says the period of revolution inaugurated in 1908 must be ended. That of evolution has begun. It emphasizes the desire of the Government to pursue a policy of conciliation.

Reuter wires from Rome:—The Italians advanced from Zuara with the object of occupying an important group of heights in order to cut off supplies from the Tunisian frontier. They carried the position after a hard day's fighting, losing six killed and ninety-eight wounded. Five officers were wounded. The Turkish losses were heavy.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—It is understood that pourparlers have been begun between the new Turkish delegates and the Italian representatives to discover a basis for the conclusion of peace.

The Times of India correspondent, writing from Aden on August 4th, says:—A persistent rumour is current here that a party of Italian sailors landed from an Italian cruiser off Zanzibar coast at Rasal Mugamalah, which is some hours away from Hodeida, and that some of the Arab tribesmen there fired on them, killing two. As a consequence the Italian cruiser is said to have bombarded Rasal Mugamalah, but no serious losses are reported. According to a private telegram just received from Hodeida an Italian warship is bombarding the Turkish ports and the military quarters at Hodeida.

Reuter wires from Cetinje on August 19th:—Reports in connection with the situation on the Montenegrin border are alarming. The massacres in Berano district are continuing. The frontier is crowded with refugees. A general state of excitement prevails. The Malissori tribes are threatening Scutari.

The Turkish account of the Berano incident accuses Montenegrins of distributing arms among the Christians. The impression is increasing in Constantinople that Montenegro is determined to force a quarrel.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—It is denied here that the Albanians are pillaging Uskub, but they have decided to levy a toll on the inhabitants for the purpose of covering expenses. It is reported that a hundred Albanians have succeeded in arriving at Salonika. The authorities have announced that they will arrest them unless they return to their homes.

Count von Bechtold's invitation continues to figure most prominently in the Press.

The Neue Freie Presse states that Germany, Italy and Russia have accepted his proposal. Great Britain and France have not replied, but it is expected that they will accept.

A section of the French Press insinuates that Count von Bechtold's object was to obtain entrance to conversations from which Austria was excluded on the occasion of the visits of the Kaiser and M. Poincaré to Russia.

The attitude of the British Press is cordial but cautious, the papers complaining of the vagueness of the proposal.

A telegram from the Dardanelles states that on the night of the 17th instant the Italian Fleet appeared off Tenedos close to the Dardanelles.

Reuter wires from Salonika on August 20th:—Three Turkish Divisions are concentrating at Kiuprili and will attack the Albanians failing their submission.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—An agreement has been reached between the representatives of the Government and the Albanians who have begun to return to their homes.

It is believed at London on 21st August that the pourparlers between the new Turkish delegates and the Italian representatives with a view to the conclusion of peace are being conducted in Paris between Turkish Ministers from Sofia and Cetinje and the Italian ex-Ambassador and two officials. It is understood that negotiations are making headway.

The Porte and Powers have invited Montenegro to withdraw the troops from Berane where fighting is still proceeding.

While the situation in North Albania appears to be more settled, advices from the Turco-Montenegrin frontier are serious. It is stated that the Montenegrins have burned several blockhouses and are besieging others. The German semi-official press warns Montenegro that Europe cannot allow her to stir up trouble.

Emperor Francis Joseph has given £400 in aid of the sufferers by the earthquake in Turkey. A Mansion House Fund has also been opened. The French Government has given 10,000 francs in aid of the sufferers by the Turkish earthquake.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 22nd August:—News has arrived here of the resignation of the Montenegrin Cabinet, which is regarded as paving the way of the present situation. A telegram to the Daily Telegraph from Constantinople says that the Foreign Minister has good hope of seeing the Montenegrin question settled soon.

It is hoped that the report of the Commission of Enquiry into the Kechana incident, which will soon be published, will appease Bulgaria.

The Porte has circularised Ottoman representatives with regard to the Berano incident, stating that it does not accept responsibility for consequences of Montenegrin aggression. A strong Turkish force is being concentrated at Berano.

Reuter learns that Bulgaria is anxiously awaiting the details of Count von Bechtold's proposals regarding the Balkan States. Bulgaria thinks that decentralisation will only benefit the Albanians. Bulgaria will only accept local self-government. France has accepted Count von Bechtold's invitation to take part in the exchange of views with regard to the Balkan Provinces.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—Hussein Hilmi Pasha, Minister of Justice, has resigned. Ferid Pasha, President of the Senate, has been appointed Minister of the Interior and Senator Halim, Minister of Justice.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—In an interview, the Foreign Minister admitted that semi-official negotiations with Italy were proceeding.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on August 22nd:—Ferid Pasha has declined the Portfolio of the Interior.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on August 23rd:—The departure of King Ferdinand and M. Gueshoff, the Premier, for Europe, and of the Austrian Ambassador for a holiday is regarded as reassuring.

The Montenegrins have withdrawn from Berane.

Four hundred Malissori, led by priests, attacked Durazzo. They were eventually routed by reinforcements. The Malissori lost 30 killed and 70 wounded. There were a few Turkish casualties.

News by the English Mail.

Berlin, August 2.

The Vossische Zeitung recently telegraphed to Enver Bey, the Turkish commander at Benghazi, Tripoli, asking for information as to the condition of his health and the situation of the Turks, and also as to whether peace was in sight. The following reply, dated Derna, Tripoli, July 28, was received to-day:—

"Both myself and the Turkish army are in splendid condition. We don't bother about peace.—Enver."

The fact that the message is dated from Derna, 160 miles distant from Benghazi, appears to indicate that Enver Bey is in the immediate vicinity of this place, which is occupied by the Italians.

Rome, July 31.

Commander Millo has sent a report, the first part of which has been published, on the recent attack on the Dardanelles by five Italian torpedo boats. He states that the object of the raid was to torpedo the Turkish Fleet. The Splca, Astore, and Climene were to attack the three outermost warships, while the Centauro and Persue were to penetrate among the fleet and to destroy the others and a big vessel laden with mines. The attempt failed, all the audacious raiders except the Centauro being hit, though without damage. The second part of the report is being kept secret. Eight copies were prepared, of which one was delivered to the King, the second to the Premier, and the others to the Ministry of Marine.

Constantinople, August 1.

The publication of the names of persons included in the amnesty has provoked the hostile criticism of many members of the Committee of Union and Progress, who profess to dread the reactionary tendencies of the former members of Abdul Hamid's entourage. But the balance of opinion favours the measure on the ground that the members of the old Yildiz Camarilla are mostly broken in health and spirit and will return to a country which whatever its present difficulties are, does not evince the slightest desire to go back to the system of Palace government which made the dominance of the Tahsins, Izzets, and Raghibs possible.

Vienna, August 1.

The amnesty granted to the Turkish exiles elicits adverse semi-official comment from the Neues Wiener Tagblatt, which deprecates the return to Constantinople at this juncture of prominent representatives of the Hamidian régime. While it is a sound principle to pursue a beaten enemy, writes the Tagblatt, it is, to say the least, impolitic and imprudent to enlist auxiliaries of such quality as Izzet Pasha, Tahn Pasha, Munir Pasha, and others. The return of Cherif Pasha, one of the initiators of the Military League, is natural: his party has triumphed and its leaders are evidently entitled to appear upon the scene. But the resuscitation of some of the most dangerous influences of the past is a proceeding the more dubious in that it appears to have been unnecessary.

The Situation in Albania.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung telegraphs that the Albanian rebels are stated to be considering the plan of marching on Salonika in order to release Abdul Hamid, "who for thirty years was a father to them." Isa Boletinat, who has arrived at Mitrovitsa, and one of his first acts was to open the local prison and to release and arm all its inmates.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, 25th July.

The Albanian chiefs who are conferring with the peace mission at Prishtina have demanded the immediate dismissal of a number of unpopular officials. The rebellion in Northern Albania is extending. Troops and gendarmes continue to join the rebels. Signs of an intention on the part of the rebels to demand the autonomy of Albania are becoming evident.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, July 26.

The new Cabinet has begun its efforts to deal with the Albanian question with the despatch of a long manifesto to the population of the northern province. The document opens with a flattering reference to the Albanian qualities, and indicates the peaceful tendencies of the Ministry by laying down the axiom that henceforth the use of armed force against the Albanians is categorically forbidden on any pretext. Dealing with the question of the dissolution of the Chamber, the Government states that it is proceeding with a rigorous inquiry and has decided to nullify the election of deputies who owe their seats to the undue influence of the Committee. The reforms demanded are to be the subject of inquiry by a commission which leaves Constantinople without fail on Thursday. The Commission is endowed with authority to treat and to conclude an accord with the Bairaktars. The Government further promises to indemnify the peasantry for damage done by pillage during the recent military operations.

Following on Hassan Bey's entry into Prishtina, the prisoners profited by the confusion to make good their escape. They seized Mausers and ammunition and opened fire on the gendarmes. The result of the ensuing engagement was that 18 were killed and 17 wounded on both sides. The rest of the prisoners fled.

A battalion of Infantry has left Monastir for Uskub.

July 27.

The latest news from Albania confirms what I have already telegraphed concerning the amicable tendencies of the new Ministry and the determination of the rebels to drive home their advantage. Hassan Bey, who has installed himself director-general of the movement at Prishtina with a force, according to his own estimate, of 50,000 men, has taken charge of the telegraph system and transmits orders to the friendly Bairaktars like a commander-in-chief. He has advised Abdul Bey at Tirana and Azida Pasha at Elbassan to hold themselves in readiness to receive instructions. Boletinat, who is now in Yeni Bazar, has imprisoned the local director of telegraphs for refusing to transmit his soi-disant official despatches without payment.

The Albanian chiefs have accepted the pacific assurances of the Cabinet in so far as they have ordered their adherents to avoid bloodshed. This was demonstrated at the Pass of Katchani, which was threatened by a strong force of rebels. The commandant of the six battalions stationed there summoned his enemy to retire and thus avoid the necessity of his attacking them. The Albanians thereupon withdrew, but continue to menace the position.

There is reason to believe that the Government contemplate returning to Prishtina the families of rebels removed to Uskub. This removal, designed with the idea of forcing the rebels to return to their homes, did more than anything else to fan the flames of revolution.

I note, however, among Kassovo officials a tendency to adhere to the Committee idea that the temper of the Albanians is such that, failing their coming to an arrangement with the military commandants, the only method of settlement consists in the use of armed force. This attitude is ably exposed by the special correspondent of the Committee organ Roundlie, who, writing from Prishtina, declares that the agitation is the result of intrigues undertaken by the Ententi Libérale with Russia, Italy, Austria, Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro, and concludes:—"Les meilleurs désinfectants contre cette pourriture sont le canon et la mitrailleuse."

The officers of the Djakova Corps, who have made common cause with the insurgents, explain their action on the ground that when leaving Constantinople they received orders to fire against brother Mussulmans. On arriving in Albania they found that the neighbouring States were seeking an opportunity for intervention, which would have occurred had they obeyed their instructions. Consequently, they had no option but to make an agreement with the rebels. They insist on their demand for the dissolution of the Chamber.

A battalion of Reservists has left Drama for Ferizovitch.

July 28.

The Parliamentary Commission reaches Prishtina to-day. Pending its arrival, the armistice has been observed on both sides. The rebel control of the province is, however, complete, and with the exception of Ipek all the Government centres are occupied by Albanians, who have driven out the Turkish officials. Hassan Bey has prohibited the despatch of cipher telegrams over the wires and has forbidden the troops to advance from their present positions. When Hassan entered Prishtina the garrison consisted of six battalions of infantry, four squadrons of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery.

The chiefs assembled at Prishtina, in telegraphing their thanks to the Sultan, call attention to the statements of certain foreign journals to the effect that they intend to proclaim separation from the Ottoman Empire. Denying these reports they add that now that they have a Cabinet of experienced statesmen in whom they have confidence they beseech the Khalif to order the dissolution of the Chamber.

The Slav population of Novi Bazar have likewise telegraphed to the Sultan expressing loyalty and demanding new legislative elections.

The meeting of officers who are partisans of the Committee was held here on Thursday. It was attended by only 150 adherents.

In order to reinforce the Macedonian divisions, which are at present under strength, 11,500 new recruits from the Smyrna, Aidin, and Sandukli districts are being called to the colours. This measure, however, has been decided upon, more in view of the general political situation than from any anticipation of adverse developments in Albania.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 26.

Though the Albanian insurgents in Kassovo province and their military allies received the news of the advent of the new Ministry with enthusiasm, they have neither slackened their military preparations nor ceased to bring pressure to bear on the Government to dissolve the Chamber. Furthermore, there is no doubt that the insurrection, which, till recently, was localized, is spreading throughout Albania, from Ipek to Argyrocastro, with the tacit consent or overt co-operation of a large proportion of the local forces.

During the last 24 hours numerous telegrams received from foreign Consular authorities, or from representatives of Turkish newspapers, which no longer dread the censorship, show that the First (Ildiz) Division, which was sent to Albania in June, has deposed its Commander, Hassan Izzet Pasha, and is making common cause with the insurgents; that practically the whole of the Uskub and part of the Monastir Army Corps are either joining the Albanians or refusing to engage them, and that Prishtina, with its artillery stores and arms depôt, has been occupied by the insurgent army, led by Hassan Bey, ex-member for Prishtina, Riza Bey, and other noted Bairaktars, who control the railway and are now engaged in telegraphing their demands to Constantinople. It also appears that on the 18th instant two battalions guarding Hass, between Tchernoleva Ferizovitch and Prizrend, were attacked by a great force of Moslem Malissori plainsmen. Some troops deserted, others surrendered, and some 300 fell fighting, with most of the Committee officers. Six hundred prisoners, 1,000 rifles, and 25 loads of ammunition fell into the hands of the victors. Hair-ed-Din Bey, the Turkish Commandant, accused of cruelty to Albanian women, was hanged within a hollow square composed of captive soldiers on the spot where the famous Bairaktar of the Krasmitch clan, Shaban Binaku, was executed in 1910 after surrendering on terms.

Grand Vizier's Statement of Policy.

Constantinople, July 30.

The following is the text of the programme of the new Turkish Ministry as read by the Grand Vizier in the Chamber to-day.

The Government expresses the hope that all Ottomans, appreciating the exceptional gravity of the historic times which the country is passing through, will facilitate its task by observing calm and tranquillity. We expect from the Press, on whose patriotism we rely, the fulfilment of its patriotic duty by strengthening the union of patriots and by not making the subject of disputes the effective precautionary measures that have been taken by the civil and military authorities for the maintenance of order.

If we analyse the causes of the discontent which have led to the present difficulties, we find there are four: first, the interference and illegal actions of officials during the elections; secondly, the participation of the Army and officials in party politics; thirdly, the violation of the provisions of the existing laws in the distribution of powers; fourthly, anti-constitutional proceedings and measures.

As for the first grievance, we are proceeding within the law to an examination of the complaints in regard to the elections. We shall not fail to do what is necessary within the law in conformity with the results of the inquiry. Concerning the second grievance, we shall prevent the Army without exception from taking part in politics, and we shall also dismiss all officials who depart from a strict neutrality towards citizens. In order to abolish the third cause of discontent we shall apply literally the existing laws and regulations on the appointment, dismissal, and promotion of officials. We shall entrust all posts to competent persons of proved ability. As for the last grievance, it has been proved that the happiness and tranquillity of all the countries of the world depend upon respect for the laws. Without law, disorder and calamities occur. Now we are firmly resolved not to depart from the path of legality either in the administration of the country or in the proposal of laws. Thus we have decided to repeal and annul the provisional laws in force before our coming into office, laws contrary to the Constitution.

Our fundamental maxim shall be the strengthening of Ottoman fraternity by respect for all privileges and rights which the Constitutional charter concedes and recognizes for all Ottoman elements without distinction of race and religion. The work of reform is the basis of our programme. Our financial intentions will be set forth in the Budget of next year.

You know that for ten months we have been in a state of war with Italy. Until bases of peace compatible with our rights, honour and dignity have been found we shall continue with rigid resolution to defend our country and to protect our rights against the attack of which we are the object, leaning on Divine aid and the self-denial of the Ottoman race. With regard to our foreign policy we shall continue and elaborate that inaugurated after the resolution of 1908, which was followed with complete success until the beginning of 1909, approved on several occasions by the Chamber as being in perfect conformity with the sentiments and interests of the Ottoman nation, and received with favour also by the Great Powers.

Our relations with all the friendly Great Powers are distinguished by sincerity and cordiality.

The Demands of the Officers.

(PRESS ASSOCIATION FOREIGN SPECIAL.)

Constantinople, July 26.

THE local papers publish the text of the programme of the Military League, the self-styled "Group of Saviour Officers." After pointing out the gravity of the present crisis, the authors say:—"Although it was believed that the Constitution had saved the Ottoman Empire, nevertheless the country has been progressing towards its ruin with the same speed as under Abdul Hamid. Thus the opinion has gained ground in Europe that nothing will prolong the days of the Ottoman Empire, which is destined to disappear as an independent Power. The Italian aggression in Tripoli and Europe's indifference thereto constitute the first fatal but significant proof of this new attitude. In face of the danger threatening it the Empire has been compelled to appeal to Ottoman officers. Although we desire the abstention of officers from intermeddling in politics, we are unable to remain silent in face of the illegal acts and violations of the Constitution committed by those seeking only their own personal advantage. We must think of the misery awaiting us if the Fatherland is a prey to the stranger. Those are speaking in the name of patriotism to-day who seek to harness us to their chariot, and would then seek refuge in Europe, which, indeed, some of them have already done, in order to devour in tranquillity the money of which they have robbed the country. Therefore our duty is to persist in those demands which were the battle-cry of the army four years ago when the tyranny of Abdul Hamid was destroyed. It should be noted that, owing to the bad administration of the Government, the army is unable to find time to devote to special studies, because all its time is taken up with superfluous military expeditions. We are, therefore, compelled to form a Military League. We are ready to obey the injunctions of patriotic duty, military honour, and humanity. We have no personal exigencies. We wish to prove to our enemies that Turkey has no lack of men prepared for any sacrifice to save their country."

The Confusion in Turkey.

TELEGRAPHING ON July 26th, the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung says:—"The prospects of a normal course of affairs are more slender than ever. The Ministry lacks not so much experience as unity. The burning question of the dissolution of the Chamber gives rise to great differences. Some of the Ministers regard the dissolution of the Chamber as a breach of the Constitution, which they are anxious to avoid. There is likewise no agreement on the question of the treatment of Albanian affairs. The difficulties are increased by the latent differences among the officers. Here, too, there is a split. Officers' committees are springing up like mushrooms, and make the confusion worse founded. Scarcely have the officers decided to keep away from politics than new demonstrations are made which show the contrary. The officers' pronunciamento which caused the fall first of the generalissimo and then of the Cabinet has had the effect of depriving the Crown of all influence. It has become the plaything of passions, and is obliged in its helplessness to let things run their course. New developments are bound to follow this situation—in fact, a change on the throne is being earnestly discussed, and public attention gravitates to this question more and more."

The correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt gives another aspect of the situation. "The events in Albania," he writes on Thursday, "are apparently effecting a change in public opinion here. The Tanin asserts that the execution of the officer Hairi Bey at Djakova by the rebel chief Riza Bey has caused a profound commotion in the army. This act has covered the cause of the Albanians with disgrace. The feeling in the country is rapidly becoming more friendly to the Committee. Protests are coming in from all parts of the country against the dissolution of the Chamber. The differences are becoming more and more acute. The country is on the eve of grave events. The Government Commission will not go to Albania just yet. The Government is embarrassed by the boundless demands of the Albanians. A reconstruction of the Cabinet is possible."

Commenting upon these events, and especially on the ultimatum said to have been transmitted to the Chamber by the officers of the Military League, the Berliner Tageblatt says:—"This league, which embraces the so-called liberal—in reality conservative—elements among the officers, had co-operated in the revolution of April, 1909, and in the overthrow of Abdul Hamid. As it nevertheless still remained suspect in the eyes of the Young Turks, it saw itself gradually excluded from the advantages of the new régime. Its members were not promoted, and all the chief and most influential posts were filled with adherents of the Committee. Since the power of the latter began to wane the officers of the league became bolder and more venturesome. Now when they have achieved a great triumph by overthrowing Said Pasha's Cabinet some of them apparently think that the time has arrived for wiping out their opponents altogether. And all this at a moment when Turkey is carrying on a war and is beset by the gravest foreign difficulties! However great the errors and sins of commission and omission of the Young Turks may have been, the present action of the Military League has inflicted upon the Empire still greater damage."

Turkey and the Committee.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

A WELL-INFORMED correspondent writes to us from Constantinople under date of 22nd July:—

Things are very uncertain here. A short time since the Committee seemed quite firmly established in power. A strong despot alone can govern Turkey; and the Committee had apparently crushed all opposition, nominated a devoted Parliament, and succeeded in making itself supreme. There is, of course, no party of "Old Turks;" all are "Young Turks;" but the opposition favoured a real Parliament, and open free criticism, and all the other things that we call liberty. The Committee was doing a considerable amount of good, and there can be no doubt that they have been slowly constructing a machine for governing. Now, however, we learn from European papers that the opposition to the Committee, though crushed in Parliament, is making itself felt in the army, where it is much more dangerous.

The opposition consists of the best among the "Young Turks"—in the sense of the most high-minded and idealist,—but they are devoid of constructive ability, and have no common policy and nothing except ideals, all inconsistent with each other. Riza Tewfik, a moderate and patriotic man, was seized and beaten by orders of the Committee, when he presented himself as candidate for re-election at Adrianople; most of his small patrimony was destroyed, and he fled to London. He was repeatedly warned by the agents of the Committee, but would take no heed.

The truth is that it is absurd to think of Parliamentary Government here. The people want a despot; they do not want freedom: they are like the Cappadocians, who, when Rome gave them freedom, sent to Rome and begged for a king. Rome marvelled that people should prefer despotism to freedom, and appointed a king. The Turks don't know what to do with themselves, and there would be anarchy everywhere if a real Parliament began: that I now see, must result. A strong despot is wanted, and the Committee, with all its faults, was the strong despot. I hope (little as I like it) that it may succeed.

Bulgaria and Macedonia.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

Sofia, July 25.

THE resolutions of the recent conference of the Macedonian revolutionary committees here seem to show that the "Inner Organisation" has lost all patience. It is impossible to give these resolutions in full, as the conferences were naturally secret, but they deal with two points—the politics of Bulgaria and the revolutionary activity in Macedonia. There are to be a press campaign and a series of meetings in Bulgaria in favour of immediate war with Turkey, and an attempt is to be made to force the hand of the pacific Premier, M. Geshoff, and constrain him to give up his "Turcophilism."

In Macedonia the activity of the bands is to be increased, and there are to be still more terrorist attacks on public institutions, or even on private property—the outrage against the Ottoman Bank may be remembered. There are, besides, to be local risings where the population is best prepared for an armed struggle. The aim is to increase the disorganisation of Turkey and at the same time to provoke reprisals, which cannot fail to arouse the indignation of Europe and bring about an intervention in Macedonia, on the part of European diplomacy—and of Bulgaria.

The Powers and the War.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Berlin, August 1.

THE Cologne Gazette published last night a long telegram from Berlin on the subject of the war, the prospect of negotiations, and the future of the Turkish Empire. Its interest is not so much that it reveals the conviction that peace negotiations are not far distant, as that it appears to invite a discussion regarding the situation which may follow them, and seeks to explain to the Powers in good time that their interests are the same as Germany's. The writer begins much on the lines of a leading article on the same subject in the Frankfurter Zeitung, by drawing, from the words of Hilmi Pasha on Tuesday, the conclusion that the disinclination for negotiations is less acute than before. Although the military successes of Turkey are such as to make an uncompromising spirit in the Army perfectly intelligible, it is with the diplomatists that the decision rests, and it is for Mukhtar Pasha, Noradungian Effendi, and Kiamil Pasha to ask themselves whether the African and Aegean situations warrant a continuation of the war.

The writer then proceeds to distribute compliments among the Powers for their gentle and self-sacrificing attitude towards Turkey, and to question the virulence of the disintegrating influences. The prediction made at the beginning of the war that the hostilities would create international complications in connexion with the Balkan question has been proved quite wrong. On the contrary all the Great Powers have of late made it quite clear that it is their intention "not only to prevent an extension of the trouble during the war, but also to secure to Turkey her position as a Great European Power and thereby to have a guarantee of Balkan peace in the future as well." Russia, it is urged, has by her policy given the lie to the suspicion that Turkey would be involved in difficulties through her. Nor is it to be expected that the attitude of the small Balkan States will give rise to any complications. Equally above reproach is Austria-Hungary, "which has never left it in doubt that she had a paramount interest in the maintenance of a strong European Turkey." Finally Pan-Hellenism is at a discount, and is not encouraged by Italy. The telegram proceeds:—

"The policy of England and France is visibly founded on the thought that Turkey must be spared as far as possible any far-reaching complications, while, in order to say the same of Germany, one need only appeal to the friendly feeling which we have always felt for the Turkish Empire and have always translated into action. Europe thus presents for once in an important question of the present time the unusual picture of unanimity of thought and action."

England to Blame.

SIGNOR GAABIELE D'ANNUNZIO, the famous Italian writer, who is on a visit to Paris, discussed with a Herald representative Mr. Winston Churchill's reference to the Italian fleet.

There had been, he said, a change lately in the Italian sentiments towards England. Discussing the causes, he declared that "the malevolent, mendacious, and contemptible campaign of some English newspapers in connection with the so-called 'atrocities' in Tripoli first amazed, then pained, and finally infuriated all Italians. We were accustomed to consider England as the firm friend, as the protectress of Italy, whose friendship and support could be depended upon in any crisis."

"We feel that England has not given Italy the support that Italy had every reason, had every right to expect. The prolongation of the war is in a great measure a consequence of England's policy. England could end the war, could have ended it long ago, with a word. If England had wished to prove the reality of the professions of friendliness towards Italy she had only to adopt a resolute attitude in Constantinople in the early phase of the war. Italy would have been on her side."

"However, the war has demonstrated to the world that the regeneration of Italy as a military Power is an accomplished fact. No one with eyes in his head can possibly have failed to realise years ago the perfection of Italy's maritime power."

"Mr. Winston Churchill," he added, "is quite right: the Italian fleet must, from now on, form an element in all international calculations. Whether England should regard it as a weapon to be wielded for her or as one that may be used against her is a question that England's actions will answer."

Afraid of Tripoli.

THE Vossische Zeitung prints from its Vienna correspondent a message about the desertions from the Italian army, which, it seems, have of late become exceedingly frequent. Thus, a few days ago, during the exercises of the Italian artillery near the frontier of Tyrol, four artillerymen, in spite of the cordon drawn along the frontier, succeeded in crossing by mountain passes into Tyrol, pleading bad treatment and fear of being sent to Tripoli. Since last Thursday two Italian Bersaglieri may be seen at Bozen in full uniform, but without their swords, which have been taken away from them. They, too, have deserted because they did not want to go to Tripoli. A couple of days before two other Bersaglieri were stopped near Landro by the Austrian frontier guards. They made no attempt to hide, but admitted that they had deserted in order to avoid being sent to Tripoli. Lastly, on the very day of the despatch of the telegram (Tuesday), four deserters were brought in to Görz who explained that they had left the colours for fear of being sent away to Tripoli.

Old Turks and Young.

A STUDENT of Eastern Affairs who wanted to define the inner psychological difference between the old régime in Turkey and the new, might dwell with a lingering and affectionate interest on the place of the Ghazi in each. The title of Ghazi is the proudest which any Turk may wear. There is nothing quite so honorable in Europe. We confer a dukedom on a great soldier, which his descendants make haste to vulgarise and cheapen. The Turks confer the honorific distinction of Ghazi, which means simply victor. Very few of them have borne it in our time, and only two were of any real note. One was the old lion of Plevna, Osman Pasha, and the other was the equally distinguished, if not quite equally famous, Mukhtar Pasha of Kars. Their fate under Abdul Hamid was pitiable and mean. He cared nothing so much as a great soldier—not even an Armenian bomb-thrower. Osman Pasha he kept always about him, a palace prisoner, and degraded him to the level of his lackeys and his eunuchs. The brave old man might be seen driving by his side once a week in his state carriage; for the rest he was a captive. The other Ghazi, Mukhtar Pasha, was sent into a sort of splendid exile in the Turkish residency at Cairo, where he relieved the tedium of oblivion by studying Lord Cromer, and talking with the Nationalist leader, Kamel. To-day the world is changed. A Ghazi is no longer a danger to the throne whom a jealous Sultan thrusts into an honorable obscurity. He is a pillar of society, a prop to the tottering Empire, a rallying name to be raised to power in the hour of direst danger and crisis. That is the real significance of the nomination of Mukhtar Pasha to the Grand Vizierate. The Empire needs a popular head, whom soldiers will venerate and crowds applaud. He has come to power at last after his years of exile, a Wellington summoned to overawe Tories and Whigs alike. Nothing has been done by halves. Three former Viziers stand by his side—the octogenarian Kiamil, the astute Hilmi who kept Europe at bay in Macedonia, the suave Ferid who ruled the Porte in the last days of the old régime. The new Cabinet means nothing from the standpoint of parties and ideas. But emphatically it means the rallying of the Old Turks, the experienced octogenarian Turks, against the extravagances of the Young.

Despotism has been shaken and destroyed. In the new crisis the personality of the Sultan and the sacrosanct authority of the Caliph counted for nothing at all. He was fain to summon a Ghazi to his aid. The choice means, finally, the recognition of a popular era, in which the forces of personal popularity may decide the fortunes of an Empire. But it is not yet the democracy of the West. Much is altered in Turkey, but in one characteristic it is more Turkish than ever. It has returned to the military epoch which seemed to have ended somewhere about the 'thirties and 'forties of last century. Thereabouts Turkey entered on a civilian phase. Great civil servants ruled at the Porte. A centralised bureaucracy grasped authority, and the plague of the telegraph began to unify the provinces. The Porte was in the ascendant, and astute Ministers in frock coats made a Levantine State on a pseudo-French model. Under Abdul Hamid the courtier and the Palace secretary won what the Ministers had gained under his predecessors; but still the civilian dominated. Then came the Young Turk revolution. It had, from the first, two faces. It was a coalition of soldiers and civilians. It triumphed by arms and lived by scheming. Until the end we never knew which power really dominated. We heard on the one hand of the officers who had joined the Committee, the gallant Enver Bey and the Dictator-General Mahmud Shevket. We heard on the other hand of the astute civilians, the "intellectuals," the Jews and the crypto-Jews who supplied the brains of its inner organisation and in the end filled the Cabinet. Which element was really dominant? The events of the past month are explicable only on one theory. A schism has declared itself between the military and civilian elements of the Young Turks. The soldiers have become dissatisfied and have formed their rival Military League. It organised, it conspired, and the dreaded civilian secret society has become a thing alarmed, negligible, defeated. It has fallen, in the end, without a struggle. For a second time in four years the officers have made a new régime in Turkey. It has for its head a Ghazi, because the legal government must appeal by all the ties of sentiment and prestige to the real power within it, the military aristocracy.

We seem, in short, to have returned to the epoch of the Janissaries, when a Pretorian guard, honeycombed by secret societies and quasi-monastic ties, controlled Palace and Porte and people alike. Looking back upon the past, it is tempting to conclude that all the talk of Parliaments and Constitutions was so much froth and make-believe. The reality was always the army. The civilian Young Turks did not themselves take the Parliament seriously. They so manipulated the last elections as to make their artificial majority within it at once supreme and contemptible. It was so strong that it, last week, voted its confidence in Said Pasha's Ministry by a vote unanimous save for four dissentients. The Ministry fell next day. No event could have proclaimed with greater eloquence that the Chamber counts for nothing at all. The real question for the future of Turkey is what will become of this important Chamber. If the Sultan dissolves it, if fresh elections are held, if an honest vote is taken, then Parliamentary government in Turkey may yet have a future. If, on the other hand, the Cabinet of the Elder Turks elects to rule by the sanction of the army, and contemptuously trusts a Chamber, which ought to be against it, to ratify what it does, then there has been no advance towards Parliamentary government; there has not even been a beginning. The Chamber was elected to serve as the Committee's tool. If it slides complacently into the rôle of the Military League's tool, it makes itself an absolute nullity. For the moment it seems that this will happen. No great harm will be done so far as practical momentary politics go. But the real meaning of such an arrangement will be the recognition of Janissary rule. That is perhaps the inevitable, the natural régime in Turkey. It may work well or ill. But, however it works, the Constitution has become already a mere form and simulacrum.

Apart from these larger questions, it is probable that the immediate effect of the change will be salutary. The Committee had become a reckless, and probably also a corrupt, organisation. It will take some time for the new Military League to descend to the same level. Meanwhile in two particulars it has begun well. It has abolished martial law in the capital, and it has inaugurated a policy of conciliation in Albania. If it can pacify Albania without fighting, and bring an era of peace and good government to Macedonia and the Yemen, it will be the best Government that Turkey has yet seen. We await events, and we await them hopefully. The Turks have passed through the gravest crisis which has faced them since the counter-revolution of 1909. Once more it has been rapid and bloodless, and once more their external enemies have failed to take advantage of it. The continuance of the Tripoli War is a trifle in comparison with this internal re-adjustment which has suddenly ended a despotism which had become as powerful as that of Abdul Hamid himself. But a wise critic will withhold his verdict yet awhile. Can the Albanians in fact be pacified, and is the Committee in reality dead?—The Nation.

THE MOSLEM UNIVERSITY VOTING PAPER.

[In view of the decisions of the Secretary of State for India regarding the proposed Moslem University, it is absolutely essential that the views of the Moslem Subscribers of the Comrade should be ascertained. You are, therefore, earnestly requested to consider very carefully the decisions stated below, and to strike off the alternative which you do not like. Having done this, kindly cut this paper out, and send it to the Editor of the Comrade, 109 Ripon Street, Calcutta, preferably by registered post. The results of this voting will be published prominently in the Comrade every week. But the names of the voters will, under no circumstances, be disclosed if secrecy is desired.—Ed., Comrade.]

The Hon Sir Harcourt Butler, in his letter to the President of the Moslem University Constitution Committee, says that

"His Majesty's Secretary of State has decided, after mature consideration, that the proposed University should not have powers of affiliation outside the locality in which it may be established," and that it "should in future be styled 'The University of Aligarh,' and not the 'Moslem University.'" After mature consideration, I am of opinion that:—

The Mussalmans ^{should accept} ~~should NOT accept~~ a University on these conditions.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says :—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him..... Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

Complete set of eight for Rs. 3.

Single Cartoon, As. 8.

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

The Week.

Morocco.

REUTER wires from Tangier :—The Pretender, El Hiba, entered Marrakesh on the 18th instant after fighting with Kaidel Glawi, who remained loyal to the French. El Hiba has besieged the house in which are the French Consul and the French police instructors.

Reuter wires from Paris :—The Council of Ministers has considered the events at Marrakesh, and it is understood that it has decided not to extend field operations to the southern capital.

A message to the Times on 24th August from Paris, says that Colonel Mangin, who is now 75 miles from Marrakesh, is preparing to make a dash on the city with 4,000 men.

The Resident, General Lyautey, is now going to the South and will join Colonel Mangin.

Reuter wires from Paris on 25th August :—General Lyautey has transmitted to M. Poincaré a message from the new Sultan declaring the latter's desire for a complete and perfect entente and friendly collaboration with France in the interests of peace and progress.

It appears that the French Consul and his companions, whose house was attacked by the Pretender El Hiba on the latter's entry into Marrakesh, attempted to leave but were stopped some miles from the city and obliged to return. The house of El Glawi, who remained faithful to the French, is still besieged. It is said that France proposes negotiating with the Pretender to release the Consul and his companions. If efforts in this connection are not successful, France will despatch a relief column.

Reuter wires from Paris on 25th August :—Colonel Mangin yesterday came into contact with advanced posts of the Pretender El Hiba and repulsed them, capturing the banners and a quantity of ammunition. El Gaw handed nine Frenchmen over to El Hiba, but it is not mentioned whether the Consul was among them. El Hiba promised to protect the Frenchmen and convey them to the coast.

Reuter wires from Tangier on 26th August :—The delivery of the nine Frenchmen to El Hiba has caused great anxiety in official circles. There are still vague hopes of saving them, though negotiations with El Hiba's Khalifa may be suspended at any moment.

The French Government is anxious to avoid an expedition to Marrakesh not only because of the lack of forces but also on account of the excessive heat of the district. It is feared, however, that Colonel Mangin's success may result in vindictive measures.

Reuter wires from Paris :—There is a strong demand here for the rescue of Marrakesh prisoners. The newspapers unanimously insist that vigorous measures be taken.

Morocco.

REUTER wires from Paris on 28th August :—The Pretender's forces have made repeated attacks on the French advanced camp at Sukelarba. The French had few casualties. General Lyautey has joined Colonel Mangin.

China.

THE Times of 23rd August publishes a lengthy letter from Dr. Morrison, lately Peking correspondent of the Times, and now Political Adviser to the President of the Chinese Republic. Dr. Morrison, who is now in London, protests against alarming reports from China and hysterical forecasts of disruption appearing in the English press.

When Dr. Morrison left China, the conditions everywhere were improving and he dwells upon the cordial relations between Yuan-Shi-Kai Liyuanhung and Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen, the high character of the personnel of the present Government and the administrative reforms introduced.

Reuter wires from Peking on 25th August :—Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen has arrived here. He met with a magnificent reception. The Assembly has not yet met owing to the small attendance of members. The proposed impeachment of the Government, therefore, has collapsed for the present.

Reuter wires from Peking on 26th August :—Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen and Yuan-Shi-Kai conferred for many hours. Both afterwards declared that they were in perfect agreement on all important questions.

Reuter wires from Peking :—Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen in an interview with Reuter's representative said, he believed that the incident of the executions was settled. North and South would henceforth work more smoothly together. He considered that Yuan-Shi-Kai was eminently fitted for the Presidency and was worthy of support.

Tibet.

A CORRESPONDENT confirms the statement as to the settlement reached at Lhasa. He states that the arms and ammunition handed over by the Chinese troops are being sent on the 18th instant to the Terapchi Monastery where they will be stored in a sealed room.

In compliance with news from Peking, the Governor of Szechuan left Cheng Tu on 24th July with a force of several thousand men including the contingent of regulars from Yunnan to clear the Tibetans out of the country to the west of the Yatung river. His object will be to re-occupy Litang and Ba'ang.

The Times in a further article on Tibet contends that during the past few weeks an entirely new situation has arisen in Tibet. All our acknowledgments of Chinese suzerainty, it says, were made in circumstances which are now non-existent. Renewed Chinese invasion will doubtless be accompanied by barbarity and followed by merciless oppression. We ought to insist that Chinese intervention shall never again be exercised except within well-defined limits. Tibet must not be again deprived of her twice-won autonomy. The clause in the Anglo-Russian Convention prohibiting representatives at Lhasa ought to be re-considered. The extent of British interests and the welfare of the Tibetans suggest the appointing of a British representative at Lhasa and the present is a favourable moment to examine the suggestion.

New Delhi.

THE Punjab Government and Foreign Office are working out the programme of the Viceroy's State entry into Delhi, the date of which is unsettled. The 20th December, which has been announced in some papers, may be found impossible, as the 18th, 19th and 20th are Mohurram holidays and days of Moslem mourning. The neighbouring Chiefs will join the procession and a large number of members of the Imperial Council may be expected to be present in spite of the election contests, which will then be taking place all over the country.

The "Burma Critic."

The District Magistrate continued on, 23rd August, the hearing of the defamation case by Mr. G. P. Andrew, I.C.S., Deputy Commissioner of Mergui, against Mr. C. Arnold, Editor and Proprietor of the Burma Critic.

The complainant was recalled by his counsel and produced a copy of the Burma Critic, dated 15th August 1912, after the filing of the complaint in which he complained of the article under the title "the McCormick case." The article was not true when it said that "illegality and irregularities have already been proved."

Mr. Finnie, I.A., Superintendent of Police, in course of examination, deposed to having investigated the McCormick case on 16th July 1911, and to Inspector Sherard informing him that McCormick had refused to give up the girl (Ina) except on condition that she was made over to Sherard, and two days later the girl made a statement of McCormick having abducted and raped her. Sherard also stated that McCormick had the reputation of being a dangerous man. Sherard recorded the evidence of witnesses and witness discussed the case with Mr. Buchanan, Sub-divisional Officer. Witness next deposed to his recording the statement of witnesses in the enquiry and to the examination of the girl lasting an hour and a half at the most. Whilst the examination was proceeding Mr. Buchanan issued a warrant against McCormick and insisted on its execution as in his (Buchanan's) opinion a prima facie case against him had been made out. Buchanan gave witness no explanation for taking the case out of witness's hands, because before the enquiry by the witness started Buchanan had said he had washed his hands of it. Witness considered Mr. Buchanan's action was improper. Witness after the issue of the warrant by Mr. Buchanan wrote a note asking McCormick to see him at once. He arrived on 19th July and he was put under arrest in the dak bungalow as there was no suitable place in Victoria Point to confine a European. Witness then sent a telegram in cypher to Andrew so that the Telegraph Office might not know that he was passing remarks about the Magistrate. In it he stated Buchanan had lost his head. In another message witness said McCormick had asked for bail. Mr. Andrew granted bail of Rs. 500 by wire on 20th July and witness released McCormick after 25 hours on 21st July. Witness continued the examination of several witnesses and sent a telegram to Andrew to the effect that abduction and rape were false. All statements were handed to Mr. Buchanan, who said he was going to convict.

In further examination by Mr. Rutledge in the defamation case on August 24th Captain Finnie said he did not understand the allegation that the inquiry was held secretly. It was an extraordinary allegation that the complainants were kept in entire ignorance of what was going on. There was not needless delay in the inquiry. It was "an absolute lie" that witness tried from the first to burke inquiry as to McCormick's guilt. He did no such thing. It was an absolute lie that he let Mr. McCormick escape and helped him to escape. It was also a lie that he conspired with the District Magistrate (Mr. Andrew) to burke the case.

In reply to Mr. Hamlyn in cross-examination, the witness said he had nothing to say of Mr. Andrew's character. He (witness) wrote a lengthy opinion on the case. He did in effect find Mr. McCormick not guilty. So did Mr. Sherard. To a certain extent the case was made up against Mr. McCormick. He thought Mr. Buchanan, the Sub-Divisional Officer, was not above board. He did not know that the girl (Ina) was examined by Mr. Sherard in Mr. McCormick's house with Mr. McCormick present. On June 5th witness received an order from the Secretary of State to return to Burma in connection with a charge accusing a Deputy Commissioner and witness at the instance of a local newspaper. There was no Government inquiry about these accusations against them. Witness had never been called on for any sort of explanation. He hoped the sum of Rs. 15,000 he was claiming in the Chief Court would heal his wounds. Mr. McCormick and witness were acquainted with each other.

On August 26th in the Chief Court a written statement was filed by the second defendant in the suit for Rs. 16,000 damages for defamation brought against Mr. Arnold, editor and proprietor of the Burma Critic, the printer of the paper and W. H. Lidbetter. The third defendant, who is in Mandalay, has not yet been served with process. In his written statement the second defendant stated that the first defendant was the sole proprietor and publisher of the Burma Critic and that he (the second defendant) was the printer. He admitted having printed the articles referred to in the plaint but did not admit that the effect of such articles was correctly set out in the plaint. He did not admit the articles meant what was alleged in the plaint or that they were capable of any such meaning or of any defamatory meaning. In so far as the articles consisted of allegations of facts they were true in substance and in fact. In so far as they consisted of expressions of opinion they were fair comments made in good faith and without malice upon matters of public interest.

On August 26th Captain McLean Finnie, D. S. P., Mergui, was further cross-examined by Mr. Hamlyn. Witness said in the course of the cross-examination that he did not want to execute a warrant against Captain McCormick as he thought it improper and premature. He did not disobey but executed the warrant. Mr. Buchanan had been actuated by panic. Witness received the warrant. Witness did not tell Mr. Buchanan that he would get into trouble if he did not cancel it. Mr. Buchanan said he issued the warrant after seeing the papers in Sherard's possession. Witness did not lock up McCormick on grounds of humanity as the lock-up was unfit for a European and as he had not been refused bail. He released him when he got Mr. Andrew's reply. While McCormick was in the custody of witness he dined with witness. He provided him with all that he required in the way of bed, etc. Witness said he could not enter into any discussion as to whether it was right for McCormick to have kept the child from its mother. There was evidence that the girl was given to Ali's troupe as a dancer. It was the general opinion that the girl had been tampered with. McCormick claimed his right to the child because he had adopted her and paid her Rs. 30. McCormick's clerk and McCormick both talked of buying and selling in connection with the child. He knew what they meant by it. It was in Sherard's diary that McCormick refused to give the child back to her mother. Witness's cross-examination will be concluded to-morrow.

On August 27th the cross-examination of Captain Finnie was closed in the defamation case of Andrew vs. Arnold, and after the assistant editor of the Rangoon Times was cross-examined as to the communication that passed between the Local Government and the Rangoon Times in regard to a letter from a Mergui correspondent discussing the McCormick case which had not been published, Mr. Hamlyn asked the Court to call the Lieutenant Governor to produce telegrams sent to His Honour by the complainants in connection with the case.

Mr. Rutledge strenuously objected, but he had no objection to secondary evidence being called to prove the fact.

His Worship refused to issue summons to the Lieutenant-Governor.

Mr. Hamlyn asked the Court to call Mr. Dawson, Commissioner, Mergui Division, Inspector Sherard and Mr. Buchanan, Sub-Divisional Officer, as witnesses. This was also refused.

The accused made a lengthy statement in the course of which he protested against the gross partiality shown to the prosecution by His Worship from start to finish. In order to get documents in evidence his Counsel had to fight tooth and nail like trying to get blood out of stone. He could not conceive any enquiry conducted under a British magistracy under more partial circumstances. He could conceive no proceedings where the prosecution had been shown such favouritism on every occasion as that which His Worship had done. If he were a stronger Magistrate he would not have committed him. He had no hostile feeling towards either Mr. Andrew or Captain Finnie. He had a duty to perform to the public, and he did it with much reluctance. He had no reason to injure anybody. He considered there had been miscarriage of justice and it was his duty to draw the attention of the authorities. He accepted all the responsibility for his acts.

The accused was then charged with defamation and committed to the Chief Court Sessions.

The accused's advocate promised to file the list of witnesses for the Sessions on Monday.

The next criminal sessions are fixed for November.

In order to secure the attendance of witnesses for the defence the Chief Court has fixed a special session to try the defamation case of Andrew vs. Arnold for 2nd October. Sir Charles Fox will preside.

TETE À TETE

WHEN Austria usurped Bosnia and Herzegovina soon after the Turkish Revolution, and the Turks revenged themselves as best they could by a boycott of Austrian goods, it came as a shock of surprise to many that most of the Fezes which the Turks wore had been manufactured in Austria. They were, of course, given up, and in their place the Turks wore white Fezes of their own manufacture, though they were of much inferior quality. This boycott gave such an impetus to honest Swadeshi that better quality Fezes began to be manufactured, and now that Italian goods are boycotted, including Italy-made Fezes, those manufactured in Turkey and Egypt are in common use. Messrs. S. F. Chishti and Co., of Delhi, have ordered some of these and we have received one each of three qualities. We have no hesitation in saying that the Fezes are as good as the best made in Austria or Italy, and, at the prices marked, are even better. The prices are Rs. 2-4 and Re. 1-8 each for the Turkish, and Re. 1-12 for the Egyptian caps. There are other qualities, too, in stock, 7 manufactured in Constantinople and 5 in Cairo, with prices ranging from As. 12 to Rs. 2-8. Superior qualities have also been ordered. We were anxious to be satisfied that these Fezes are really of Turkish and Egyptian manufacture, and not Austrian or Italian in disguise. This has been proved to our satisfaction by the marks on the caps themselves and lead seals attached to them. We are sure Indian Mussalmans would make a rush for these caps in preference to inferior and more costly Austrian caps. We are informed by the firm that a liberal discount is given to Muhammadan colleges and schools and other institutions ordering large quantities. We should think Nigarh alone would consume some 1,500 Fezes a year.

THE situation in the Balkans has cleared a little, though it still retains some features of unobscured gravity. Montenegro has been brought to a proper frame of mind by a rebuke of the Powers:

The Balkans.

and Bulgarian growls are mere stage thunder to attract international attention. Turkey is powerful enough to cope with these petty and noisy enemies at her frontiers if there were no danger of Austria and Russia beginning to fish in the troubled waters. The real source of anxiety for the Turkish Cabinet is the Albanian situation. It is yet too early to say if the large concessions that have been promised will lead to a permanent settlement of the question. If the pacificism of the Government is once interpreted as weakness, the danger of fresh insurrections and of sympathetic outbreaks in Macedonia would become imminent. The recent move of the Austrian Foreign Minister to invoke the dead "Concert" into life again has a very sinister outlook. The Turkish attitude, however, is firm in regard to Austrian proposals, and we are sure if this attitude is maintained the "Concert" will not move out of its grave to sit in judgment again on Turkish affairs. The inspiration of Germany may not be wholly absent in the Austrian move, in view of the fact that the present Turkish Government is of a somewhat Anglophile character. The loss of Bosnia and Herzegovina occurred at a time when British friendship for Turkey was very loudly demonstrative. We hope Austria, the "brilliant second" will not be allowed to prove to Turkey once more that British friendship is merely platonic and is quite powerless to save her from further laceration or disgrace. The informal peace negotiations that are said to be proceeding in Switzerland have not yet entered a decisive stage. It is rumoured in Berlin and Vienna that a formula has been discovered which would be acceptable to both the belligerents. According to this formula, Tripoli is to be administered by Italy on the lines of Egypt, and the suzerainty of the Sultan is to be preserved. We are sure no Turkish Government, jealous of its "honour, dignity and rights", will be content with this shadow. Peace will be concluded in Tripoli itself when every Arab, man, boy and child has shed his blood in defence of his home, faith and country, and not before.

In response to our invitation to our Muslim subscribers to vote whether a University on the terms of the Government should or should not be accepted, we have received a few replies. Unfortunately, the last week's issue could not be posted on the usual date on account of delay in the printing of a forty-page Supplement containing the Muslim University Constitution, and, therefore, there was not time enough for us to receive voting papers except from subscribers at short distances. However, every succeeding post is bringing a larger number of them, and we hope the strength of the voters would be much greater during next week. We trust our Muslim readers would not delay sending in their votes because it is essential that the opinion of the majority should be ascertained as early as possible, so that the Muslim University Foundation Committee could meet at an early date and arrive at a final decision. We do not intend to keep the voting open indefinitely, and it is our present intention to close it by the 15th of September. Now that we have supplied to every reader of the Comrade the fullest details of the Draft Constitution, they have ample material on which to base their judgments. The voting during the week has been as follows:—

For the acceptance of the University on the Government's terms ...	2
Against the acceptance of the University on the Government's terms ...	35

A shout of relief, not unmingled with groans, went forth from the Press in this country when it learnt that the Midnapur trial had at length run its weary course and the Hon. Mr. Justice

Midnapur.

Woodroffe had delivered a tremendous judgment. An industrious contemporary has calculated that the judgment, if spread out in cold print, would cover a mile. Its length, however, is not the only feature that has staggered our dainty contemporary. However great may be the difference of opinion as to the findings of the Judge, there can be no question that the pronouncement of Mr. Justice Woodroffe is very decisive, very sure and very full-blooded. Indeed, it is because of its "full-bloodedness" that one feels, at times, as if one were listening to the pleadings of an advocate. One comes across sentences, here and there, that sound like a retort and a challenge. The learned Judge, in the course of his elaborate argument, turns round to Mr. Justice Fletcher and to the plaintiff's Counsel again and again, as to someone in the witness-box, to give them a piece of his mind. The net result of the judgment has been that the defendants, holding responsible positions in the public service, one of them being a district magistrate, have been declared not guilty of the charges that were proved against them in the Lower Court. The matter would have been one for unalloyed satisfaction if the Press, both Indian and Anglo-Indian, had not imported into its discussions of the case a partisan feeling of the most virulent character. As the Bengalee had grandiloquently declared some time ago, a section of the Bengalee public regarded the case as a trial of strength between "the people and the police armed with the resources of the bureaucracy." The chief concern of some of the Anglo-Indian journals had been to bring about a vindication of the character of Mr. Weston: they rarely felt any excessive love for "the ends of justice." Now that Mr. Weston has been declared innocent, they have thrown up their caps for sheer joy and ridiculed and savagely assailed the Judge who had dared to cast a slur on the character of an Englishman and a member of the Indian Civil Service to boot. Be that as it may, we congratulate all the three defendants cordially.

This partisan and savage temper has been shown at its best—or worst—by that faithful henchman of the Services, the Pioneer of Allahabad. It loudly calls upon Mr. Justice Fletcher to resign because his judgment has been reversed by three brother Judges of the High Court. In itself, it is a petty outburst of impotent rage and malice, and Mr. Justice Fletcher can well afford to treat it with silent contempt. But the attack has a serious public aspect which gravely affects the impartial administration of justice in this country. It is an undisguised attempt to trench upon the judicial independence of the Bench; for a judge who would happen to differ from a journal that has a habit of fawning on executive authority would have to suffer a vulgar vilification and abuse. It is for the Government of India to decide if the Indian High Courts can work independently under the vague shadow of journalistic terrorism. The best course, under the circumstances, would seem to be to break up all the Tribunals of Justice in the land and hand over the functions of the Judiciary to the paragraph writers and newsvendors of the Pioneer. Not that the Bengali Press is any better. The Patrika is a good match for the Pioneer any day. In this connection we recommend to our readers the excellent comments of the Empire.

A CALCUTTA telegram, dated the 27th instant, stated that Haji Ahmed Moosaji Salehji had withdrawn his contribution of Rs. 10,000 to the Muslim University Fund, and that in view of the False Indignation.

Recent Government decision other leading Calcutta contributors contemplated following his example. This was stated to have been published on good authority. We hope it was not the authority of Mr. Ahmed Moosaji Salehji himself, because that gentleman knows it as well as we do that his contribution, along with that of his friend, Mr. Ehsan Karim, who had also contributed Rs. 10,000, had been withdrawn as much as four months ago, and for quite different reasons from those on which the Calcutta telegram stated that it had been withdrawn. These donations were very substantial indeed, because they formed as much as about 40 per cent. of the total contribution of Western Bengal. But those who were responsible for collecting subscriptions in this sub-province know with what difficulty these contributions were collected from the donors. So far as we recollect, the gentlemen did not send the money to the bank for nearly a year after having subscribed, and the Secretary of the Provincial Committee and those who assisted him had to serve no less than three or four dozen reminders in the shape of letters, verbal entreaties and personal calls. Even then, these gentlemen, along with three others from Calcutta, were the only donors throughout India that made their contributions conditional on the establishment of the University by the 31st of March, 1912. On account of this condition, these five contributions, aggregating Rs. 35,000, were never calculated as part of the Muslim University Fund for purposes of publication, and the event has justified the precaution in the case of Messrs. Ahmed Moosaji Salehji and Ehsan Karim. For, as we have already stated, they withdrew their contributions immediately on the expiry of the period mentioned. As a matter of fact, when Nawab Vihar-ul-Mulk asked the Bank not to return the money pending the receipt of the reply from these donors to a letter which he was addressing to them, entreating them not to withdraw their contributions, we hear they wrote a very insulting letter to the Nawab Sahib accusing him of breach of faith and of a desire to misappropriate their money. We do not know if they have in any way suggested or authorised the telegram of the 27th instant; but if that is so, it is clear that they wish to gain a certain amount of distinction as stubborn Muslim patriots, whereas they showed the full measure of their self-sacrifice and patriotism when they withdrew their contributions and insulted Nawab Vihar-ul-Mulk. In any case, we are glad that an authoritative telegram from Aligarh has made matters clear. It states the facts which we have already mentioned, and adds that the contribution of Messrs. Moosaji, Ahmad & Co. was never treated as part of the University Fund, and, therefore, nothing has been refunded from the University Fund. We trust that the other three gentlemen from Calcutta, whose contributions were also conditional, but who, so far as we know, have not yet withdrawn them, will not now do so, and on the contrary make them absolute. This is not an occasion for withdrawing a pie from the University Fund, and patriotism consists in contributing still more to it so that Government and other communities may be impressed with the willingness of the Mussalmans to undergo every sacrifice for the sake of their University, which, God willing, they will soon establish.

THE selection of a president for the Indian National Congress affords to the cynic every year an excellent occasion for amusement. The choice is usually swayed by strange considerations—none of these considerations, of course, is so low as to ignore "public interest." The number of acceptable "candidates" is limited, and they may be arranged in three categories. There are those who have graced the Congress chair more than once and only escape re-election by accident. There is the stop-gap "candidate" on whom the choice falls in extreme emergency as the "next best veteran" after Mr. So-and-So. Then, again, there is the "perpetual candidate" on whom, through some irony of fate, the choice never seems to fall at all. The "veteran" figures in the list every year and, at the last moment, is quietly placed on the shelf. The Hon. Mr. Muldholker is one of the "perpetual candidates." The Provincial Congress Committees wax enthusiastic over his "long and steadfast services to the country," but—the presidential chair is offered to somebody else. This year he has come perilously near being elected. The majority of the Provincial Committees have recorded their vote in his favour, but Young Behar has put her foot down and would have none of him. The Hon. Mr. Mudholker is a good Congress man, an old veteran who has grown grey in the "service of his country," but he is not good enough for Behar. Behar has "its peculiar circumstances"—her youth or babyhood, her inexperience, her new-born consciousness of self require a more picturesque and popular hero to champion her cause than an old, colourless, unromantic gentleman who has merely done "great service to his country."

Not Good Enough for Behar!

Few countries can offer parallels for the tender gentleness of nature, the heroic self-effacement and the whole-souled devotion to the cause of suffering humanity which have always characterised the Indian ladies. Unfortunately, however, their high potentialities for organised humanitarian work had hitherto lain dormant because, in their head-long rush for progress, the Indian reformers forgot to accept the limitations of the present constitution of Indian society and refused to give our womenfolk a place in their elaborate programmes for the uplifting of the nation. They made it a postulate that the Indian ladies before taking part in the work of the great Indian Renaissance which is now working out its mighty destiny, should immediately and absolutely break away from all those restrictions of purdah, caste and society which Indian ideas of modesty or propriety imposed on them. Apart from the question of the desirability or otherwise of such absolute break of "continuity with the past," it should be patent to the most perfunctory observer of Indian society, that such a sudden revolution, however easily achieved by the radical sons of modern India, is nothing short of impossible in the zenana. It is a circumstance of happy augury, therefore, that quite recently right-thinking Indian reformers have come to recognise that, good or bad, they have to make the best of the present situation in working out schemes for the amelioration of the women in India. The Seva Sadan Society of Bombay, which we referred to when noticing the recent death of one of its founders, the late Mr. Malabari, is an institution which, while doing admirable work for the amelioration of Indian women, has not failed to adapt itself to the present constitution of Indian society. The two "basic principles" upon which it works are (1) that "Life is a trust for loving, self-sacrificing service," and (2) that all Indian sisters should be "one at core, if not in creed." It is an institution organised almost exclusively by high-souled ladies who gratuitously undertake to be "ministers of mercy" or the bearers of the torch of light into the darkness of Indian homes. The institution is unique in view of the fact that it is the first "indigenous, non-proselytising, non-sectarian organisation for lovingly serving all the three races of India, independently of caste and creed." Here for the first time are seen Hindu, Muhammadan and Parsi ladies working shoulder to shoulder in the service of a United India. Another unique feature is that no less than 78 of the members are pardanashin ladies. The work done by the society is divided into several departments. Not the least important of these is the department of Famine Relief in which some of the "sisters" have done such admirable work that H. E. Sir George Clarke, in his speech on the 10th April, 1912, acknowledged their "valuable personal service in helping to mitigate distress due to famine." Another useful department is the Home for the Homeless, which not only offers protection to waifs and strays and even to old and blind women, but also rescues women and children from dens of ill fame and wins them back to higher life by teaching them "domestic work, needlework, knitting and the three R's." Then, there is the Industrial Home where girls belonging to poor families of the town or those taken in from the mofussil are admitted free to the classes for weaving, knitting, tailoring, type-writing, sewing and drawing, and thus helped to earn bread for themselves and their families. There is also a Nursing and Midwifery class for the training of probationary "sisters" for work in the different branches and hospitals of the Sadan and a free dispensary for poor women and children. Some of the more enterprising "sisters" have joined the "Social Service Section" and visit the cottages of the poorest classes "to discover cases of distress." The Islamia Section, besides taking part in the general work of "Ministers of Mercy," has started Home Classes for pardanashin women. There are also free educational classes for the teaching of the poorest girls and boys of all castes and creeds, and libraries and reading rooms for the use of the members and of poor women. The Sadan endeavours to educate public opinion and popularise its work by issuing a continuous series of booklets, pamphlets and tracts on such subjects as self-sacrifice, unity, hygiene, care of infants, evils of smoking, the drink demon, etc. In short, the Sadan has been doing eminently useful work in all its various departments for the amelioration of Indian women, "by helping them to help themselves." And it was no empty compliment which Lady Clarke paid when she said that "the predominant impression left on me, in each of them (the branches of the Sadan), was the very happy one that the spirit of love, charity and sisterhood is the keynote of their activities. It was a pleasure to meet so large a number of kind-hearted, philanthropic women, who devote their lives to the relief of the poor and those in distress. All communities are welcome. . . . I cordially wish continued success to this noble work." We understand the "sisters" are appealing to the public for funds to extend their scope of usefulness. We have no hesitation in strongly recommending this appeal. And we earnestly request our sisters all over India to establish similar Sisterhoods in other parts of the country and to emulate the admirable work which is being done by the Seva Sadan of Bombay. Noble work is being done here by noble women to ennoble their sisters. The soul of B. M. Malabari in heaven must be doubtfully blessed at the thought of this.

WE WERE gratified at the extremely sympathetic reply which Lord Crewe gave last month to the members of the strong deputation that waited upon him to plead for certain drastic reforms in the Excise Administration of India. Though some of his lordship's replies to definite proposals were vague and unsatisfactory, his general attitude of approval of the main principles advocated by the deputation gives bright promises for the future. We frankly concede, as did Mr. Gokhale, that total prohibition is a pious dream which, in the present constitution of society, is not within the realm of practical politics anywhere in the world. But we must say that we are disposed to call into question his lordship's statement that in India the Government are faced by "special difficulties" in the matter of temperance reform. On the contrary, we firmly hold that in India, more than perhaps in any other country, the bulk of public opinion, representing all castes and creeds, feels very strongly on the subject of the appalling increase of drunkenness; and we believe that more is to be gained by associating public opinion with the licensing authorities in India than in those countries where the drink habit has come to be considered a necessary concomitant of modern industrial progress. We, therefore, heartily welcome Lord Crewe's statement to the deputation that "he was much impressed by the desire for the multiplication of Advisory Committees with a view to securing more local control and that he would sympathetically represent to the Government of India their views of the question." We also agree with his lordship that the Advisory Committees should not be "turned into Licensing Committees with full powers," for, we are afraid, in certain industrial centres the vested interests of the modern "captains of industry" militate strongly against "the social well-being" of the working classes who are somehow the easiest prey to the insidious advances of Bacchus. But we earnestly hope that, in "reconsidering the various points raised in the light of the new facts that have come into being since the subject was last examined" by the Excise Committee which Lord Morley appointed in 1907, the Government of India will have regard for the consensus of public opinion which lays "great emphasis on the desirability of separating the Licensing from the Revenue Department," and we agree with Lord Crewe "that this was one of those double functions in India which we would be glad to see gradually disappear." Far be it from us to insinuate that the Revenue Department is deliberately callous about "the social well-being of the people," but we submit that a Department, whose chief business it is to collect the revenue, cannot help being subconsciously actuated by money-grabbing motives in those secondary duties which it considers a bye-product of its industry. With all our "fairness to the officers," we certainly cannot absolve the Excise Department of all blame in "the prevalence of the drinking habit." Nor can we be satisfied with the explanations that Lord Crewe has given about the increased consumption of liquor. We readily concede that "illicit distillation," "medical purposes," and the "growing prosperity" of the people are not factors to be neglected. But allowing an ample margin for each of them, we still fail to account for the appalling increase of the drinking habit. We wish we could agree with Lord Crewe in thinking that it "has been greatly exaggerated." By the united testimony of the official returns, and the private opinion of administrative officers, missionaries, Indian judges and public men we must admit that the question of drink is rapidly coming to the forefront of the Indian programme of social reform as one of the most difficult problems to solve. Whether or not the prevalence of the habit is a historic category, is a question of purely academic interest; but the broad fact cannot be blinked that its frightful increase is a factor which has come into prominence only during the latter part of the British Rule, and whether that Rule was responsible for it or not, it is now the clear duty of the Government to leave nothing undone which could at all tend to repress it. But by no stretch of imagination can we believe that that duty can be performed by making Excise a Provincial Head of Revenue. Last year ours was the solitary voice raised against it, and we are glad to find the Statesman now coming to keep us company.

SOME time back we drew the attention of the Moslem public to the great financial inadequacy which hampers the Managing Committee of the Calcutta Muhammadan Orphanage in the work which they have been carrying on in face of great difficulties. Along with our issue of the 10th August we sent to our readers "An Appeal" for the sum of rupees one lakh of which the institution stands in immediate and dire need. We have now the greatest pleasure in announcing that the appeal on behalf of the poor Muhammadan orphans of Bengal, Behar, Assam and Burma has met with a hearty response from some of our readers. And it bodes well for the future of Moslem India that sympathisers even from distant towns have contributed liberally towards the necessary sum. Some of the latest subscriptions received by the Managing Committee are:—Rs. 500 from Ghulamali G. Chagla, Esq., of Karachi, Rs. 20 from M. A. Nayeem, Esq., of Waini, and Rs. 20 from A. Mohammed, Esq., of Nowgong.

The Comrade.

The Muslim University.

II.

THERE is hardly a responsible newspaper that has not condemned the Government on the score of its encouraging hopes which it is now anxious to destroy. It must not be imagined that such a patent objection to the present policy did not occur to so shrewd an official as the Member for Education. He realized its force to the full, and, therefore, commences his letter to the President of the Moslem University Constitution Committee by stating that "you will remember that the movement was started without any reference to Government." In other words, Sir Harcourt Butler very cleverly tries to shift the responsibility for the deep disappointment of the Mussalmans to their own leaders. We trust the Muslim leaders will not forget this act of kindness, for it amounts to nothing less than throwing them "to the lions."

But the responsibility for so deep a disappointment cannot be so easily shifted. Does Sir Harcourt give us to understand that Government knew nothing of a movement that was revived so long ago as 1898? He may not have had access to the schemes put forward by Muhammadan leaders, because most of their speeches and writings were embodied in Urdu. But the scheme of Sir Theodore Morison, which was launched the same year, could not have been out of the reach of Sir Harcourt Butler, and, in view of his deep interest in Moslem education, it is difficult to believe that he was ignorant even of the general lines on which Sir Theodore Morison, among others, proposed that a Muslim University should be established.

In the issue of the 3rd instant we have already quoted from the speech which Sir Theodore delivered in December 1898 at Lahore before the Muhammadan Educational Conference.* In his brochure on "Imperial Rule in India," Sir Theodore Morison goes even further, and recommends to Government the entrusting of every college to some community or other. Again, in his "History of the M. A. O. College, Aligarh," which was published in 1903, he says that "the general principle which I believe is capable of very wide application is, that a University should be the University of a community not of an area; there should, for instance, be a University for the Muhammadans, for the Parsis, for the Hindus of Eastern India, etc., but no University for the Punjab or Madras or Bombay." Referring to the University Commission of Sir Thomas Raleigh and their regretfully noticing the absence of the pious benefactor from our Universities, and to the remarks of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach (now Lord St. Aldwyn) at Aligarh, that "experience has shown that there is no more certain way of encouraging the flow of private generosity than by associating education with some form of religion," he writes: "I believe that the Muhammadans would bestir themselves to endow a Muhammadan University in a way to relieve the Public Exchequer of all burden, if they were confident that the Government would grant them a charter; if they failed to contribute a stipulated minimum endowment fund the question of a Muhammadan University would not be brought before the Government." Could Sir Harcourt justify his "deep interest in the movement" by asking us to believe that he was ignorant of these statements about the scope of the Moslem University? The University of a community and not an area, a Muhammadan University which could relieve the Public Exchequer of the entire burden of the higher education of Mussalmans, and a University which would not confine residence to Aligarh alone but would accept as satisfactory residence in the boarding-house of a college which can give guarantees that the training of character is not less carefully attended to than in the parent institution, could not have been the "University of Aligarh" without powers of affiliation which Sir Harcourt Butler commends to the acceptance of the Mussalmans.

It is true that the Mussalmans did not formally approach the Government in 1911, when H. H. the Aga Khan first girded up his loins in order to accomplish what was being proposed year after year in the Educational Conference of the Mussalmans. But even though the Aga Khan was not so simple as to rush to the Member for Education with an elaborate constitution for an educational Utopia, it is well known that the Member for Education did not leave the

* Since writing on the subject on the 3rd instant we have found in Appendix (A) to "The Report of the Sir Syed Ahmad Memorial Fund Committee up to the end of October 1898" a scheme of the proposed Moslem University prepared by Sir Theodore Morison, on which he evidently based his subsequent speech at Lahore. We therefore quote the following because they are his own words, although our re-translation of the Urdu version of his speech is substantially the same: "I do not mean to say that residence must be in Aligarh, but in the boarding-house of a College which can give guarantees that the training of character is not less carefully attended to than in the parent institution."

Aga Khan unquestioned about the character of the proposed Muslim University. If the four practical objections which Sir Harcourt Butler has now raised on educational grounds against affiliation—and the many more which he can presumably raise when these four have been met with—had occurred to him earlier than the 9th of August, 1912, he had ample opportunities to bring them to the notice of H. H. the Aga Khan or the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad even before the Mussalmans approached him for the first time in May, 1911.

If, however, these are after-thoughts—and, in that case, they would by no means be the first of their kind—the Member for Education had three subsequent opportunities, before the end of September, 1911, of informing the Mussalmans that affiliation would be altogether impossible. A deputation consisting of the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad, Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, the Hon. Sahebzada Aftab Ahmed Khan and Dr. Zia-ud-Din Ahmed waited on Sir Harcourt Butler on 16th May, 1911, in order to make sure that they were proceeding generally on lines acceptable to Government before proceeding any further with the task of framing the details of the University constitution. The Government of India had a clear opportunity at the time to lay it down that they would not be responsible for any disappointment caused to the community, if the Muslim leaders continued to ask for donations on the understanding that affiliation would take place, and the Government of India, or the Secretary of State, subsequently refused to grant that power.

Again, on the 31st July of the same year, Sir Harcourt Butler communicated to the President of the Constitution Committee the readiness of the Secretary of State to sanction the establishment of a University, and forwarded a Note on the results of the discussion at Simla in May. It was not unreasonable to believe at the time that affiliation would be granted, because in the Note containing the views of the Government of India it was clearly laid down that affiliation of outside colleges and recognition of schools would be allowed, but would require the sanction of the Chancellor.

The objection to affiliation was raised for the first time on the 23rd of September, when the Muslim University Constitution Committee had a conference with the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler and the Hon. Mr. Sharp. But then, too, the only argument that was advanced was that "A Friend of India" had been writing to every English daily paper against the principle of denominational Universities, resenting their cutting across the territorial jurisdiction of Provincial Universities. Why go beyond Aligarh? Why take away other colleges from other Universities which must be the poorer for their loss? It was also said that Sir Syed Ahmed, had he been alive, might not have approved of affiliation, and that his grandson had written to the Comrade against it. Our contemporary, Al-Bashir, of Etawah, was also cited as a witness; but not a single argument was advanced on behalf of Government. All this was excellent, amiable talk, and was listened to with becoming deference. But there was no mention then of a probable conflict with older territorial universities. Nothing was said of an inevitable lowering of the standard of Aligarh degrees. And not a word was whispered of the impossibility of the Moslem University controlling outside colleges. To-day it is all solicitude for the Moslem University. But then the only solicitude that was apparent was shown for the older territorial Universities of the federal type which, after 50 years, the Government is now condemning with a vengeance. On the other hand, the Hon. Mr. Shafi, who was deputed to be the spokesman of the Committee on the subject of affiliation, in view of his being a member of the governing body of the only other Muhammadan college in India, explained in great detail how affiliation would be beneficial both to Government and to Mussalmans, how the leaders of the community had pledged themselves to affiliation and how, if its hopes were disappointed, it would not blame them but would blame the Government. It was also explained that promises of payment would no longer be fulfilled if it became known that affiliation was in doubt, while many a donor might demand his money back. Even then it was not stated on behalf of Government that no further subscriptions should be collected on the same terms because there was a great likelihood of affiliation being disallowed. The Member for Education promised that the matter would be re-considered by Government, although in the matter of the previous approval of the Chancellor to appointments of Professors he declared that it was quite impossible for Government to give it up, and he could not ask Government to reconsider their decision. It is thus that the impossible has come to pass, while the almost certain is "finally" declared to be impossible.

Whosoever may now have "finally" decided that there shall be no affiliation, it cannot be gainsaid that such a decision has come upon the Mussalmans as an unexpected blow, and the responsibility for its results cannot be repudiated by Government merely because an elaborate constitution was not submitted before the first pie was collected for the proposed University. As we have said before, it would have been foolish of the Muslim leaders to rush to Government, like so many Shaikh Chillis, with an elaborate constitution before they had reasonable certainty of collecting the necessary funds. The proper thing was to raise funds first, and, in the words of Sir Theodore Morison, if they failed to collect the stipulated minimum endowment fund, the question of a Muhammadan University was not to be brought before the Government. And this is just what the Moslem leaders have done. It came to our notice more than a year and a half ago that, when H. H. the Aga Khan would not indulge in the futile occupation of constitution-making before he had reason to believe that a minimum endowment fund would be collected, the Member for Education, his curiosity not having been satisfied to the fullest extent, facetiously remarked to His Highness that he understood that the Aga Khan intended one day to place the revolver of 25 lakhs against the Education Member's head. But if the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler would only reflect, he would concede that the Muslim leaders did not approach him like the bandit with the demand: "Your life or a charter." The moment they had reasonable assurance of the stipulated minimum endowment they consulted the Government about the terms of the charter, and availing then shaped their course, so far as possible, according to the suggestions of the Government. But even if the Mussalmans had not formally consulted the Government about the constitution of the proposed University before May, 1911, it cannot be said that Government was ignorant of the general lines on which it was proposed that a University should be established. Government knew of it from the schemes of the late Mr. Beck and Sir Theodore Morison, which were framed early in 1898. If after all this the Viceroy (Lord Elgin) contributed Rs. 2,000 to the University Fund, and the Lieutenant-Governor (Sir James La Touche) followed his noble example by contributing Rs. 500, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Government encouraged the movement and had no objections to affiliation in 1898. Therefore, as the Hon. Mr. Shafi put it at Lucknow, Government is now estopped from pleading ignorance of the terms on which funds have all along been collected and of the real character of the University which the Mussalmans have for so many years been desiring to establish. And lest the Mussalmans suspect the Constitution Committee of having knowingly kept from them the fact that affiliation would under no circumstances be granted, let us say once for all that, beyond what we have stated, the Committee had no knowledge that this would be the Government's "final" decision.

Egypt.

II

THE politician who invented a moral basis for modern "Imperialism" deserves a conspicuous niche in history. His phrases have grown to be postulates and stick to international affairs with all the vitality of Error. The need for such invention had manifestly become imperative in the prying emotionalism of the nineteenth century. The pedants of the French Revolution had furiously believed that they could, by cataloguing virtues, cure humanity of its sins. They simply roused Finance—the chief driving force in politics since the close of the eighteenth century—to adopt the weapons of the moralist. Hypocrisy was the price it willingly paid to placate the humanitarianism of the epoch. Through a series of events of far-reaching influence and scope, Finance began to pervade the entire range of politics and has gradually emerged as a new doctrine of statecraft, vis, "Imperialism." Every known empire of history owed its origin to pure lust of power or dominion, to religious zeal or personal vanity. Conquest was in literal fact a conquest, a bold, sudden, decisive physical stroke that wiped out a dynasty or a kingdom for the sake of an ideal. It is divided from a "conquest" of to-day by a whole gulf of purpose and feeling. French operations in Morocco and the Italian swoop on Tripoli afford the most recent examples of what "Imperialism" means to-day: a calculating, cold-blooded and ruthless exercise of force and ingenuity to grasp fresh, "undeveloped" lands and cheap, docile labour for gold and "dividends." The "imperial" politician has clothed the stark crudity of these financial operations with a curious ethical phraseology. A modern "conquest" is invariably the outcome of a "sad necessity of civilisation." The victims are too ignorant to look after their own interest—that duty must clearly be performed by a more civilised power as a labour of love. "Imperialism" has evolved three remarkable formulas that sum up the philosophy and ethics of the creed:—

(1) A backward race is unfit to govern itself; (2) it is the duty of a stronger and more civilised people to take it under their wing and to try to raise it to a higher plane of morality, culture and life; (3) "coloured" humanity under the "white man's" tutelage has been stamped with political incapacity for all time and should not, therefore, be entrusted with the enormous responsibilities of self-government which it is not fitted to bear.

Egypt has lived under the blighting shadow of these terrible formulas ever since the British Occupation began to assume a quasi-permanent character. After thirty years of British supremacy in Cairo, the formulas continue to be as binding as ever. The advocates of the Occupation are perhaps not wholly unaware of the inconsistency of their position. British presence in Egypt is usually justified on the ground that it has wrought a beneficent change in the condition of the people. In the same breath we are gravely assured that British withdrawal would be an incalculable calamity, inasmuch as the people are too ignorant, inexperienced and nerveless to undertake the direction of their own affairs. Surely, the argument, coming after thirty years of benevolent tutelage exercised by England, is a devastating confession of failure, and should induce every "Imperialist" to revise his vocabulary, if not his estimate of his own mission. However, it is not our purpose to study in this article the art and psychology of modern "Imperialism." Our object is to see, by a close examination of the facts, if there exists, in the light of the abovementioned formulas, any justification for the continued domination of England over Egyptian affairs. It should not at all be difficult to arrive at a tolerably sure conclusion after studying the material and moral results of the Occupation during the last thirty years.

Lord Cromer's régime is often acclaimed as an era of unbroken prosperity in the economic condition of the Egyptian masses. The revenues of the country have expanded enormously, the population has more than doubled, trade has grown with leaps and bounds, the fellah is waxing fat with riches and peace and contentment reign supreme in the land. This would be a magnificent record and, even if partially correct, would entitle Lord Cromer to the lasting gratitude of the Egyptian people. But while weighing Lord Cromer's achievements, we must bear in mind the state of the country immediately after the Occupation and the aims with which he set to work. It was the fashion in the early eighties to describe the lot of the Egyptian peasantry as the most miserable known to history. Every British official, who desired to bring about British intervention, laid the paint thick on his reports and spoke of the destitution, the woe and the sufferings of the fellah in terms of deep emotion. It is true, the reckless orgies of Ismael and the still more reckless exactions of his usurious creditors had led to a great impoverishment of the masses and the lot of the peasant was not enviable. Yet, according to independent testimony, the condition of the people was not exactly what the tourists' stories of the fellah's misery would have us believe. MacCoan in his book, "Egypt As It Is," dealing with this subject, says "that the general condition of the fellahen will compare favourably with that of any other peasantry in the East." It is remarkable that the British functionaries, who wrote about the condition of the country in pathetic strains in 1885-86, suddenly began to show unbounded optimism in their reports in 1888. Sir Edgar Vincent, reporting at the time, assured the Government of the day that "the debts of the fellahen to the local usurers had been, in a great measure, paid off." It requires, however, some effort of the imagination to believe that millions of human beings, who had been described as verging on starvation and grovelling in frightful misery but a couple of years before, were suddenly transformed into a prosperous peasantry. It is still more remarkable that seven years later, when perhaps it was found necessary to defend the continuance of British occupation, official optimism gave way to pessimism and the fellahen were found to be "borrowing money still". However, it would be incorrect to assume that there has been no improvement in the material condition of the masses. The population has more than doubled, revenues are growing at an almost uniform rate, the taxes are being collected without much difficulty, and there has been some slight remission of taxation. But the safest conclusion that we can draw from these facts is that the tax-paying capacity of the people has improved. It is doubtful if the fellah is left with any appreciable margin of savings after he has paid his taxes. In an interview with a representative of the Egyptian Standard on October 20, 1908, Prince Hussein Pasha Kamel, uncle of the Khedive and, at one time, President of the Legislative Council, spoke of the condition of the fellah in these words:—"He passes his life burdened with debts, his wages do not exceed the amount of taxes and the interest on his debts. He is continually obliged to run into debt at exorbitant interest in order to meet his agricultural needs at the proper moment, and as a consequence of this difficult situation, of his lack of money and of the large number who depend on him, the peasant remains in a sea of troubles from which he can find no means of saving himself."

The Prince is admittedly a great authority on the condition of the people and his testimony is beyond question. But even apart from his views, the officials of the Occupation themselves betray an uneasy conscience when they set about to explain away the general poverty of the masses. These explanations have undergone subtle variations according to the need and the occasion. Some of the vagaries of the official argument are eminently entertaining. An early explanation set down the material backwardness of the fellah to his improvident instincts, to his love of borrowing and, above all, to his extravagance in matrimonial matters. These reasons were too manifestly thin to pass muster; and accordingly a new explanation, after a complete volte face of the old, was offered to the world, and the fellah was described as a creature who was thrifty even to stinginess and loved to board money underground. T. Rothstein, in "Egypt's Ruin," commenting on this "explanation," says:—

Pity only that this explanation is not new, dating, as it does, back to the time when the apologists of Ismail Pasha were also trying their best to account for the apparent poverty of the masses. . . . The assertion is now, as it was then, perfectly absurd, and only serves to bring into relief the great embarrassment experienced in explaining away a fact which is too patent to be denied straight away.

As a matter of reasonable certainty, the material condition of the masses has not improved very appreciably. They are just able to meet the demands of the fiscal administration; and, perhaps, little is left to them for personal comfort and well-being after they have discharged their obligations to the State. Lord Kitchener's recent scheme of the Village Savings Banks is said to have little chance of success because the fellah would not like to take out his hidden "treasures." Would it not be more accurate and reasonable to assume that he has no hidden "treasures" to deposit in a bank? The problem can, however, be seen in its true perspective if we study it in the light of the fiscal policy which Lord Cromer introduced in the administration of Egyptian finance. T. Rothstein lays bare that policy in a luminous passage. Lord Cromer's task in Egypt, it should be remembered, was mainly financial; and as the author of "Egypt's Ruin" remarks, it was the prime condition of the continuance of the British stay in Egypt that the interests of international finance should obtain complete satisfaction; and it was, therefore, on the administration of finance that Lord Cromer's attention was mainly concentrated. To quote T. Rothstein:—

With a view to obtaining the greatest possible success in that direction, every thing which did not directly bear on the problem was allowed to go by the board, and per contra, all that helped to its solution was carefully attended to. In itself, therefore, it was no concern of Lord Cromer whether the fellah prospered or not, except in so far as he was the prime source of State revenue, that is, a tax-payer, and it was accordingly his tax-paying capacity, not his general material welfare, that he was anxious to develop. It is, no doubt, true that both go usually hand in hand, and that the tax-paying capacity of a people is best developed when its economic condition is taken care of. It is, however, possible to improve the condition of the people up to the limit dictated by the necessities of the fisc, and no more, just as it is possible to take care of a flock of sheep up to the limit required by the interest in their wool or meat. And this is just what Lord Cromer had from the first determined should be the limit of his exertions.

The enormous growth in the cultivation of cotton, to the exclusion of almost every other principal crop, is the result of this policy. Great irrigation schemes were taken in hand mainly for this purpose. We have no desire to underestimate the value of these great works of engineering which have considerably benefited the people, though, in some respects, they have not proved an unmixed blessing. And it is necessary to remark in this connection that Lord Kitchener's Drainage Scheme is not a new "gift" to Egypt but a necessary undertaking to counteract the disastrous effects of the existing irrigation works, which have rendered the lower lands of the Delta water-logged and have diminished the fertility of the soil. The most obvious result of the growth of irrigation facilities has been that the cotton area has expanded enormously. The cotton exports have grown from £6,244,000 in 1884 to £17,091,000 in 1908. But the huge growth in the cotton output has been achieved at the expense of all other agricultural pursuits. As Mr. Blunt says in his article on "Lord Kitchener and His Friends", which we reproduced in our last, "all Lower Egypt is now an appendage of Manchester; for the first time in her six thousand years of labour, food stuffs are being imported into the country. The price of living has been raised fourfold." It looks, indeed, a very doubtful economic situation, when the land that was once the granary of the world has been turned into a huge cotton field. The dependence of the people and the State on a single crop is in itself a great economic evil. It must lead to the inevitable exhaustion of the soil. The limit of cultivation must soon be reached. The world's supply of cotton is bound to increase in the near future. All these factors constitute a grave peril to the economic stability of Egypt and we cannot find much to admire in the régime of the proconsul who mainly cared for the growth of budget and export figures and left so much undone to place the economic development of Egypt on sound and lasting foundations. To borrow an apt simile, Lord Cromer fed Egypt with irrigation to turn it all into cotton just as the geese at Strasburg are fed and fattened until they turn all into liver. The glamour of prosperity that plays over Egypt is, according to the most competent judges, as unreal as the mirage of the Sahara. The ultimate economic crisis cannot be staved off indefinitely; and when it comes the masses would be plunged into unutterable misery and the State finances reduced to bankruptcy and chaos. It is only a thin line that divides the land, now supposed to be blossoming like a rose, from desolation and ruin.

However, the material condition of Egypt under British control has shown some temporary signs of improvement, though the character of the improvement is artificial and the economic basis altogether unsound. But in regard to the moral and political condition of the people, practically no advance has been effected since the advent of the Army of Occupation. The chief concern of the Occupation authorities has been to keep Egypt solvent by any means, and this object has been temporarily attained. The moral and political development of the people was no concern of theirs. New and disruptive tendencies were let loose in the midst of an ancient society and culture; and in the absence of any systematic efforts for reconstruction, the moral fibre and political vitality of the people have been impaired. The result has been an alarming growth of crime, to explain which Lord Cromer and his "advisers" used to expend much ingenuity and verbal sophistry. Indeed, Lord Cromer has built up a series of new sociological doctrines on the basis of some of the ugly results of his rule, which prescribe for the entire East a life of servitude without the least hope of redemption. He it was who first propounded the glaring paradox that the increase of prosperity in Egypt was responsible for the growth of crime. Perhaps, he soon realised the absurd nature of the theory he had evolved, for he seems to have shifted his argument later on and began to trace the cause of the enormous increase of crime to "the fact that the law does not inspire sufficient terror to evil-doers." It did not suit his purpose to take note of the most natural and obvious causes of the phenomenon. Poverty and ignorance do not furnish an ideal atmosphere for the moral elevation of the people. Crime has increased in Egypt because the material condition of the masses is not very enviable, and because the force of ancient moral standards has diminished under the stress of the new political conditions. The utter neglect of public education is the most dismal aspect of the Cromer régime in Egypt. Even in the days of general confusion that marked the close of Ismael's rule, when the population was less than half its present number, £87,000 were spent annually on public instruction. In 1888, the educational budget fell to £70,000. It was only in 1906 that this paltry sum was raised to £362,000, when the pressure of public opinion could no longer be resisted. The budget for 1909 was still below £500,000. The total number of those receiving elementary instruction in State and aided institutions was 165,000 in a nation of over 12,000,000. According to the report of the British Consul at Alexandria in 1873, "the number of those attending primary schools represents a proportion of 17 per 1,000, a proportion less than in any European country except Russia." But after a lapse of thirty years of British administration, when the country has been enjoying perfect peace and order and abounding revenues, the number of those attending primary schools amounts to but 16 per 1,000. There are not much above 600,000 persons in Egypt able to read and write.

The state of higher education is still more deplorable. There is not a single institution in the country efficiently equipped for imparting up-to-date education in the higher branches of modern sciences and arts. The sons of the wealthy classes go to France and Switzerland and other European countries for modern education. A university was started in Cairo at the end of 1908 as a tardy concession to the Nationalist demand, but it has scarcely yet developed to a stage when it could become the centre of intellectual activity for the nation. It was estimated that more than 600 young Egyptians were receiving higher education abroad in 1908; and the number of such scholars is yearly increasing. No people possess greater love of learning than the Egyptians; and the great sacrifices they are making are a true measure of their great thirst for modern knowledge. Yet a frightful mass of illiterate continues to exist in the land and no organised effort has so far been made by the State to raise the intellectual and moral level of the people. Lord Cromer justified his indifference by his shallow philosophy. He even indulged in cheap and vulgar attacks on the character of Islam when he tried to account for his failure by pseudo-sociological dogmas. As T. Rothstien observes, "no truly educated and cultured man will be able to read Chapters XXXV and XXXVI in Lord Cromer's second volume of 'Modern Egypt,' purporting to describe the mind, manners and the religion of the Egyptians, without disgust." And, again, he says:—"It is a very convenient method of accounting for a phenomenon which is discrediting to the power responsible for the government of the country, unfortunately for it, the East and Islam have recently shown examples of moral progress which have left nothing but the broken remains of that specious doctrine."

The effect of the British control on the political status of the people has been uniformly depressing. Almost all the important administrative posts are held by foreigners and the Egyptian Ministry exists only to register the decrees of its "advisers" and of the British Agent. The Legislative Council has absolutely no initiative in the work of legislation and exercises no control over the acts of the Executive. No effort has been made to give political education to the people or train them for the responsibilities of self-government. The opportunities for such education and training are daily diminishing. If a persistent rumour is to be believed, an early attempt will be made to confer full executive powers on the British officials who are at present associated with the Ministry as Under-Secretaries of State. The Nationalist Press and leaders that deprecate these tendencies have been, of late, summarily dealt with. Rigorous Press Laws have been enforced and the discontent has been driven underground. The "Imperialist" Press treats all manifestations of discontent in Egypt as if it were an outbreak of rank sedition against Great Britain. Efforts have even been made to besmirch the Nationalist movement with the odium of anarchism.

The recent punishment of men charged with plotting against Lord Kitchener and the Khedive has a peculiar significance in view of the fact that only in June the British Agent had expressed his pleasure "to be able to report that political feeling has lately been much calmer and that the consideration of practical reforms for the good of the country has apparently become more interesting to the majority of the people than discussions on abstruse political questions which are unlikely to lead to any useful result." If the plot recently unearthed was at all an expression of "political feeling," then we may be sure the feeling is far from "calm." Anarchical tendencies should be suppressed with a heavy hand and no one would welcome the punishment of would-be assassins more sincerely than a true Egyptian patriot. But, is it not a tendency of despotism, however benevolent, to blame the consequence for the cause? Legitimate grievances, when suppressed, turn into a deadly poison and affect the health of the body-politic as a whole. You may plant an iron heel and call it order; but you must at the same time be prepared to wake up one fine morning to hear the rumblings of an earthquake.

The Nationalist movement in Egypt represents the most natural and legitimate aspirations of the people. Rightly understood, it is the best compliment that the awakening mind of Young Egypt could pay to the most wholesome influences of the British control over Egyptian affairs. It cannot be killed by pure repression, nor can it be controlled effectively by alternate frowns and smiles. The co-operation of those who honestly desire the progress of the country in wealth, culture and self-governing institutions, must be secured rather than avoided. It was the unfortunate Denishawai affair that brought the Nationalist agitation to an acute stage. Such incidents only serve to alienate the sympathies of the people. Their ultimate political effect is an increased bitterness of feeling on either side. The political tension gives birth to a silent struggle which, whatever be its end, leads to a frightful waste of energy and retards indefinitely the progressive development of a country. No one can for a moment contemplate, without horror and dismay, the end of a constitutional struggle in revolutionary chaos and carnage. The contingency, however, would not be at all inconceivable if the aspirations of legitimate "nationalism" were systematically met with a campaign of ruthless repression. The Egyptian problem is happily not so acute as to be beyond the resources of good sense and goodwill on either side. We are afraid, however, the recent campaign started against the Nationalist leaders and the Press is not conducive to good results. Egypt is not a dependency of England. Even if it were, British rule could not continue there indefinitely against the wishes of the people. Would it not, therefore, redound to the truly imperial glory of England if Egypt were literally and generously taught to govern herself? The interests of the bondholder and the cotton magnate may be very pressing, but the interests of about 12 millions, hungering for knowledge and comfort and material wellbeing and pulsating with new hopes and new aspirations, are more pressing still. That a country can be governed on the lines of "martial law and no d—d nonsense" may well be questioned. There can, however, be no question that such a governance will reap a harvest of "Denishawais" on a very much extended scale. What a single "Denishawai" has already achieved may best be judged from the following lines that appeared recently in Al Lewa on the anniversary of that unfortunate incident:—

"Oh, Denishawai, God's peace be on thy hills!
Thy memory robs us of our village mirth.
Their graves are here to mind us of our ills,
Their ruined hearth, the holiest of our earth.
Sad souls of men—how valiant in their pain!
Hurt souls of women hurling back their curse.
Here stood the scaffold—nay, but not in vain.
Who taught us cruelty shall take, and worse."

Anecdote.

A RATHER fussy and consequential diplomatist called the other day on a bluff admiral belonging to the United States Navy and left his card. The card was inscribed in the corner with the letters "E. P."

"I hope you got my card," said the diplomatist when, not long after, he met the admiral.

"Oh, yes, I got it all right," was the reply. "But, by the way, what was the meaning of the 'E. P.' on it?"

"Why en personne, of course," exclaimed the diplomatist. "Perhaps you did not know that I left it in person."

"Oh, I see," responded the admiral, with a suspicious twinkle.

In a very short time the diplomatist received the admiral's card, bearing the puzzling letters "S. B. N.," which successfully baffled every attempt at solution. On the next occasion that the nonplussed diplomatist met the admiral he, in turn, asked for an explanation.

"Sent by nigger," was the illuminating reply.

CORRESPONDENCE

Moslems and Social Reform.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE COMRADE."

SIR,—I am informed that distorted and misleading versions of my speech delivered at the last annual meeting of the National Indian Association have appeared in some Urdu papers. I shall be obliged if you will allow me to correct through the medium of your widely read journal, the misconception which are being disseminated, especially with reference to what I said about (1) the seclusion of woman and (2) polygamy.

If the speech, a full report of which appears in the July Number of the Indian Magazine, published by the National Indian Association, is carefully read, it will be found that its underlying purpose was to defend indirectly the fundamental principles and tenets of Islam in their bearing on orderly sociological evolution from the unjustifiable insinuations of its hostile critics. The charges brought against the Muhammadan religion by its enemies fall under the following two main categories:—

(a) That the teachings of Islam are inconsistent with the laws of nature and human progress, and that by stereotyping the crude and changeable conditions which prevailed at the outset of the Moslem era, its tenets have resulted not only in stagnation but in a rapidly increasing intellectual sterility and political decadence of the races which have embraced it.

(b) That in regard to the relation of the sexes it is on a far lower level than Christianity or Zoroastrianism.

It will be apparent to those who read my remarks in their proper context that in alluding to the first charge the words "seclusion of women" and purdah are used throughout my speech in an identical sense. It is essential to bear this in mind to obviate any confusion of ideas in regard to the connotation of the terms "seclusion of women" and the partial veiling of the face when going out (as the educated ladies in Constantinople are in the habit of doing) for physical exercise, fresh air, study or any of those other healthful activities which invigorate the body and vitalize the intellect. My address clearly referred to the former and left the latter convention, which can have no deleterious hygienic effect, quite untouched either in regard to its merits or demerits. I firmly maintain that the seclusion of women as it is in vogue in some parts of India among the upper classes and naturally induces both physical and mental lethargy is not at all enjoined by the Koran. The late Mr. Justice Badruddin Tyabji went much further than this and declared in emphatic terms that a critical study of the Koran and a close analysis of all the six passages taken together which have any bearing on the subject showed that purdah, even in the sense of veiling the face, was not enforced by any Divine Commandment. My observations on the subject were confined to the scientific aspect of the problem in its relation to the laws of health, physical and mental, and of heredity; and I tried to show to a cultured and cosmopolitan audience, which gave the speech a most cordial reception, that the fundamental principles and doctrines embodied in the Koran were not opposed to human progress or sociological evolution. It rests on those who take the contrary view to quote chapter and verse in proof of their assertions. The individual who succeeds in doing this can claim the reward recently advertised by a Mussalman Presidency Magistrate in Madras. It must be remembered that the searchlight of modern scientific and philosophic thought cannot be turned aside by cryptic dogmas opposed to all positive knowledge.

As regards polygamy my observations were obviously intended to remove the misconception that the moral standard and ideals set up by Islam were in any way lower than those of Christianity or any other religion. I pointed out that the monogamous institutions of the West were not the outcome of any divine injunction or of the teachings of Jesus, but of the Law of Justinian, and that in recent years the Parsees elected to be a monogamous people by legislation, which the voice of the community demanded and obtained. The statement that there was nothing to prevent the two great communities of India to resort to similar restrictive legislation, should the general feeling of these communities demand it at any time, followed as a natural corollary. The baselessness of the inference that the Hindus and Muhammadans were counselled to follow in this respect the tenets of the Zoroastrian creed will be manifest when it is remembered that Zoroaster allows polygamy without those stringent restraints which Islam imposes.

Any contention that such option as the Christian and some Jewish races, whose creeds have the same common basis as Islam, have exercised in regulating their domestic concerns is denied for all time to the Moslem races by their religion, must be founded on the unwarranted assumption that Islam condemns monogamy and that no social legislation of any sort or kind is permissible under any conditions—all changes and deviations from the sanctioned practice of the early centuries of the Moslem era being allowable only in regard to criminal legislation. Any such thesis will not stand a moment's examination.

A grave responsibility rests on those publicists, who, like the recessive priesthood of the pre-renaissance times, the fatal obscurantism of which had stimulated the decadence and degeneracy of Christian Europe of that period, sit tight with their backs upon every avenue of light and resist all attempts in the direction of searching out the causes which have brought about the decline of the Mussalman races all over the world, a decline which curiously resembles the depressed position in which Christendom was after as many centuries after Christ as have elapsed since the Hijra. The Christian nations having shaken off the dead weight of obstructive customs are now in the forefront of the world's progress without becoming irreligious. There are no inherent defects and drawbacks in Islam, as supposed by Lord Cromer and others, to prevent the Moslem races from achieving their social, intellectual and political salvation in the same manner by harmonizing their spiritual conceptions with the true spirit of their religion, which is not in conflict with the unchallenged revelations of modern science. For their renaissance it is essential that they should rouse themselves to remove the reproach of an almost complete deficiency of scientific knowledge in the community in an age when physical science, to quote the words of Lord Morley, "has come into reigning power" and cannot be ignored or ridiculed without disastrous results to their material well-being on which their social and political prestige as a great people must depend.

I have no wish to start a newspaper controversy on this subject and trust that this letter will correct the misconceptions which have been disseminated, presumably through incomplete and misleading versions of my speech.

Yours faithfully,

M. ABRAS ALI BAIG.

Civil Justice in the Presidency Towns.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—It is an old cry that justice is costly as it is delayed in our High Courts.

My present object is not to enter into that question. What I wish to point out, and even presume to submit for public discussion, is a suggestion which directly bears on the question and, I believe, may greatly help to remedy public inconvenience and relieve the High Courts of overwork.

The Bombay Civil Courts, for instance, as they are constituted at present make it compulsory for one, living within their jurisdiction, to seek justice only at one of the High Courts of Judicature if his suit happens to be of a nature which cannot fall within the pale and scope of the Small Causes Court.

A suit, for instance, however trifling it may be, such as a suit for a Declaratory Decree of some sort, for some insignificant Easement, for Letters of Administration, for a certificate of Heirship, for setting aside a will, or for hundreds of such claims, which the Small Causes Court cannot take cognisance of, and which are daily and ably decided by the Civil Subordinate Courts in the Mofussil, the High Court has to entertain to-day under its present jurisdiction.

And here comes in my suggestion which the Government and the Public may consider if it be found practical and useful. How would it serve the purpose, if four First Class Civil Subordinate Courts for each of the Presidency Towns, like the Small Causes Courts, be established, with their jurisdiction defined in such a manner as to relieve the High Court of much of its work, which it need not really have been burdened with, and in a manner which would save the public from the enormous and multifarious costs which it has to incur simply because it has to enter the august precincts of the High Court for justice in such suits?

One of these four Judges may be of the rank of a District Judge having appellate powers in the first instance, if the High Court did not approve of the first appeal from the Subordinate Courts lying with them.

On the question of the cost of this new institution I may only hurriedly suggest, for the present, that on the establishment of these Courts so many High Court Judges may not be required. But this is a question which may await discussion after the consideration of my suggestion itself.

If what I propose be adopted of some scheme of the kind I have indicated be worked out I feel inclined to think that justice will neither be delayed nor will it be so costly as it is to-day. It may besides create practice for many a practitioner who has been wasting his life briefless for perhaps no fault of his. The many barriers which come in his way in the High Court may not impede his path in these Subordinate Courts.

The McCormick Case.

The Court:—The witness cannot tell you about the ticks. May I see the copies?

Mr. Hamlyn: Those passages that I have read are very serious evidence against McCormick?

Mr. Rutledge: Your Honour, that question has been asked three times.

Mr. Hamlyn: Your Honour, have you put that question down three times?

Mr. Hamlyn to witness: The two passages I read are very serious accusations against McCormick?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And you are supposed to explain to an accused person anything in the evidence against him.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: The first question asked McCormick, I notice, is whether he holds the rank of Captain and the Order of the D. S. O.?

Witness: I presume I did.

Mr. Hamlyn: There was nothing in the evidence to throw doubts on that point? Are you satisfied that he is entitled to the decoration?

Witness: I have no reason to believe anything to the contrary.

Mr. Hamlyn: Very well, I will take your answer. Did you not think it necessary to ask him what he had to say with regard to those two passages I have read out?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Moosajee is still at Victoria Point.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And in Government employ, not in McCormick's now?

Witness: He is an Opium Licensee at Maliwun.

Mr. Hamlyn: When was it given to him?

Witness: Last April.

Mr. Hamlyn: Two months ago.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And by you?

Witness: By me.

Mr. Hamlyn: How many applicants were there for it?

Witness: Two or three, I think.

Mr. Hamlyn: And I suppose he got that favour for what he did in this case?

Mr. Rutledge: Your Honour, I must object to these absolute insults, without the least foundation, to the witness.

Mr. Hamlyn: If your Honour says it is so, I shall defer to your Honour's opinion.

Witness: Moosajee was given the shop on the recommendation of the Sub-divisional Officer.

Mr. Hamlyn: Which Sub-divisional Officer?

Witness: Mr. Stevenson.

Mr. Rutledge: I should like Your Honour to record the question that was put to the accused.

Mr. Hamlyn: I shall be very glad.

Mr. Hamlyn to the witness: Moosajee had been discharged from the Customs?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: You know that he was not?

Witness: To the best of my knowledge he was transferred to Rangoon and was not discharged from the Customs, but resigned on his own.

Mr. Hamlyn: You do not know that he was discharged for embezzlement?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: And Shwe Yun, the advocate, has been decorated?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: On your recommendation?

Witness: May I explain. I think it was the Durbar. I sent up about 30 names and the Commissioner made his choice and Moun Shwe Yun was amongst them.

Mr. Hamlyn: May I have the letter, Your Honour, that has been put in evidence by the prosecution, the letter of the 3rd July. Turning to the witness he said, "I have come to the letter of the 3rd July, Mr. Andrew, from Mr. Buchanan to yourself. You call this a demi-official letter in official language?"

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: I just want to read it to you. (He reads) "My dear Andrew, Information has reached me from various sources that Captain McCormick (1) abducted and raped a girl named Molassa meaning Aniah, I suppose) aged 11, while I was away on leave. (He was away on leave in the month of April)....."

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, whilst I am on this point, you have already told us in your answers that you stayed at McCormick's house in the month of April?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And I ask you whether you knew that the friends of the little girl had clamoured to see you?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Now, Fatima No. 2, not the mother, the mother's sister-in-law, alleged that she went with a friend to McCormick's house to try and see you and you gave instructions to put what she wanted in a petition. Is that true?

Witness: I don't think that is stated anywhere.

Mr. Hamlyn: Will you say it did not happen?

Witness: Not Fatima the second. The mother wanted to see me, but I did not see her. I sent no messages and gave no instructions.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you send a message that she had to put in a petition?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: You heard it alleged that Fatima, the mother, went to McCormick and demanded the child and he turned them away?

Witness: I know it is alleged so.

Mr. Hamlyn: You know that McCormick was at the time painting his house?

Witness: That was alleged.

Mr. Hamlyn: And that he smeared paint on the woman's clothes?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: And the jacket that was smeared with paint was handed over to the Police?

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn: That jacket was not before you when you were enquiring into the case?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Have you endeavoured to ascertain what has become of that jacket?

Witness: No.

Mr. Hamlyn: Did you ask Lieutenant Finnie to explain why it was missing?

Witness to the Court: Mr. Finnie told me that she handed over the jacket.

Mr. Hamlyn to the witness: Did you report the matter to the Inspector-General of Police?

Witness: About what?

Mr. Hamlyn: About this jacket not forthcoming. This is a serious matter in the administration of justice that evidence of such an important nature should be lost.

Witness : I don't consider the jacket of the slightest importance.

Mr. Hamlyn : Very well, we will proceed with the letter.
Mr. Andrew. (He reads the letter). McCormick's cook's accurate name was John Island. He was living quite close to McCormick's house ?

Witness : About two or three hundred yards away, not in his compound.

Mr. Hamlyn : Malassa was the father of the girl and he died before the enquiry before you was held ?

Witness : He is supposed to have died while the child was with Ma Pe Yin.

Mr. Hamlyn : I take it when you received this letter you regarded the matter as extremely serious ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Before you got this letter you knew that McCormick was very anxious to get Mr. Buchanan out of the place ?

Witness : No, he was not anxious at all.

Mr. Hamlyn : Well, you said he suggested ?

Witness : I don't think I have.

Mr. Hamlyn : He suggested to you that Buchanan should be got rid of. He suggested that you should have an A. C. there ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you not think it was an impertinence on his part to suggest to you what your duties were ?

Witness : I don't remember what I said. I don't think it was an impertinence. I might have thought so if he had written it but not mentioning it casually in conversation.

Mr. Hamlyn : You know that people down there say that McCormick not only commanded the sub-division but the whole district ?

Witness : Emphatically no !

Mr. Rutledge : Your Honour, I object to that, I should like it recorded.

Mr. Hamlyn : Now this letter of the 3rd July, you have already acknowledged, raised serious questions. Did you reply to it ?

Witness : I sent Finnie down.

Mr. Hamlyn : You did not write or telegraph ?

Witness : No, I did not write, I simply sent Finnie down as soon as could be arranged.

Mr. Hamlyn : Mr. Finnie's headquarters are at Mergui, close to your house ?

Witness : His office is in the same building.

Mr. Hamlyn : Did you intimate this letter at once to Mr. Finnie ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : Do you know when Mr. Finnie arrived at Victoria Point ?

Witness : I think it was on the evening of the 18th, I am not absolutely sure.

Mr. Hamlyn : I will agree with you that it was the 18th. You call that going immediately ?

Witness : I am not sure when I got the letter, he went the same week that I got the letter.

Mr. Hamlyn : The letter was delivered to you by messenger ?

Witness : By post, I think. I don't remember. You will see some reference to the letter attached to the petition that was sent up.

Mr. Hamlyn, after looking at the petition, said : The petition apparently does not help one as to the date.

Witness : I cannot tell you the date. To the best of my knowledge I received the letter on a Tuesday and Finnie went on the Sunday after by the Government launch Mercury. There is one mail a fortnight to Victoria Point.

Mr. Hamlyn : How long does it take the Government launch to go from Mergui to Victoria Point ?

Witness : The quickest I have ever done it in was 20 hours, the slowest was three days.

Mr. Hamlyn : Can you explain why there was such delay in sending Mr. Finnie down ?

Witness : I don't consider there was any delay.

Mr. Hamlyn : The letter was dated the 3rd July and I think it was agreed that Mr. Finnie arrived at Victoria Point on the 18th ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : The offences alleged against McCormick are practically the most serious in the Penal Code next to murder and treason ?

Witness : Yes.

Mr. Hamlyn : And you say that a delay of 15 days was reasonable ?

Witness : I say, no delay occurred in sending Mr. Finnie down.

Mr. Hamlyn : This was a matter which necessitated Mr. Finnie putting off everything else and going post haste ?

Witness : He did, in the Mercury ; otherwise he could not have gone, as it is not safe in the monsoon.

Mr. Hamlyn to the Court : Your Worship, I am coming to that part of the case that concerns Mr. Finnie, and it is certainly desirable in the interests of my client that he should be present in the Court, and accordingly I do not propose to go on with this part of the case in his absence. I don't know on what date Mr. Finnie is expected to arrive here ?

Mr. Rutledge : I have told Mr. Hamlyn, your Honour, that it has been reported in the newspaper. I have given him all the information I can.

The Court : Mr. Finnie is expected here on the 13th July ?

Mr. Rutledge : That is the information I have got, as I stated to your Honour when last before you.

Mr. Hamlyn : It will be extremely prejudicial to the accused, Mr. Arnold, if Mr. Finnie is not present when the present witness is being cross-examined as to points which seriously affect Mr. Finnie. My suggestion is that so far as this portion of the cross-examination is concerned the case will apparently have to be adjourned until Mr. Finnie arrives in the jurisdiction of this Court.

The Court : Then you want me to adjourn the case ?

Mr. Hamlyn : Yes, Your Honour.

Mr. Rutledge : Your Honour, Mr. Andrew has to run his district while he is here. It is not the case of a public official who can be brought here in a day. Of course if there are matters upon which Mr. Hamlyn wants to re-cross-examine the witness when he sees Mr. Finnie, he can take his own course and ask you what he wishes to be done. I want the usual course to be taken in this case. I want Mr. Hamlyn to finish.

Mr. Hamlyn : The more expeditious course would be, and I am asking it in the interests of the case, to have Mr. Finnie present when I touch on matters which seriously affect his character.

Mr. Rutledge : That is a very unkind remark. All I want the defence to do is to cross-examine this witness and then if there are matters which arise in connection with Mr. Finnie, when Mr. Finnie comes into this Court, I can have my client brought up again.

Mr. Hamlyn : Your Honour, I think in the interests of my client the case should be postponed. In any case it will be necessary to postpone the case. The cross-examination cannot be continued until Mr. Finnie arrives.

Mr. Rutledge : Mr. Finnie will be here on the 13th July.

Mr. Hamlyn : Continuing, said it would be very prejudicial to his client if he had to examine the witness on points which touched on, and touched seriously, the character of Mr. Finnie, during the latter's absence.

His Worship : You want to adjourn the case ?

Mr. Hamlyn : I leave it to your Worship.

Mr. Rutledge said : He intended to re-examine at length and so wanted Mr. Hamlyn to finish. He did not want another roving commission.

His Worship said : He would postpone it.

Mr. Hamlyn, turning to the witness, said : I wish to ask a few more questions. "Now Mr. Andrew, you told us that you conducted this case in accordance with law ?"

Witness : To the best of my knowledge.

Mr. Hamlyn : You will turn to Chap. XVIII.....

Mr. Rutledge : Your Honour, we have spent an hour on this this morning.

Mr. Hamlyn : I don't think your Honour these comments are necessary. I think Mr. Rutledge is getting very touchy about this cross-examination. Very touchy.

Mr. Rutledge : I am very pleased at it. Mr. Hamlyn, if I may say so.

The Court : I think the Procedure Codes speak for themselves.

His Honour postponed the case provisionally to the 16th of July.

Mr. Hamlyn to the Court : I take it, your Honour, in the meantime, my client Mr. Arnold is still admitted to bail.

The Court : Yes.

The Moslem University.

The New Universities in Parliament.

REFERRING to the question of the Indian Universities in his Indian Budget speech Mr. Montagu said:—

"The Right Hon. gentleman, the senior member for the City of London, posed the difficulty of the Indian University system with, if I may say so, admirable lucidity to the Congress of Universities. The words he used were these:—'How are you going to diminish the shock which the sudden invasion of a wholly alien learning must have on the cultured society of the East? A catastrophic change in the environment of an organism is sure to inflict great injury upon the organism, perhaps destroy it altogether. In the East we are compelled to be catastrophic. It is impossible to graft by a gradual process in the East what we have got by a gradual process in the West.' And so we have the complaint that our Indian University teaching has undermined religions, has weakened the restraint of ancient customs, and has destroyed that reverence for authority which was one of the attributes of Indian character. How can we combat these things? We believe that the dangers of catastrophic change can be mitigated by adopting in India that part of the English system of education which has, so far as the Universities are concerned, proved most successful in moulding character. There is evidence to show that in residential colleges in India traditions comparable to those in our own public schools spring into existence and stamp their indelible impression upon the young men who go there. The formative influence of the residential college can be stimulated by the presence of English masters and professors who have been trained in the same system in their own country, and who know how much can be done by example and how little by homily. It is this side of University education which we propose to develop in India. We have allotted large grants for building hostels and boarding houses attached to colleges. We are finding money for libraries in connexion with the colleges, we desire to develop existing Universities by the creation of chairs in different branches of post-graduate research, and we propose to increase the aid to private colleges. The Universities of India have hitherto been of a federal or affiliating type. At their first inception they were little more than boards constituted for the purpose of holding examinations, and for these examinations students were prepared at a great number of institutions scattered over a wide area. As the Universities were only examining boards they could only recognize merit shown in the examinations. The training of character and other valuable by-products of collegiate life could not be recognized or encouraged. Universities of this type came into existence in England in the last century; but, after a short experience, the type has been generally condemned, and the recent tendency has been for the federal University to be dissolved and for the constituent colleges to become independent Universities. It is upon such lines that the Government of India is directing the construction of the Indian Universities. The first step was taken in 1904, when the area within which each University could exercise the power of affiliation was demarcated. The next step will be to reduce the area over which each University exercises jurisdiction; but where a college is adequately staffed and equipped, and where it has shown a capacity to attract to itself students from a distance, that college will be elevated to the dignity of a University and will be given the power of conferring degrees upon the students who have been trained within its walls. Such Universities will be local and residential in the fullest sense of the term. They will, it is hoped, develop traditions of their own and become centres of learning. The Government of India have expressed a wish to create a University of this type in Dacca, and correspondence is passing between the Government of India and the Secretary of State upon giving a similar status to the college at Aligarh. It is probable that Universities of a similar type will shortly follow at Benares and Rangoon (Hear, hear). Then, of course, there must be, side by side with this extension of liberal University education, an increase of technical education."

Moslem Feeling.

A MEETING of the Central Standing Committee of the Bengal Provincial Muhammadan Educational Conference was held at No. 8, Marsden Street, on the afternoon of the 25th August, to consider the letter of Sir H. Butler and the decision of the Secretary of State regarding the proposed Moslem University. Maulvie Najmuddin Ahmed presided and there was a fair attendance.

Before the proceedings commenced Maulvie Wahid Hossain explained the objects of the meeting.

Nawab Siraj-ul-Islam then moved the following resolution:— "That this meeting of the Central Standing Committee of the Provincial Muhammadan Educational Conference, Bengal, deeply regrets the decision of the Government of India and the Secretary of State that schools and colleges, outside Aligarh will not be allowed to be affiliated to the proposed Moslem University, and is unable to accept the decision as final. This meeting urges upon the Government the extreme necessity of reconsidering the decision."

Mr. M. A. Latiff seconded the resolution which was carried.

Mr. Z. Zahid moved and Maulvie Mahomed Akram Khan seconded the following resolution which was carried:—"That this meeting feels greatly disappointed at the decision of the Secretary of State that the Viceroy will not be the Chancellor of the University and that the powers proposed to be vested in the Chancellor will be exercised by the Governor-General in Council."

Maulvie Shaikh Abdur Rahim moved and Maulvie Azzizul Huq seconded the following resolution which was carried:—"That this meeting has learnt with deep regret, disappointment and pain the decision of the Secretary of State that the proposed Moslem University should in future be styled the University of Aligarh, and, in view of the fact that the Mussalmans have all along aimed at the establishment of a Moslem University, this meeting trusts that Government would not desire to wound their feelings but would reconsider its decision."

Mr. Wahid Hossain moved and Maulvie Mujibur Rahman seconded the following resolution which was carried:—"That this meeting considers it absolutely essential that in order to prevent future misunderstanding and avoidable delay, Government should be requested to communicate on behalf of the Secretary of State and the Government of India, all objections to the draft constitution which they have yet to raise and any further suggestions that they may have to make so that they may be considered by the community before giving a final reply to the Government."

Maulvie Wahid Hossain moved and Mr. S. M. Shariff seconded the following resolution which was carried:—"That this meeting resolves that copies of the resolutions passed to-day be submitted to Government for favour of consideration. That it also resolves that copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the Moslem University the Foundation Committee with the request that a University on the lines suggested by Government should under no circumstances be accepted, and that representations should be made both in India and in England for the reconsideration of the Secretary of State's decision."

With a vote of thanks to the chair the meeting separated.

Moradabad, August 27.

A meeting of Moslems here to-day, Mr. Shaukat Ali presiding, passed resolutions protesting against the Secretary of State's decision in the matter of the Moslem University at Aligarh and appealing to Government to have the matter re-opened.

Press Opinions.

The "Times."

THE Times in an article on the communal Universities of India dwells on the disappointment in some quarters owing to the reported decision of the Government on the question of affiliation. The journal thinks that the linking of inferior institutions might soon debase the hall mark of Aligarh, which has stood for so much in Indian Moslem culture. The question of affiliation is for the somewhat distant future rather than for to-day.

The "Englishman."

THERE is a good deal of dissatisfaction in the Muhammadan community with the Government of India's decision regarding the constitution of the Aligarh and the Benares Universities, the two projected institutions which have excited a good deal of enthusiasm amongst Moslems and Hindus respectively. A recent Communique indicated that the Secretary of State, "whose decision is final and must be accepted as such," had decided that the proposed Universities should not have powers of affiliation outside the locality in which they may be established. Considerable modifications in other directions have been indicated also. "The Secretary of State has decided that the Viceroy should not be the Chancellor, that the University should elect its own Chancellor, and that the powers which it was proposed to vest in the Chancellor should be exercised by the Governor-General in Council, with one exception, namely, that the professors should be appointed without the previous approval of the Governor-General in Council." The Secretary of State also reserves his discretion in regard to other details not specified. Hence the demand, with which we quite sympathise, that they should be specified without further delay. Now it is obvious that, apart from their merits, the modifications in the Constitution of the Moslem University here indicated involve changes which will make the institution, if it is ever established now, a vastly different thing from the University the promoters had in view. For several months past the question has been prominently before the public. The proposed Constitution has been known to everybody. The Government of India insisted on the principle of previous approval of the appointment of professors, and from the emphasis with which this principle was pressed, it might have been imagined—and indeed, the promoters supposed—that this was the greatest, if not the only, objection that Government had to the Constitution. The promoters went on raising money with the projected Constitution as the basis of their promises. The money poured in freely. During all this time nothing was said about the principle of affiliation, and now the Secretary of State comes down upon the scheme with sudden severity and says there shall be no affiliation. As an exhibition of how not to do things this will take a lot of beating. It is not surprising that the Muhammadans resent it and that they are, apparently, in a frame of mind scarcely conducive to a calm discussion of the merits of the question. Where, it may be asked, was the Education Department of the Government of India all this time, that it allowed the impression to prevail that affiliation would be allowed? The great safeguard on which that department insisted was the approval of the appointment of professors: a safeguard which the Secretary of State brushes aside as of no account. It must have been known to the Government of India that the promise of affiliation was being held out by those who were collecting the funds, and our faith in the efficiency and educational knowledge of the Indian Department of Education is not increased by what can only be called an unfortunate bungle. The objections to affiliation should have been raised at the outset by the Government of India which maintains a costly Department of Education for the purpose of advising it in such matters. It has been left to the Secretary of State to point them out in a manner which reduces respect for the Government of India and its Education Department and, at the same time, gives unnecessary offence to the Muhammadan Community.

This is the more unfortunate because the objections to affiliation are sufficiently strong, on educational grounds, to warrant a reconsideration of the whole position by the promoters of the Aligarh University. Already resolutions are being passed to the effect that "a university on the lines suggested by Government should under no circumstances be accepted." Protests have also been made against the change in the relation of the Viceroy to the University and the fiat that the University must be styled Aligarh, and not Moslem. These, however, are matters of comparatively little concern alongside the question of affiliation. Whilst we think the manner in which it has been done is inexcusably clumsy, it was necessary that the matter should be raised. For it vitally affects the efficiency of university education in India. The measure of resentment amongst Hindus at the decision of the Government is not nearly so strong as amongst Muhammadans. In fact, the wiser heads amongst the former are disposed to abandon the idea of affiliation without any qualms. Are not the Muhammadans in danger of making too much of it? For one thing it is premature to talk of affiliation since there are no colleges that could be affiliated with advantage to Aligarh, nor are there likely to be any for many years to come. As we have pointed out before, under existing conditions it would be for the good of the University itself to concentrate its educational activities, at least for some time to come in Aligarh. Build up a teaching and residential university at Aligarh first. Do not dissipate the energies and resources that this task will need in attempting to create and control colleges scattered all over India. The mere act of affiliation will not reproduce an Aligarh in every province, but it may conceivably result in admitting into a circle which should be kept high, select and efficient, educational institutions unworthy of Aligarh and its traditions. That, of course, would be fatal to the whole scheme. Moreover, the Government, as the authority finally responsible for the spread of education in a country where it has been hitherto so neglected, must keep in its own hands the power of control over universities—affiliated colleges. This would scarcely be possible under a constitution allowing very large powers of affiliation. The Government of India, in short, has a responsibility for education which it cannot resign to anybody, however loyal and distinguished. We do not think the suggestion that a political motive is behind the objection to affiliation is at all worthy of those who make it. The subject is important enough to be discussed on its educational merits, and controversialists had better refrain from introducing political passion or fanaticism. There is talk of agitation, of carrying this matter even to the constituencies in England. Those who indulge in such talk do not know how utterly bored the English constituencies are over education. We hope temperate discussion will take the place of agitation, and the Government of India should itself descend from the clouds and discuss matters amicably. For our own part we cannot accept any decision of the present Government as "final," and we are not surprised that the Muhammadans take the same view. But a little friendly talk, before the hot heads prevail, may convince responsible leaders of Muhammadanism that affiliation is not at present essential, that, on the contrary, it is perilous, and that if the course of events justifies it, it may easily be conferred in the future. It would be a great wrong to the whole Muhammadan Community to wreck the University scheme on a question which cannot have any practical bearing for some years to come.

Persia:

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Teheran on 24th August.—The Persian Government has explained its answer to the Russian demand for a concession to construct a railway between Julfa and Tabriz with an extension to Urumiah in a manner which is expected to satisfy Russia. The Russian success is regarded as removing all obstacles in the way of a British concession to construct a line from the Gulf to Khoramabad, to which Britain, in virtue of the rescript of Nasir-ed-Din Shah, appears now to be undoubtedly entitled.

Reuter wires from Teheran on 25th August.—Mukhbir-es-Sultaneh, the new Governor of Fars, has proceeded to Fars with a strong force. It is reported that 300 Fidaïs have joined Salar-ed-Dowleh, who has promised to re-establish the constitution.

Reuter wires from Bushire on 25th August.—Baharoo tribesmen yesterday attacked Bundar Abbas. British subjects were robbed. The raiders have apparently left again.

News received from Bandar Abbas shows that the attack mentioned in Reuter's message was one by common robbers and had no political significance. It will not be necessary to send any man-of-war to the port.

Anarchy in Persia.

(FROM THE "TIMES" TEHERAN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE situation here grows steadily worse and contains so many elements of disruption as to make analysis difficult. There is little but the shell of the Persian organism left, and the belief seems to be general that the shell can hardly last much longer. The departure of the Regent and his virtual abdication of his functions have aggravated the process of decay and let loose a fresh series of intrigues and rivalries.

So troubled are the waters that it would be strange indeed if the ex-Shah—who appears to have no lack of correspondents—and all the exiles whose eyes still turn to Teheran were not seeking once more to fish in them. It is true that Salar-ed-Dowleh has been defeated and has lost his following, but he is still in Luristan, though reported to be moving towards the Turkish frontier. The political situation at Teheran presents no single element of stability, so that Mohammed Ali may be excused for thinking that he may yet have a chance of recovering his Throne. It is certain that he is displaying activity. Paris appears to be the present meeting place of his agents, and his brother Shua-es-Sultaneh, who after his recent journey to St. Petersburg went to Brussels, has recently paid a visit both to Paris and Switzerland, for the purpose of meeting certain exiles. Mohammed Ali is again in correspondence with the Turcoman tribes, and is even said to be contemplating a visit to Europe similar to that which preceded his return to Persia last year. It is worthy of note that the Russian Government appears no longer to admit or assume responsibility for the ex-Shah's movements. This responsibility, before his incursion into Persia last year, was defined by the protocol of 1909; but when the recent arrangements for his pension and departure were made it was found impossible to arrive at any written understanding on this subject, and the Persian Government received only a verbal assurance that Mohammed Ali was not likely to renew his attempt.

The Zill es-Sultan, brother of Muzaffer-ed-Din Shah, still appears to nourish a hope that one day he may return to Persia, either as Governor General of Fars or as Regent. His son, Osmuz Mirza, lately joined the Cossack Brigade as a private soldier; he has now become a sergeant, and is rapidly working his way to a commission. This step was taken with the knowledge of his father and is said to be due to a desire to commend his family to the Russian Government.

Meantime in Teheran itself both the Sipahdar and the Bakhtiari are accused of aiming at the Regency. The Sipahdar was some months ago appointed Governor of Azarbaijan, but did not proceed to his post. It was believed that in a Cabinet reconstruction his services might be required here as Prime Minister and it was known that this commended itself to Russia. Tabriz and the province of Azarbaijan have meantime been governed by his deputy, Shuja-ed-Dowleh, formerly known as Samad Khan, who last year attacked Tabriz in Mohammed Ali's interest and is still an avowed partisan of the ex-Shah. The controlling force in Tabriz is, however, the Russian garrison, and the province appears to be tranquil. It is announced that the Sipahdar will immediately leave Teheran for his post at Tabriz, as the rumour that he aimed at the Regency and even harboured designs for assembling a packed Mejliss to support his candidature has led the Russian and English Legations to think his presence more useful in the provinces than in the capital. It is, however, improbable that he will actually take over the Governorship, as the Russian authorities in Tabriz are believed to be unfavourable to his appointment.

Several members of the Cabinet strongly favour the revival of the Mejliss, though on a different electoral basis. Sardar Assad also lately made a move in this direction and called a meeting at his house to discuss the proposal. As a Mejliss seems the only obvious instrument for effecting a change in the Regency, this has, of course, given new life to the belief that the Bakhtiari aim at the Throne. In so far as any internal force can be said to have control of a desperate situation, this control at present lies with the Bakhtiari, one of whom is Prime Minister and another Minister for War. They also hold numerous provincial Governorships and they possess a comparatively mobile striking force. It cannot be said that they offer much hope of the restoration of order, for, although possessed of the machinery of the Central Government, they take a purely tribal, and not a national, view of the responsibilities of office. Their supremacy at Teheran is also a constant grief to their ancient rivals, the formidable Kashghai tribe, in the South. Of all possible claimants for the Regency or the Throne perhaps the Zill-es-Sultan, whose famous Governorship at Ispahan and Fars has left a name at which the world still grows pale, offers the best hope for the restoration of order. But it is doubtful whether his candidature would receive the support of Russia, and it is certain that it would be bitterly opposed by the Bakhtiari, with whom he has a blood feud. In fact, so long as the Bakhtiari maintain their present position the return either of Mohammed Ali or the Zill-es-Sultan is impossible. Moreover, the Zill is no longer young, and though his prestige is undiminished, age may have dimmed his force.

In the present Cabinet Samsam-es Sultaneh is Prime Minister, Sardar Moktashem Minister for War, Prince Ala-es-Sultaneh Minister for Foreign Affairs, Moavin-ed-Dowleh Minister of Finance, Mohtashem-es-Sultaneh Minister of the Interior, Mustashar-ed-Dowleh Minister of Posts and Telegraphs and Mumtaz-ed-Dowleh Minister of Justice. Since Yeprem's death the Bakhtiari Minister of War has become also Chief of Police, but it has been decided to get the assistance of two Dutch officers for police reorganization. The Cabinet can hardly last very long and already there is a dangerous deadlock. Its members seem utterly overcome by their anomalous position, and it seems certain that they can never be got to take responsibility for any act of government which will involve the country in any important consequences. According to the Constitution, the approval of the Mejliss is necessary for any railway or loan project, and though last month there were signs that the Cabinet was prepared to proceed some way in these matters on its own authority, it is now evident that it will do nothing of the kind. The Persian Government now refuses to move without a Mejliss, and the Russian Government very naturally, after its experience of the hostility of two previous Parliaments, does not desire the summoning of a third. So grave indeed have the issues become and so near does disintegration appear, that the loan project seems to be moribund, and the Trans-Persian Railway scheme can not for the present be taken very seriously here. With the possible collapse of the whole fabric of Government before our eyes and with no clear conception of what is to take its place, schemes for sinking many millions of capital in Persia wear an air of fantasy at Teheran, and there is no doubt that hard realities will presently force themselves on the notice of those who cherish them.

The savings of last year are gone, and the Treasury is empty. The malat, or land tax, has fallen off. The cheques issued by the unfortunate Treasurer-General have frequently been returned unpaid by the banks and payment is sometimes made in bills which have to be negotiated in the bazaar. The second advance sought for from England and Russia has not been made, as it is Russia's wish to wait till the Société d'Etudes is ready to take part in it. The Société d'Etudes was also to make the larger loan asked for by the Persian Government, but the list of securities available has not so far proved adequate for the large amount talked of and for two months no progress has been made.

No sooner is disorder abated in one southern town than we hear of it in another. For five months Mukhbir-es-Sultaneh has been appointed Governor-General of Fars, but he still remains in Teheran, owing chiefly to his inability to come to an understanding with M. Mornard as to the amount of money he requires. Even if he eventually goes to Shiraz, it is too late to hope that he can achieve much. The road is shut, the Persian Government has failed to arrest the assailants of Consul Sinart, and Mohammed Ali Kashguli is now breathing forth threats of war against the new Ilkhani of the Kashgais. The Swedish officers have no adequate resources for coping with the situation. The acting Governor, the Kavamel-Mulk, thwarts them as much as possible; recruiting makes no progress; and the Treasurer-General has no cash to spare for them. To withdraw the British Consular escort would be to expose it to the risk of an incident similar to that which marked its arrival. It was, in fact, either too small or too large for its purpose; too large not to suggest a military demonstration, too small to be immune from considerable risk.

It will be conceded that the British Government has shown great patience in dealing with the situation at Shiraz. In October next it will be two years since the British Note which gave the Persian Government three months to put its house in order. The British Government is still waiting patiently for that result. There may be a hope of its attainment, but it is a dwindling one. It should be realized that the sands are running out.

Persian Government's Want of Money.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

REUTER'S AGENCY learns that according to official telegrams received in London from Teheran the chief difficulty confronting the Persian Government at the present moment is financial. Some three months ago an advance of £200,000 was made by Great Britain and Russia and since then no money has been forthcoming. Of this £200,000 one quarter was retained by the Russian Bank in settlement of outstanding claims, while a similar amount was expended on the pension of the ex-Shah and payments to his followers. This left only £150,000 for the administration of the country, the Government being absolutely without funds. Of this sum a considerable amount had to be expended on the expedition against Salar-ed-Dowleh, who has now been thoroughly defeated by the Government troops. Notwithstanding the best intentions of the Government there was little left on which to maintain tranquillity in the country. The question of a further small advance has been under consideration for some considerable time and every moment's delay in facilitating this advance weakens the hands of the administration. The Persian Government during the past few months has exhibited the friendliest feelings towards Great Britain and Russia and confidently hopes that the two Governments will give both moral and material support in maintaining authority in the country, and that a further advance will be speedily made without the imposition of conditions which a constitutional Government cannot accept without the approval of the Mejliss. The latest telegrams from Teheran state that even with the small means at its disposal the Persian Government is doing its best to maintain order. It is admitted that the situation is not entirely satisfactory, but there is nothing to cause anxiety and there is every likelihood of an improvement.

The Regent, who left Teheran recently, has been for some time in Vienna. He intends undergoing a cure and declares that he will return to Teheran at the expiration of the period of three months for which he left Persia. Meanwhile he is in constant telegraphic communication with the Ministers, all important matters being referred to him, and he says that he has in no way abdicated his functions.

Russian Policy in Asia.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE leading article page of the Novoe Vremya of July 28, now to hand, presents a spectacle of profound interest to the student of modern Russia. It consists of a leading article entitled "In Urumia;" of a "leaderette" dealing with the recent burning of Russian subjects at Khotan (who, it will be remembered, had made an unwarrantable attack on the Chinese and then locked themselves up in a house and offered armed resistance to the authorities); of a "middle" article entitled "Persian Affairs;" of a report on the mutiny of Russian soldiers in Turkestan; and of a long letter from Teheran on the situation in the North-west of Persia. With one exception, therefore, the page is devoted to affairs affecting Russia's relations with China, Persia, and Turkey. The tone, however, in all the articles is the same; it is one savage attack on the Government for neglecting to proceed manu militari in vindication of Russian "rights" and "interests." In Urumia a local tribe, the Shekaks (perhaps incited by the Russians), have protested to the Teheran Government against the presence of Turkish troops, and, not receiving any reply, turned for protection to the Russian authorities. It is the neglect of Russian diplomacy to listen to these "entreaties" and to drive out the Turks from the disputed territory which fills the Novoe Vremya with indignation. "The Shekak tribesmen are not Turkish subjects. Their application to the Russian authorities is not a crime. They are now subjected to maltreatment and ruin because they have appealed to Russia's generosity. Is it for this that they ought to be delivered to disgrace and destruction?"

The organ of the Russian Nationalists is angry over the lack of energy shown by the Government in the campaign against the Shahsevens in North-western Persia. "Our prestige," it declares, "is being injured, and grave complications may be expected in the near future. We shall have to do what we advised three years ago—move into Azerbaijan adequate forces under a capable and energetic chief and crush the Shahseven nomads. Our diplomacy ought not to feel embarrassed by interpellations in the London Parliament (sic), where some members raise a din over every additional Russian soldier in Persia. Let the English introduce order in Southern Persia and not hinder us in exercising our authority in the northern part. There surely is an object for which the Entente and the Convention have been drawn up!"

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

The Montenegrins have withdrawn from Berana.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 23rd August:—The departure of King Ferdinand and M. Gueshoff, the Premier, for Europe and of the Austrian Ambassador for a holiday is regarded as reassuring.

Four hundred Malissori led by priests attacked Durazzo. They were eventually routed by reinforcements. The Malissori lost 30 killed and 70 wounded. There were a few Turkish casualties.

Ferid Pasha has declined the Portfolio of the Interior.

The Belgian, Quetalet, who was arrested recently on a charge of espionage, has been discharged owing to lack of evidence against him.

Reuter wires from Salonika on 25th August:—Djavid Pasha has entered Berana unopposed. The Montenegrins have dispersed.

Count von Berchtold has arrived at Bukharest where he remains for a short time as guest of the King.

Reuter wires from Belgrade:—In consequence of the attack on Sjenitz a crowd of five thousand paraded the streets on 25th August clamouring for war.

Reuter wires from Sofia:—Representatives of all parties from all towns in Bulgaria held a meeting at Sofia on 25th August at which bellicose speeches were made and a resolution passed, demanding the mobilisation of the army, that urgent representations be made to the Powers regarding the autonomy of Macedonia and that war be declared on Turkey if no response be received.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—In view of the continued effervescence in Bulgaria from the Kotchana incident, King Ferdinand and M. Gueshoff, premier, will remain at Sofia.

Turkish officers have determined to resist any suggestions in the direction of decentralisation arising out of Count von Berchtold's proposal.

Reuter wires from Belgrade:—The Turks attacked the Servians at Sjenitz in the vilayet of Rossovo, massacring many of the inhabitants. The Servian Cabinet has met to discuss the situation.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—The preliminary report of the Turkish Commission of Enquiry into the Kotchana incident shows that the civil and military authorities failed in their duties and that troops participated in the massacre. The Porte, therefore, has ordered the guilty to be court-martialled and £1,000 to be distributed among the sufferers.

King Nicholas of Montenegro has assured the Powers that no Montenegrin will be permitted to cross the frontier in future.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on 27th August:—It is announced that the Government has instructed the Valis of all European Provinces to apply the concessions made to the Albanians throughout their districts. The same measures will, it is understood, be introduced in the Anatolian Vilayets.

The report of the attack on Sjenitz is doubted here. The exodus of Servians is believed to be due to Albanians, in returning from Uskub, having sacked the Government magazines of rifles on their way, manifesting their satisfaction in Albanian fashion by discharging their rifles, thus frightening the Christians.

Reuter wires from Cetinje:—The Powers have made vigorous representations to Montenegro, who assures them that she will not act contrary to their wishes. She disclaims any idea of aggression, but declares that she cannot tolerate Turkish frontier fortresses in Montenegrin territory. She appeals to the Powers to settle the dispute.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—Before returning to their homes, the Albanians looted a number of depôts, seizing 17,000 rifles and quantities of ammunition. A number of bands are still threatening the other depôts.

The cruiser Diana has hastily left Malta for Crete where some anxiety is felt as to the situation owing to the discovery of a Cretan plot to seize Samos and hoist the Greek flag. A French warship is also proceeding there.

Reuter wires from Jaffa on August 28th. Six Italian warships arrived here this morning. Three proceeded northward and three anchored here. They searched a cargo boat for contraband.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on August 28th.—It is stated in Turkish official circles that peace will not be disturbed, because there is an army of 300,000 in European Turkey, which could be doubled in three months. The view is also held that the agitation in Bulgaria is certain to subside when justice has been meted out in the Kotchana affair and the Bulgarians are convinced that the Porte will decline to entertain any proposals by the powers on the lines of Count von Berchtold's proposal.

Turkey has instructed her representatives abroad to inform the Powers, when asked regarding Count von Berchtold's proposals, that Turkey cannot listen to proposals affecting her internal policy.

Constantinople, August 6.

According to a telegram from Smyrna of yesterday's date to a local newspaper, the disbandment of the Aidin Redif battalions has begun. Perfect tranquillity prevails, though a strong feud exists between the various Smyrna newspapers.

Constantinople, August 7.

A communiqué from the court-martial is published in the press containing a series of restrictions, including prohibition of the frequentation of political clubs, the carrying on of a political propaganda, or the publication of newspaper supplements without permission of the Government. Beer shops and wine shops must close at eleven, while restaurants, coffee houses and reading-rooms must close at midnight, after which hour no one is allowed in the streets without satisfying the police as to his identity.

Athens, August 9.

According to a telegram from Smyrna the inhabitants of the island of Nikaria have deposed the Turkish authorities and have declared their independence. This island is not one of those occupied by the Italians, and it is believed that the inhabitants have taken this step in order to place themselves on the same footing as the people of those islands over which the Italians have established their authority, and to establish a right to similar treatment. Nikaria lies about twelve miles west of Samos and is inhabited by about 10,000 Greeks, mostly charcoal burners.

Constantinople, August 9.

The censorship on telegrams to the foreign press has now been removed, with an exception in the case of messages dealing with military matters. It is understood that the Government has resolved to expel correspondents in the event of their persistently sending false news.

The measure has produced an excellent impression, and the Government is commended for its action in abolishing a system which, besides being prejudicial to the receipts of the telegraph administration, has not prevented correspondents from forwarding by an indirect route news distasteful to the authorities.

Dissolution of the Chamber.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, August 5.

At the moment of telegraphing the situation is almost ludicrously involved, and were it not for the ever-present possibility of a collision between the opposing parties, all neutral Constantinople would be laughing at the results of this morning's comedy. To sum up the events of the day—first, the Chamber has been dissolved by an Imperial Iradeh promulgated at midnight, of which the Chamber has taken no official cognisance; secondly, the Government has, according to the Committee Deputies, fallen in consequence of an adverse vote of the Chamber given at this morning's sitting after the promulgation of the Iradeh which the sitting refused to recognise; thirdly, the Chamber has voted an adjournment pending its convocation by the President.

To revert to yesterday's proceedings in the Senate, it appears that Ghazi Muktar Pasha gave the Upper House full details concerning the ultimatum received from the formidable Gheg army massed at Kossovopolye, the mustering of a large Tosk force at Berat, and the growth of a most dangerous excitement among the members of the Military League here and in Abdullah Pasha's army in Smyrna. These considerations weighed more with the Senate than the legal arguments by which it upheld the Government's view that a Chamber elected in the place of a preceding Chamber which had been dissolved before its term of four years had expired, could only sit for such time as its predecessor would have remained in office but for dissolution. Five Senators opposed the Government, and Mahmud Shevket abstained from voting.

The Grand Vizier communicated the Iradeh of dissolution to the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber at 9 o'clock this morning. Ferid Pasha received and took act of the communication; Halil Bey either did not receive or did not take cognisance of it, and the theoretically dissolved Chamber opened its proceedings at 10 o'clock. Halil told the House what had happened without stating whether he had received notification of the dissolution. Djavid Bey then mounted the tribune and delivered a long theatrical speech in defence of the Committee of Union and Progress.

He referred in eloquent terms to the services rendered by the Committee to the cause of freedom, and described the condition in which they had left the Empire as almost ideal. He declared that the "great Cabinet" had been terrified into illegality by the threats of ten mutinous officers and the Albanian rebels. He summoned the patriotic element in the Army to come to the rescue of the Constitution. The House, which had taken no official cognisance of the action of the Government, proceeded to pass a vote of want of confidence in the Ministry on account of its illegal action in ordering the dissolution of Parliament and the holding of fresh elections. It next voted its own adjournment pending convocation by the President. At this point the Committee leaders stated that the message from the Grand Vizier announcing his intention of reading the Imperial Iradeh in both Houses in the afternoon had just been received. Halil Bey telephoned to the Grand Vizier that the House did not recognize the Ministry, against which it had just passed an adverse vote. The proceedings then terminated, and the Committee Deputies trooped away, leaving about a dozen members of the Opposition in the Chamber.

At 1 o'clock the Grand Vizier appeared, and, after reading the Iradeh to the Senate, entered the Chamber, where he expressed surprise at the action of the majority and stated that the Government did not admit the official character of the morning's proceedings. The Iradeh was read to a few Albanian, Arab, and Anatolian Deputies and the official Session ended.

Meanwhile Halil Bey repaired to the Palace and asked for an audience of the Sultan, which was refused. Then he returned to the Chamber and was soon afterwards heard to call for the police, whom he requested on their appearance to remove Essad Pasha Toptan, the Albanian Deputy, from Durazzo, who, he said, had threatened to do him an injury. Shortly afterwards Ferid Pasha arrived, locked up the Chamber, and handed the keys to the officer on guard.

Thus ended what the Opposition called Talaat Bey's Parliament. Whether its fate would have been the same had the Committee leaders shown greater moderation in their conduct of the elections is an interesting but unprofitable speculation. It now remains to be seen whether Constantinople will become not merely the official but the real Capital of the Empire in place of the Jewish Salonika and, these latter days, of the Albanian towns of Djakova and Prishtina.

A Hatt-i-Humayun has been issued expressing the Imperial regret at the conduct of the President and members of the dissolved Parliament after the issue of the Iradeh, and declaring that the Sovereign and the nation are full of confidence in the present Cabinet, which is composed of tried and respected statesmen to whom "Allah grant success!"

Remarkable confidence was shown to-day in the Chamber by the Committee leaders. The threats of Deputies like the Jew Masliah to bring their political adversaries to the gallows caused much uneasiness both among neutrals and among supporters of the present Government. It is argued that the Committee, which seems to be entirely under extremist guidance, must have some military force on which it can depend, and the publication of the names of the officers who took part in Friday's demonstration gives colour to the theory, as does the fact that over 100 officers attended a similar meeting yesterday. Among the former, besides members of the late Court-martial, against some of whom charges of torture have been brought by an ex-official, are Ismail Fazil Pasha, late commander of the Uskub Army Corps, Raghib Bey, ex commandant at Tashkishla, Muhi-ed-Din Bey, the capable and popular ex-Governor of Pera, and other officers of note. In these circumstances the public anxiety and the remarkable precautions taken by the Government are equally comprehensible.

(PRESS ASSOCIATION FOREIGN SPECIAL.)

Constantinople, August 5.

To-day's sitting of the Turkish Chamber will be memorable in the annals of the Ottoman Parliament. The deputies met at an earlier hour than usual in order to discuss yesterday's decision of the Senate regarding the interpretation to be placed on certain articles of the Constitution without waiting for any official communication on the subject, but chiefly in order to forestall the reading of the decree of dissolution. The contention in Committee quarters was that as the Government had committed an illegal act the Chamber was compelled to act in self-defence.

Djavid Bey was the only orator, and his impassioned speech which was evidently intended for a wider circle of auditors than the deputies, constituted a vehement denunciation of the Government and all its works, and a glowing eulogy of the Union and Progress party. Djavid Bey declared that the Government was subject to the influence of the Minister of War, who acted under the orders of the Military League. The Government, he continued, not content with dismissing various civil and military officials because they belonged to the Committee party, had induced the Sultan to dismiss two high officials in the Imperial Palace.

Continuing, Djavid Bey said:—"This Government, which includes members who signed the suppression of Midhat's Constitution, will not shrink from a fresh coup d'état. Therefore the Chamber deems it unworthy of its confidence, and expresses the opinion that every Ottoman should refuse to obey its mandates. The real rebels are not in the mountains of Albania, but are assembled at the Sublime Porte. The party of Union and Progress is not afraid of taking responsibility, and is prepared to do its duty come what may, and if necessary it will present its breast to the bullets of the enemy."

The speech, which was frequently interrupted by applause, aroused considerable enthusiasm among the deputies, and the general opinion is that had the Cabinet presented itself in the Chamber at that moment with the decree of dissolution regrettable incidents might have occurred.

Order now prevails throughout the city, which is being continuously patrolled. Troops also are being held in readiness at important points. Just after midday the torpedo destroyer Pelenk-i-Derya anchored off the quay near the Parliament buildings.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Daily Chronicle's Constantinople correspondent has interviewed Djavid Bey, the Young Turk leader whose appeal in Parliament to the army has made a deep impression. He stated that the Government is plunging into ruin, that it disregards the law, and that it forgets the enormous service rendered to the Ottoman Empire by the Committee of Union and Progress. "The nation," he said, "will demand an account of the action of the Government." The dissolution of the Chamber, in Djavid Bey's opinion, will not pacify the Albanians who are struggling for autonomy. As for the Union, it will resist any attempt to exert pressure, and should brute force be employed it will seek to hold a Parliament elsewhere, probably at Konia.

"Nothing," said Djavid Bey, "can hinder the voice of the nation. The officers of the Union are acting with conspicuous openness in the matter of their demands, but the threats of the Government are anonymous. The refusal of the Sultan to receive the President of the Chamber and the denial of speech to a former Minister for War are a violation of decency. The influence of the Union, however, is great. Its proclamations are seen everywhere. It is regrettable that the nation is split into two hostile camps, but I believe the Union will prevail in the end."

(FROM REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, August 6.

The language of the Turkish press on the present crisis is on the whole moderate. The newspapers advise the public to observe calm.

The Tanin confines itself to a report of yesterday's proceedings in the Chamber.

The Iktiham says that the dissolution took place legally, and severely criticises the language of Djavid Bey which might be excusable in the case of an ordinary deputy, but was inadmissible in the mouth of an ex-Minister. The President of the Chamber is also severely criticised for holding a meeting of the Chamber when aware of the existence of the decree of dissolution.

The Yeni Gazeta says that the Chamber showed a want of patriotism, of respect for the Sultan, and of respect for the Constitution.

The Sabah says:—"The Cabinet of Ahmed Mukhtar Pasha is bringing to an end the period of revolution and replacing it by one of tranquility."

The Albanian Situation.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, July 31.

THE Albanian leader Boletinatz has occupied Novi Bazar and set himself up as virtual Dictator of the Sandjak.

August 1.

An officer and 50 gendarmes have deserted from the Gradischa station and have joined the insurgents. Further desertions are reported from Kumanova and other centres. The Ghilan and Senitsa prisons were broken open and the prisoners set at liberty. Idris Safer, with 1,200 men, has arrived at Ghilan, en route for Prishtina.

An unsuccessful attempt has been made to dynamite the Government buildings at Okrida.

August 2.

It is becoming increasingly evident that, even should the Government give way on the question of the dissolution of the Chamber and grant the most important Albanian demands, the troubles in the Northern province will be far from ended. There can be no doubt as to the strength of the insurrectionary movement or that a state of absolute anarchy prevails in Albania. As I suggested when the armistice was announced, the delay has enabled the highland chiefs to perfect their organization, and the number of their followers is increasing daily. Moreover, it is more than probable that the benevolent attitude of the Cabinet and the definite orders to the Army to avoid bloodshed at all costs are being interpreted as an exhibition of weakness.

The Christian tribes are continuing their independent action. At Selice 1,500 Malissori, assisted by many Montenegrins, attacked the blockhouses and summoned the commandant to surrender the arms. On his refusal the rebels opened fire and fighting continued until, owing to lack of ammunition, the troops were compelled to surrender. They were disarmed and liberated. The Malissori now threaten Gusinje. Boletinatz at Vuchitza has notified the inhabitants that taxes are henceforth payable to the Albanian chiefs. Seventy-four officers at Prizrend have telegraphed to the Grand Vizier supporting the Albanian demands and insisting on the necessity of driving the Committee Deputies from Parliament.

While pouparlers are proceeding at Prishtina there are outside the town 50,000 semibarbarous Albanian warriors on the verge of starvation—hungry, desperate men who have been promised one knows not what by their chiefs as the price of their support. The slender crops on which they depend for existence lie this year rotting in the fields, and in many cases their homes have been destroyed and pillaged by passing troops. One cannot avoid wondering what is to become of these people during the long winter months, and it is to be feared that the aftermath of the Albanian revolt of 1912 will present more serious difficulties to the Government than the actual settlement of the outstanding questions at the conference. Later.

Dr. Nazim arrived here yesterday, and was to-day joined by Djavid, Talaat, and Midhat Beys. Their object is to decide upon and to organize the resistance which the Committee shall offer to the Cabinet, but beyond asserting that the strongest possible opposition will be offered by the Young Turk Party nothing can yet be stated as to their intentions. Dr. Nazim met the local leaders in secret conclave last night. Niazi Bey has already left Resna for the mountains with his followers.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

One of the correspondents of the Temps in Constantinople announces that certain friction has arisen between the Military League and the Albanians on account of the claims for complete autonomy which the latter, emboldened by their success, are now raising. "In principle," says the correspondent, "the Military League is well disposed towards the Albanians. Albania ought to organise her schools as she likes. In respect of finance she ought to have the complete disposal of the major portion of her revenues. In a word, the Military League has no objection to the grant to Albania of administrative autonomy as large as possible. But on the other hand it will strenuously oppose all demands for a political autonomy. For example, the League will not agree, as certain Albanian chiefs demand, to placing entire Albania under one governor appointed by the Sultan with the consent of the Powers. Such terms will certainly be made use of by the Committee, which will not fail to point out that the League is going to sacrifice the integrity of the Ottoman Empire."

The Vossische Zeitung prints a message from its Usküb correspondent saying that the negotiations at Prishtina have ended in the complete victory of the Albanians. On Saturday the Government Commission agreed to the following items of the Albanian programme:—(1) The restitution of arms; (2) the right to bear arms; (3) an indemnity for damage caused by the military expedition; (4) a general amnesty; (5) introduction of the Albanian language in the schools and Government offices; (6) appointment of Albanian officials; and (7) the impeachment of the Hakki and Said Cabinets. The correspondent, however, adds:—"After this great success the Albanians will probably put forward other and unacceptable demands."

Reuter's Agency is informed that the Ottoman Embassy in London has received the following telegram from Constantinople: "Ibrahim Pasha, the president of the Turkish Commission in Albania, states that having informed the chiefs of the Albanian movement of the Imperial decree dissolving the Chamber and ordering fresh elections, and having advised them at the same time to return to order and legality, the chiefs received this communication with pleasure and submission, and departed promising they would notify it to their followers and giving satisfactory assurances. Ibrahim Pasha hopes earnestly that the region will shortly resume its normal aspect."

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, August 8.

Martial law has been proclaimed at Salonika and will be proclaimed in case of necessity in other provincial capitals.

The following communiqué has been published by the War Office:—

A telegram from Kara Said Pasha, Commander of the Fifth Army Corps, to the Minister of War states that a delegation of officers handed to him a declaration signed by Naki, commanding the Gendarmerie, and by Major Hassan and other officers representing 114 of their comrades. The declaration contained two clauses, the first apparently affirming the military sentiments of these officers, the second of a nature tending to set the military regulations at defiance.

Kara Said Pasha reports that he summoned all the officers of the garrison, 15 of whom, all belonging to the Gendarmerie, said they approved the declaration, 53 said they would follow the lead of their senior officers, 46 approved the first clause, and 111 disapproved of both.

Further telegrams received from Torgut Shevket Pasha, Commander of the Second Army Corps, and from the Commandant of the Yanina Division, announce that all the officers of their commands have given an assurance of loyalty to the Sultan and of their intention to maintain military discipline.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, August 8.

The proclamation of martial law has produced a painful impression in the town and has annulled the satisfaction hitherto expressed with the Government.

August

The news of the dissolution of the Chamber has produced a disastrous impression in Committee circles here, where the event is referred to as a coup d'état. I learn that the Central Bureau has decided to make a determined last stand to regain the lost influence of the Committee, and Niazi Bey at Besna, and Eyub Bey at Okrida, two heroes of the revolution, are to collect their forces, take to the mountains, call to arms the population remaining loyal to the Young Turks, and thus commence the fight against the present Ministry. In point of fact a Gendarmerie lieutenant with 15 gendarmes, not 1,000 as says the Committee Press, has already deserted Okrida, leaving behind a document which expresses his determination to shed his blood to save the Constitution and country, and to drive out the interlopers who have succeeded in taking possession of the Government and unconstitutionally dissolved Parliament. As these Committee stalwarts will find the mountains at Okrida and Resna full of Bulgarian and Albanian bands and mutinied soldiers, there is apparently little prospect of their meeting with success in these districts. The strength of the Committee locally is to-day almost negligible and a mass meeting held yesterday was attended by only 23 adherents of the party.

The New Revolution.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, July 28.

WITNESSES of the Young Turk revolution of 1908 have been profoundly impressed by the extraordinary similarity between its earlier stages and the recent politico-military movement which has culminated in the fall of the Committee Government of the victory of the "Elder Statesmen."

As in 1908, the revolt of 1912 began on the Albanian marches in the province of Monastir and coincided with the growth of insurrection among the Gheg tribesmen of Kossovo. Its course was marked by the same phenomena; first came the flight to the mountains of the Ohrida, Resna, and Koritza districts of a few determined officers who had "taken the bit between their teeth" and refused to await the orders of the leaders of their organization and of a few hundred soldiers; next the reluctance or incapacity of the local military authorities to deal with the movement, and the appearance in other garrisons of a spirit perilously akin to mutiny. As in 1908, the Central Government was optimistic at the outset. The movement was a mere "bluff" the work of a few malcontent Albanian officers who had led astray the most credulous and ignorant of the soldiery, and would be suppressed by a few proclamations recalling the Army to its duties and by the exemplary punishment of the ringleaders, if and when they had been apprehended by the constituted authorities. As in 1908 Abdul Hamid sent Shemsi and Tatar Osman Pashas, followed by a legion of secret agents, to Monastir to stiffen the waverers among the garrison, so in 1912 Mahmud Shevket Pasha despatched General Teki Pasha and Colonel Shehab-ed-Din Bey, followed by Djavid Pasha, to "restore discipline" while the Committee hurried its three most reckless and determined leaders, Dr. Nazim, Omar Nadji, and Eyub Sabri Bey to the scene of danger.

And all the time in each movement, against the falsetto declarations of the powers that were—Government and Palace in 1908, Government and Committee in 1912—that all was well, and that a combination of paternal clemency and severe disciplinary measures would soon put an end to a mere "local disturbance," one could hear the swelling groundbass of military disaffection and Albanian discontent.

Yet it was not till 9th July when Mahmud Shevket Pasha resigned in obedience to military pressure or was jettisoned by the Young Turks, that the strength of the anti-Governmental movement was generally realised. If the Committee of Union and Progress hoped to save its representatives in Said Pasha's Cabinet by sacrificing the general who had done it such signal service in 1909, it was woefully disappointed. The expectation of its leaders that it would be possible to detach Nazim Pasha from the Opposition or to find another general who would consent, in return for the portfolio of War, to run counter to military feeling, was not realized. Nazim, indeed, entered into negotiations with the Cabinet, but it presently became clear that the old "Liberal Union" general was playing with his would-be employers of the Committee. His terms proved unacceptable—as he intended them to be—and the Government, fearing Ibrahim and Abdullah Pashas, aware of Tatar Osman's unfortunate record, turned to Mahmud Mukhtar, who had the reputation of being a strong and ambitious soldier. For the best part of two days Mukhtar negotiated with the Ministry. He insisted on the abolition of martial law at the capital and the proclamation of a general amnesty. The Cabinet accepted his term, and on Monday (15th July) the news of his nomination was believed to be a question of hours.

Tuesday (16th July) came, but brought with it no Imperial Irade naming a new War Minister. Mukhtar's friends said that he preferred to enter upon his functions on a luckier day than Tuesday, but it was also believed and rightly that the Cabinet, and especially the Minister of War, were sounding the provincial Army Corps with regard to their views as to his appointment.

A new figure now dominates the situation at Constantinople—Hurshid Pasha, ex-A.D.C.-in-Chief to the Sultan, Minister of Marine under Said Pasha, and Acting Minister of War since Mahmud Shevet's resignation, a hard-headed Circassian, who was not afraid of facing facts. On Tuesday afternoon the news from Albania which had been bad during the past week, grew suddenly worse. The insurgent bands were suddenly growing into armies. Prishtina and Prisrend were about to close the markets (the sure sign of war in Albania), and, what was even graver news, the First (Yildiz) Division [at Djakova] had deposed its commander, Hassan Izzet Pasha, and was demanding the resignation of the Cabinet and the dissolution of the Chamber; two of the three divisions of the Uskub Army Corps were equally disaffected; reinforcements urgently required, but since the Ishtip Redif division had disbanded itself at Mitroviza and gone home and the Monastir Corps intimated the Government did not know whom to send to the front. Moreover, Abdullah Pasha's six divisions at Smyrna were solid, save for one battalion, which they had disarmed, against the Government, and expressed no enthusiasm at the proposal to appoint Mukhtar in Shevet's place. Other commanders in the provinces reported in the same terms as Abdullah, and Hurshid, after expressing his opinions before the Council of Ministers, resigned.

In vain did the Grand Vizier urge him to reconsider his decision. Hurshid was inflexible—gave his resignation and departed to the Palace, where he is believed to have told the Sultan the truth about the situation. Talaat and Djavid now sought to encourage their depressed colleagues and counselled resistance but Said Pasha had had enough difficulties to cope with. Late that night he proceeded to the Palace and laid his resignation before the Sultan.

The Sultan summoned the Presidents of the Senate and Chamber, Ghazi Ahmed Mukhtar Pasha, G.C.V.O., and Halil Bey and the members of Said Pasha's Cabinet. The question of the choice of a Grand Vizier was discussed. The Committee Ministers counselled the appointment of Tewfik, whom they considered a suitable Grand Vizier for a neutral interregnum between two periods of extremist dominance. Other Ministers spoke of Albanian and army discontent and the growing clamour for the return of Kiamil. Halil expressed his astonishment that the name of Kiamil, "the deadly foe of the Committee," should be mentioned before a Sultan who was the Committee's patron. As for the Albanians, they were rebels and reactionaries, who designed his Majesty's dethronement in favour of Abdul Hamid. The Sultan turned to Ghazi Mukhtar. "My information is different," the old Marshal is said to have replied; "the Albanians are loyal to the Throne." At length the Sultan decided to summon Tewfik from London. An Imperial telegram was despatched, and the Committee leaders supplemented it with appeals to the Ambassador to hurry to Constantinople.

On Wednesday afternoon (17th July) the fall of the Cabinet became known. The Committee Press for the first time was downcast. "We had armed and armoured our champion, Said Pasha," wrote the Tanin, "only to find that he would not stand to meet our foes."

On Wednesday evening further telegrams reporting military disaffection came in from Uskub. The organs of the extremists reported that Tewfik had accepted the Grand Viziership, but this was not so. Tewfik replied to the Sultan refusing the Premiership unless he received a promise that the Chamber would be dissolved. To Talaat and other Committee leaders, who telegraphed repeatedly to him, he replied on every occasion with a message simply announcing the receipt of their telegram and the time at which it had reached him. When conditions at last became known the Committee refused to discuss them.

Meanwhile the attitude of the army at the capital and of many of the provincial troops became more threatening. The Military League circulated a proclamation reproaching the alliance between the Committee and part of the officers' corps, condemning the reactionary tendencies of the extremists, and pointing out that the majority of officers were compelled for the moment to take part in politics with the object of making an end of politics in the army. On the evening of the 18th, 77 officers, belonging mostly to the Constantinople garrison, met at the War Office. Telegrams were read from Smyrna and the Albanian garrisons demanding the appointment of Kiamil as Grand Vizier and Nazim as Minister of War and the dissolution of the Chamber and announcing their intention of directing affairs pending new elections. The meeting appears to have adopted these resolutions, which they laid before Hurshid Pasha. Late that night Hurshid, Hadi and Nazim Pashas visited the Palace and described the situation to the Sultan, who showed a natural concern. Great tension marked the whole of Friday, 19th July, and even the most sceptical were convinced that the spirit of disaffection to the Committee régime had reached a high pitch in the Constantinople garrison by the Imperial proclamation exhorting the Army to maintain discipline, which was read to the troops after Salamilik. Rumours of intrigues in favour of the Heir-Apparent were rife and caused great anxiety at the Palace.

After nightfall the Sultan summoned Ghazi Mukhtar and Halil Beys. He is said to have informed them that the situation was worse than ever, and that, though he had contemplated naming Kiamil as Grand Vizier, he could not, as a Constitutional Monarch, take into consideration the unconstitutional demands of mutinous officers. Ghazi Mukhtar must endeavour to form a cabinet, including Kiamil and Hilmi Pashas and other elder statesmen. The Ghazi consented, and immediately entered into communication with Kiamil and other ex-Ministers, who all agreed to serve under him. On Saturday it was reported that Kiamil had accepted the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. It was known that the Sultan had summoned him with Nazim and Hilmi Pashas to the Palace and the news of the formation of the new Cabinet was expected to arrive at any moment. The members of the Committee Parliamentary Party, who had received no adequate explanation of Said Pasha's resignation, met meanwhile first in committee room, where they indulged in some criticisms of their leaders, then in debate in the chamber, where they voted a resolution calling on Said Pasha and his Cabinet to come immediately and explain the situation. Said put them off. Some of their leaders now seem to have conferred with the Dashnakist Armenians and to have discussed the possibility of resistance, but moderate counsels fortunately prevailed, and the day passed quietly. But the Cabinet was not yet formed.

On Saturday morning the Albanians captured Prishtina and telegraphed to the Sultan, energetically demanding the appointment of Kiamil Pasha to Grand Viziership. Many of the provincial garrisons seem to have done likewise. These telegrams from insurgents and mutineers placed Kiamil in an extremely difficult position, and he now expressed his desire to withdraw from the proposed Ministerial combination. Meetings were held at the Palace on Saturday night and on the morning of the 21st, at which Nazim, Hilmi, and it is believed others refused to enter the Cabinet unless he came in. Finally, it is believed that some sort of "deal" was effected by which Kiamil was to enter the Cabinet in the capacity of president of the Council of State, with the reversion of the Grand Viziership should Ghazi Mukhtar retire from office in the near future. On Sunday night the Ghazi formed his Ministry. The first act of the revolution of 1912 was over.

Letter from a Monastir Officer.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, August 5.

CHERIF PASHA, who was proscribed by the Committee of Union and Progress and has just been amnestied, communicates to the Temps a signed letter under the date 23rd June which has been addressed to him from "the Forest of Tracher" by one of the officers who after the military demonstration at Monastir fled to the mountains with Tayar Bey. The officer states that he and his comrades had left their regiments in order to serve the national cause, and by no means for the purpose of helping the Albanians to obtain autonomy, still less for the promotion of their own personal ends. They repudiate with indignation the charge of treason. Their view is that the army, which imposed the Constitution and earned the enthusiastic gratitude of the people, has, in consequence of the action of some of its officers, become "a dangerous instrument in the hands of a few wretched politicians." The army has been stained by the ignoble part which it has been made to play, particularly at the last elections, when certain officers threatened the electors with whips and even with bayonets in order to obtain votes for their candidates. The writer asserts that the military supporters of the Committee form a small minority and that enlightened opinion throughout the whole corps of officers is in sympathy with his views. After drawing a dismal picture of the state of Turkey, he continues:—

"We officers have sworn to be faithful to our Sovereign and to our country, but certainly not to Mahmud Shevket, who is devoid of all sense of honour and of dignity, or to Talaat, the ex-postman, or to Djavid, the ex-elementary schoolmaster. The destiny of the country cannot be dependent upon that handful of wretched creatures. What merit can the few partisans of the Red Committee discover in this (the late) Government? What has it done for the Tripolitaine or for Albania or for Arabia? Do not all its patriotic efforts amount merely to bloodshed?"

The writer describes the discipline of the army as being entirely destroyed and the officers of the highest rank as taking orders from subalterns. He and his fugitive comrades are everywhere welcomed by the population with open arms and are promised enthusiastic support.

Peace Negotiations.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE Continental press is full of rumours and denials of rumours that unofficial negotiations are being carried on between private but authorised persons with a view to discovering a compromise for the conclusion of peace between Turkey and Italy. The well-known Tribune de Genève professes to know the exact details of what is going on. The place where the negotiations are carried on is Evian-les-Bains, the watering place on the Lake of Geneva. The negotiator on the Turkish side is Prince Said Halim Pasha, the Khedive's cousin and a member of the Ottoman Council of State. The negotiator on the Italian side is Count Fusinato, a former Minister for Foreign Affairs. The initiative in the matter, says the journal, was taken by Said Pasha, the late Grand Vizier, and the Turkish terms are:—Recognition of the occupation and of the administration of the two provinces by Italy, but with maintenance of autonomy under the sovereignty of the Sultan, as represented by a Viceroy, a Moslem. The Neue Freie Presse of Vienna confirms this report, but puts in the place of Count Fusinato another negotiator—the one who was mentioned in the first reports, viz., Signor Volpi, director of a bank in Venice, who has financial interests in Montenegro and elsewhere in the Balkans.

In its turn the Vienna correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt claims to know that the two negotiators at Evian are really acting in consultation with others who are staying on the opposite shore—Prince Said with Ferid Pasha, the ex-Grand Vizier who was recently offered the Ministry of the Interior, who is at Ouchy, and Count Fusinato with Signor Melegari, the Italian Ambassador at St. Petersburg, who is staying at Lausanne. According to the Neue Freie Presse, the negotiations have so far been successful that the late Ottoman Government deemed it advisable to appoint a committee of nine to tackle the problem seriously, and these men went to Lausanne. The Secolo, of Milan, however, hears that the negotiations have had no success, but Prince Said has been confirmed by the new Government in his rôle of negotiator.

All this crop of rumours leads the semi-official Popolo Romano to observe that Italy has never demanded the express renunciation of Tripoli by Turkey, but that Italy would be prepared to make peace and renew diplomatic relations if the Italian sovereignty over Libya were recognised by the Powers, and Turkey recalled her troops.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Cologne, August 7.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Kölnische Zeitung telegraphs that the report is confirmed at the Russian Foreign Office that negotiations are proceeding at Zurich between Turkish and Italian diplomats with a view to bringing the Turco-Italian conflict to an end. These negotiations were, as a matter of fact, broken off for a short while, but they have since been resumed with, it is believed, the Italian Ambassador in St. Petersburg as the principal representative on the Italian side. The impressions prevail that this resumption was proposed by Turkey, which is now displaying a more yielding disposition.

Austria and Italy.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

A VERY remarkable statement is made by the Temps in the course of a leading article on Albania. According to this generally well-informed journal, "a rather serious tension exists at the present moment between Rome and Vienna on the question of the division of their respective spheres of influence in this country. It appears that Southern Albania had been reserved for Italy and Northern for Austria, but since the war in Tripoli public opinion in Italy has been loudly demanding Valona, the Albanian port, in order to convert it into a naval station. In these circumstances Austria would be condemned to see her ports of Pola, Trieste and Fiume losing all their strategical importance, and it is intelligible that these Italian schemes should be violently combated in Vienna. On the other hand, it is pointed out in Rome how considerably Austrian influence has extended in the Southern zone, where Italy is supposed to have rights." After giving a detailed account of the propaganda work done in Albania on behalf of Austria by the Catholic clergy, the journal observes:—"It is natural that there should be some uneasiness in Rome over these results of Austrian propaganda, and, without going so far as to believe with certain political quarters in Vienna that the Albanian revolt is largely due to Italian intrigues, it is certain that the Albanian question has assumed a prominent place among the problems with which the Roman Cabinet has had to occupy itself since the war." It had been known that Austria and Italy are bound by an agreement concluded some fifteen years ago to desist from any territorial design in Albania. Though similar agreements in other cases generally aim at an eventual partition of the country whose independence is thus "guaranteed," no such secret provision was suspected in relation to Albania—the more as it is difficult to see what Italy would gain by obtaining the southern part of Albania, which is entirely devoid of ports. On the other hand, a perusal of the Italian and Austrian press reveals no trace of a discussion of the question such as could confirm the allegation of the Temps. Developments will show whether the statement of the Temps is not one of those little manoeuvres inspired by certain diplomatists which are intended to increase the distrust between the two none too friendly members of the Triple Alliance.

Turkey's Strong Man.

(FROM THE BIRMINGHAM "DAILY POST" LATE CORRESPONDENT IN THE NEAR EAST.)

FIVE AND THIRTY years have passed since I first met the distinguished soldier who now holds the destinies of Turkey in his hands. At that time he was practically unknown outside his own country, yet he had successfully stamped out a rebellion in Yemen, had put down one of the ever-recurring insurrections in Crete, and with very inferior forces had held in check a rising in Montenegro. He had studiously held aloof from politics, and so had not come under the personal ken of those special correspondents whose vision is bounded by the Sublime Porte on the one side and the Embassies of the Great Powers on the other. He was a soldier of the highest scientific attainments, an astronomer of European reputation, and had a wide practical experience of war. Sprung from a wealthy family in Stamboul, Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha enjoyed all the educational advantages that money can procure. He was a fluent French and German scholar, spoke Arabic and Persian, in addition to his native Turkish, and had more than a bowing acquaintance with modern Greek. After passing through the Military College at Pancaldi, Ahmed Moukhtar Bey went into the senior department and qualified for the Staff, and shortly after was selected by the Sultan Abdul Majid as Military Governor for his nephew, the Prince Youssuf Izzet-din, at the present moment heir to the Throne. On the accession of Abdul Aziz, Colonel Ahmed Moukhtar Bey was nominated one of his Chamberlains, and in this capacity accompanied the Sultan in his visit to Western Europe in the summer of 1867. He was then promoted major-general, and resumed an active military career, the succeeding ten years being spent almost entirely in the field, and in the early part of the year 1877, when war with Russia appeared inevitable, he was made Governor-General of the Province of Erzeroum, with the command of the Fourth Army Corps on the Asiatic frontier, in what we know as Armenia. It was on the heights overlooking the Zewin River in the month of May 1877, that I made the acquaintance of the field-marshal. Simplicity is the key-note of his character, simplicity was the key-note of his surroundings. Ghazi Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha is close upon eighty, and though he bears his years lightly he cannot hope to hold office for any length of time. Office has sought him, not he the office; and though Ghazi Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha enters politics at an advanced age, it is generally felt that he is one of the few men in Turkey able to keep the Ottoman Empire afloat. The very fact that he is not a politician is in his favour. Turkey has had more than enough of men scrambling for place and power. The honest, God-fearing upright Turk is weary of the disciples of Abdul-Hamid, who have as a last resource adopted Constitutionalism. It is inconceivable to think that Ghazi Ahmed Moukhtar is taking office as a stop-gap for a Kiamil or a Said Pacha. He is younger in years and far, far younger in bodily and mental activity than either of these professional politicians, who have alternately held the post of Grand Vizier for the past thirty years, men who were living incarnations of Hamidian policy, and now pose as the apostles of freedom. Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha is well known to have been a stalwart opponent of Hamidianism, the advice he felt called upon to tender to the Sultan led to his being practically banished to Egypt, and his son who sits in the Cabinet as Minister of Marine is known to have been a staunch supporter of the Revolutionary party, even when to be known to harbour views on Constitutionalism was fraught with grave danger. Honest as the day, the new Grand Vizier is not likely to truckle to party—he is above both. If he is satisfied that common rumour is not a lying jade and that the recent elections were conducted in an unconstitutional manner, we may rest assured that the Chamber will be dissolved and that no Stambouloffian methods will mar the honesty of the coming elections. If promises have been made to the Albanians, those promises will be kept. He is strong enough to maintain order without recourse to ultra-constitutional devices. Martial law and the press censorship have already been done away with, and many victims of the recent courts-martial have benefited by the Royal clemency. The difficulties before the new Cabinet are immense, they are not insurmountable. Peace with Italy, peace with honour (to borrow the Disraelian phrase), concessions to the Albanians, a thorough reorganisation of the finances of the Empire and of its navy, ensuring the command of the Aegean, if not of the Black Sea, and lastly so shaping the domestic policy of the Empire as to harmonise the conflicting ideas yet identical interests of the various races subject to the Sultan. As regards the Italian question, it is quite open to debate whether, viewing the impossibility of Turkey being able to reinforce her troops in Tripoli, it would not be advisable to withdraw from her present untenable position and leave the Italians to deal with the Arabs at their own good pleasure. Financially speaking, Tripoli has always been a white elephant to the Porte, and it is very doubtful whether Italy will not find it a grievous financial burden. In the matter of financial organisation too the new Grand Vizier has selected the man best fitted to deal with the situation. Abdur Rahman Bey was for many years Chief Secretary to successive Ministers of Finance. For the past fifteen years his name has always been brought up as the best man whenever a vacancy occurred in the Ministry, but his inflexible honesty stood in the way—there was no room for an honest Minister of Finance in the Hamidian Administration. In his own son Mahmoud Moukhtar Pacha the Grand Vizier has an exceptional man. Although a soldier Mahmoud Moukhtar Pacha has for many years devoted himself to a study of the navies of the world. He held this office prior to the Italian war, and he it was in the face of much opposition, who carried through the orders for the two super-Dreadnoughts which were placed with the Armstrong-Clydebank-Vickers group a couple of years ago. The health of Ferid Pacha, an ex-Grand Vizier, prevented his acceptance of the Ministry of the Interior. Ferid Pacha is an exceptionally able man. He belongs to one of the oldest Albanian families, and is closely related to Ismail Kemal Pacha, the leader of the Albanian revolt. There is a talk of his Highness (for as an ex-Grand Vizier Ferid Pacha is entitled to the prefix of Highness) becoming President of the Senate. Here his firmness of character, his wide experience, and his charming personality would have full sway, and he might be of more real use to the Empire as President than in charge of a portfolio. Although Nazim Pacha is nominally Minister of War, we may rest assured that Ghazi Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha will keep his watchful eye on this department. At the close of the Russian war he was made President of the Commission which carried through the reorganisation of the army on purely territorial lines, Von der Goltz Pacha being a technical adviser on certain matters. The difficult question of enrolling Christians, of giving them important commands, and of compelling Moslems to be subordinate to them, has never yet been settled. We, at any rate, cannot throw stones at the Turks in this respect, for we do not allow subject races to command Englishmen in India. To put forward the case of Armenians or Moslems holding commands in the Russian Army is not analogous. In certain parts of the Ottoman Empire the Moslems are in a minority. For instance territorial regiments in the Epirus would be chiefly composed of Greeks, in Northern Macedonia and in parts of Thrace they would be mainly Bulgarian, in the vilayet of Kossovo largely Servian. Presuming a war to break out with Bulgaria, Greece, and Servia allied against the Porte, what reliance could be placed on the regiments drawn from the inhabitants of the provinces bordering on those kingdoms?

There is one point in connection with the present Cabinet which must not be overlooked. The reigning Sultan, Mahmoud Raschid the Fifth, does not enjoy the best of health. The Heir-Apparent has a strong predilection for his old tutor, Ahmed Moukhtar Pacha, and for his old school fellow, or rather, class-mate, Mahmoud Moukhtar. According to all accounts, the Prince Youssuf Izzet-din is a strong man, who has no intention of being the mere cypher that his cousin is. Whilst delegating full powers to his Ministers, he will govern as well as reign. He will not consent to be the mere "Registrar" of Ministerial decrees. Already there is a strong party in Turkey who wish to see their Sultan assuming a little more power. There is a wide gulf between the tyranny of the ex-Sultan, Abdul Hamid, and the self-effacement of the Sultan, Mahmoud the Fifth. They would like to see this gulf bridged, and standing on the bridge a monarch who would resuscitate the glories of the Ottoman Empire, restore peace at home, and enforce respect from abroad. With Ghazi Moukhtar Pacha at the Sublime Porte, Turkey may yet assume the rôle of a "Great Power."

The Perils of Turkey.

THE collapse of the Young Turkish oligarchy has opened a long vista of perils for the Turkish Empire, and merely to catalogue them is to empty the vials of the Apocalypse. But there is one reserve which must be made before indulging in such an exercise. We are considering the case of a primitive and ill-organised community. If it has intelligence to know that it is dying, it would instantly expire. But a beneficent stupor comes at these crises to its aid. A people with a more complicated brain and quicker nerves would long ago have succumbed. Surgeons know that there are stolid races endowed with an insensibility which renders anaesthetics almost superfluous. It is the business of the contemporary historian to know that some Empires are in the same case. Mischief which would mean revolution in France are patiently endured in Russia, and perils which would be fatal to any European State go heedlessly over China or Turkey. We are not quite sure that the new Turkey with a sort of Parliament and a relatively free press is altogether in the same happy case for ignoring its perils as the Turkey of the old régime. The old unanimity of the governing race is gone, and gone too is the religious veneration which gave the Caliph authority. But we are still dealing with a low organism which has something of the worm's happy knack of surviving mutilation, and if the catastrophe does come, we may safely predict that it will not move to its climax with European swiftness. The first words of Turkish speech which the traveller learns on Ottoman soil are the recurring exhortation, "Yavash, yavash" (slowly, slowly). It will be to that refrain, when at last the hour of destiny strikes, that the Turk will take his "bag and baggage" out of Europe.

The catalogue of perils, if one were to set it out in plain consecutive words, would run somewhat as follows:—(1) civil strife between the Committee and the Military League; (2) the Albanian rising; (3) the smouldering Arab revolt; (4) terrorism and ultimately a general rising in Macedonia; (5) the perennial Cretan trouble, which must come to a head in October; (6) an attack from Montenegro, timed in connection with the Albanian rising; (7) a declaration of war from Bulgaria as a sequel to the Macedonian events; (8) the war with Italy. Eight plagues may be thought to suffice, but the real catastrophe, the final revenge of destiny, would be no one of these; it would be the military intervention of Austria, which any movement, whether by Montenegro or Bulgaria, would almost certainly precipitate. We are not at all sure that the mere concatenation of mischiefs need in itself spell disaster. To a certain extent they neutralise each other. A civil war between the rival military parties would be a perfectly possible development of the present struggle between the Young Turks and the so-called "Liberals," if it were not that the Italian war and the risk of other wars must impose a certain abnegation on the most furious partisan. An Albanian rising ought to favour a Macedonian rebellion if either party were ready to respect the other's claims. But while there are two great tracts of country which are certainly Albanian and Bulgarian, there is a large debatable territory, including the two key-towns of Uskub and Monastir, which is claimed by both races. That means that neither of them would wish to promote the full success of the other, and both in consequence may refrain from striking the decisive blow while the common enemy is at his weakest. It is also clear that Montenegro could with ease destroy the isolated Turkish garrison of Scutari while the Albanians are in revolt around it; but if that were to happen, it is quite likely that at least the Moslem Albanians would fraternise with the Turkish troops, and join forces against an invader doubly obnoxious, because he is at once Christian and Slav. Even Italy, though she must wish to press any advantage which would end the war, will recoil from action which might cause the Albanian question to be settled under conditions which would give the decisive voice to Austria. Finally, we have to reckon with the diverse levels of culture which make any common action between all the victims of Turkish centralism almost impossible. Bulgarians and Greeks are at a common level of civilisation. Their leaders are educated men who really know the complicated chess-board, and in spite of the follies of the past, they have now reached an apparently solid understanding. But among the Albanians, the leaven of education has only just begun to work. Their hatred of the Turks is passionate; their desire to be left alone to their own devices is traditional and general; but we doubt if they yet effectively desire autonomy, or whether their illiterate clan chieftains can even conceive a national political organisation. For that reason it is improbable that they will know how to act, though the game is in their hands. As for the Arabs of the Yemen, it is improbable that even a rumour has yet reached them of the happenings in the far North, and still more improbable that they will understand it when it reaches them. They know the Albanians only as the white-capped soldiers who are led out to die in their deserts under the Turkish flag. It is a strange web of jarring interests, and we find it quite conceivable that the white-bearded Ministers at the Porte, who have tranquilly survived the Crimea and San Stefano, seen two Young Turk revolts, and deposed three Sultans, may know how to ensure the survival of the Ottoman State by a serene inaction and an adroit manipulation of conflicting perils.

From the standpoint of the ancients who are facing this crisis, it is inevitable that the various mischiefs should range themselves in a certain order of gravity. The Italian War matters only in conjunction with the rest, and may therefore be ignored. It is evident that the Italians are being amused by clandestine negotiations, and for the rest their hostility matters no more than it has done at any time since last September. The difficulty with the Chamber bulked largely in the telegrams, but frankly it can never have given much trouble to a resolute statesman. Everyone knew that the late Chamber was packed, and no one is shocked because the letter of the Constitution has been somewhat strained by its dissolution. It is harder to be sure that the Young Turk Committee is finally beaten. We should have said that it had lost its following in the army, had not the Cabinet, after abolishing martial law, within ten days revived it. That means that it dreads conspiracy or a military prounciamiento. The Albanians must be met by large concessions, but if this expedient grows difficult, their leaders are probably open to bribery, and the emotions of the mass can always be reached by an appeal to their solidarity against Slavs and foreigners. They would rather massacre Slav peasants than fight the Turks.

The real trouble begins when we consider the attitude of the Bulgarians in Macedonia and the Kingdom. They welcomed the Constitution sincerely. They even wished, in spite of some grave reasons for disappointment, to march in a body with the Committee's troops at the time of the coup d'état in 1909. They have since been harried and provoked to a point at which a race so steadfast and intelligent listens to no talk of compromise. It is significant that they took no share in the occult revolt of the Military League, or in the qualified and nominally loyal rebellion of the Albanians. They have their own plans, and have ceased to think of reforming the Turkish State, or making its Parliament a reality. Some months ago their revolutionary organisation fixed its date for a general rising about September, and the usual preliminary acts of terrorism, followed by the inevitable Turkish reprisals, are now taking place. An unusually pacific Ministry is in power at Sofia, but it is none the less quietly making its military preparations, and it has entered the first of its diplomatic protests at the Porte concerning the illtreatment of its race fellows in Macedonia. All this has happened before. What is new is that there is good reason to believe that the Austro-Bulgarian entente, which first declared itself at the time of the Bosnian annexation, is now so far complete as to include a scheme for the partition of Macedonia. If Austria has decided to sanction the catastrophe, it will inevitably come. The aggressive behaviour of Montenegro lends colour to the suspicion that Austria is ready. King Nicholas is less decidedly the satellite of Russia and Italy than he was. He has made his terms with Vienna, and on the day when he marches it will probably be as the pioneer of an Austrian advance. A quarrel with Montenegro alone would not be mortal—indeed, it would have its distinct advantages, since it would rally Albanian loyalty. But if it turned out that Montenegro, in picking a quarrel over a trumpety frontier incident, were in collusion with Austria, which, in her turn, is in alliance with Bulgaria, the end would be at hand. The Young Turks knew as well as any European that the real danger to their experiment would come from Bulgaria. That knowledge inspired them only with an insensate and provocative obstinacy. They might have made the Macedonian Bulgars for ever their friends by assuring them a permanent relief from Hamidian horrors. It was hardly even a case of making concessions; they need only have refrained from aggressive injustice. They chose instead to make their little finger thicker than Abdul Hamid's loins. Just before the end they perceived their mistake, and talked of nominating British and French gendarmerie officers as a guarantee for good government. The concession was too late and too small. Nothing short of a full gift of autonomy would now suffice to ensure a permanent peace, and from the standpoint of Turkish military caste a bloody and dramatic exit from Europe at the end of a hardly-fought war would probably seem preferable to a tame surrender. We have written our Apocalyptic catalogue. But at the end of it we recur to the fatalistic impression that Turkey has the habit of survival.—The Nation.

THE MOSLEM UNIVERSITY VOTING PAPER.

[In view of the decisions of the Secretary of State for India regarding the proposed Moslem University, it is absolutely essential that the views of the Moslem Subscribers of the Comrade should be ascertained. You are, therefore, earnestly requested to consider very carefully the decisions stated below, and to strike off the alternative which you do not like. Having done this, kindly cut this paper out, and send it to the Editor of the Comrade, 109 Ripon Street, Calcutta, preferably by registered post. The results of this voting will be published prominently in the Comrade every week. But the names of the voters will, under no circumstances, be disclosed if secrecy is desired.—Ed., Comrade.]

The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler, in his letter to the President of the Moslem University Constitution Committee, says that

"His Majesty's Secretary of State has decided, after mature consideration, that the proposed University should not have powers of affiliation outside the locality in which it may be established," and that it "should in future be styled 'The University of Aligarh,' and not the 'Moslem University.'"

After mature consideration, I am of opinion that : —

The Mussalmans ^{should accept} ~~should NOT accept~~ a University on these conditions.

Do You Want Another Rs. 3 Per Day =====?

Reliable persons will be provided with Constant Home Work on DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS by Hosiery Manufacturers. Experience Unnecessary—Distance Immaterial.

DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS are easy to learn. We show you how to work the machine—to make the Hosiery, which you do at home. We purchase the finished work and pay you handsomely.

UNSOLICITED TESTIMONY.

Read What it Says about our Methods.

DEAR GENTLEMEN,

I am highly pleased to have such a nice little machine. Now it runs as smoothly as can be expected. At present it is not very difficult for me to knit one pair in $1\frac{1}{4}$ hours, thus giving me 6 pairs in 9 hours. I expect to reach as high as to knit a pair an hour not in a very distant future. Your promptness in sending me the Cheque and Yarn really astonishes me. Now I clearly see, that dealing with a respectable firm as yours anyone, not once only but always, can earn Rs. 30 from the outset and Rs. 60 easily when proficiency comes, that is, after a month or so, with a capital of Rs. 160 to earn Rs. 30 to Rs. 60 per month, is not a job to be trifled with. Now I can safely say, working on your principle no one will have any reason to complain. You are at liberty to freely use my name and be assured that if any one calls on me, I will try my best to push on your interest, which is not only yours but ours too. Hoping to remain in the same intimate terms as at present.

I am, Gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

dum reviews the situation in Tibet and suggests that China should station a representative at Lhasa to advise Tibet on questions of foreign policy. This representative might have a bodyguard, but China ought not to station unlimited soldiery in Tibet nor send an expedition. The memorandum further says that China at present ought not to use India as the highway to Tibet.

The Statesman correspondent writes from Kalimpong on August 30th:—The Times' article on Tibet suggesting the reconsideration of British policy in Tibet has aroused keen interest among the Tibetans here. They hope that Britain will now act in accordance with this suggestion. They say that the only hope for permanent peace in Tibet is to appoint a British Resident to Lhasa and that the sooner this is done the better for all concerned. They say that the Tibetans left to themselves would not be able to govern the country properly. On the other hand, if the Chinese are invested with too much power, they say, there will be constant friction which sooner or later would lead to a recrudescence of the recent troubles. Englishmen in touch with Tibetan opinion feel that this matter is urgent. If the present opportunity is not seized upon, they declare, we shall probably never get another quite so favourable.

Reuter wires from Washington on 2nd September.—It is announced that the United States will not oppose Great Britain's demand from China that Britain be consulted with regard to any action contemplated in Tibet.

A message to the Daily Telegraph from Peking on 2nd September states that China has rejected British demands with regard to Tibet stating that she cannot recast formal solemn agreements.

Sir Francis Younghusband in a letter to the Times on the 3rd September says it is inhuman to let the present conditions in Tibet continue. We must tell the Chinese and Tibetans that we recognize China's suzerainty but never Chinese sovereignty. We must also be careful not to lose the good will of the Tibetans, which we gained in the expedition of 1904.

Reuter wires from Peking on September 4th:—The Legation here has not received any reply to the British Memorandum with regard to Tibet. It is understood that China intends replying formally acknowledging the receipt of the memorandum and denying certain statements therein attributed to the President.

Pan-Islamism.

A SPECIAL article published in the Times on 3rd September from "A Correspondent in India", calls attention to what the writer regards as a serious danger, namely, the revival of Pan-Islamism in India and elsewhere, due chiefly to the Turco-Italian war and our subservience to Russian policy in Persia, which has caused the worst possible impression even among the loyal inhabitants of India. The correspondent suggests that the Amir, intoxicated by flattery, may one day stand forth as the Champion of Islam and start a conflagration of incalculable extent.

The Times in a leading article commenting on the above says, it is unable to endorse its correspondent's view with regard to the Amir. In any case, the Pan-Islamic menace is not so formidable as depicted. It desires that Muhammadans in India should have every consideration, but they cannot expect to dictate the whole of British foreign policy.

The Week.

Egypt.

REUTER wires from Cairo on 3rd September:—The Government has suppressed the Nationalist journal El Lewa, and four natives have been arrested in connection with the circulation of seditious posters.

China.

REUTER wires from Paris:—The Journal des Debats states that General Brisant Desmallet has been appointed Military Adviser to the Chinese Government.

Tibet.

THE Times correspondent at Peking telegraphs that the Chinese have not yet replied to the Tibetan Memorandum, but they state that the expedition is engaged on the borders of Szechuan and was never ordered to enter Tibet.

British Memorandum.

REUTER wires from Peking on August 29th:—Sir John Jordan, the British Minister, has sent a memorandum to the Chinese Government in which he refers to China's intention to incorporate the Tibet province.

The memorandum declares that Tibetans ought to be allowed to manage their own internal affairs without Chinese interference, and recommends a new Anglo-Chinese Agreement as precedent to the recognition by Great Britain of the Republic. The memoran-

Afghanistan.

THE Pioneer's frontier correspondent states on 29th August that the Mullah Powindah has proceeded to Kabul. Before leaving he divided all his property among his sons. The meaning of this is not clear unless he means to take up his abode permanently in Afghanistan. In that case considerable changes may be expected in the attitude of the Manenuds whose misconduct on most occasions has been due to the Mullah's instigation.

Nicholson Committee.

THE Pioneer on 30th August says.—The report that the Nicholson Committee will advise the disbanding of 27 Indian regiments and the reduction of the British garrison need not be taken seriously. The Committee has not even completed its examination and its recommendations will not be forthcoming for several weeks, if not months.

Public Service Commission.

IN connection with the Public Service Commission, Mr. M. S. D. Butler, who has been appointed Joint-Secretary, will proceed home shortly to settle preliminaries with Lord Islington and other members of the Commission.

Hindu University Fund.

HIS Highness the Maharaja Holkar has been pleased to order payment on 30th August of Rs. 3 lakhs towards his donation to the Hindu University Fund and of the remainder, two lakhs, two months later, when the new financial year begins.

A deputation consisting of Rai Bahadur Pandit Sukhdeoprasad, C.I.E., and Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya arrived at Kotah on 1st September and waited upon His Highness Maharao Sir Umdisinghji Bahadur, G.C.S.I., on 2nd September when His Highness was pleased to sanction a donation of one lakh of rupees to the Hindu University. The amount was paid on the morning of 3rd September.

Indian High Courts.

REUTER wires from London on 30th August. Sir Henry Prinsep, retired Judge of the Calcutta High Court, in an article in the Nineteenth Century on the High Courts in India, concludes that the improvement in the capacity of the local Bar demands a corresponding improvement in the attainments of District Judges, from which body Judges of High Courts are largely drawn. Sir Henry comments in strong terms upon the delay in finding a solution of the difficulty. He says that if Lord Crewe and his advisers, none of whom has any Indian judicial experience or knowledge, hesitate to deal with the matter, then let a Commission of Enquiry be appointed.

"India is rapidly drifting into a Vakil Raj. We must at least attempt to provide stronger counteracting influences to restore the proper equilibrium in the Courts of Justice."

In the course of his article in the Nineteenth Century, Sir Henry Prinsep evidently refers to the long-talked-of scheme for the better judicial training of Civil Servants. This question was started several years ago and a scheme was drawn up by Sir Harvey Adamson while he was in charge of the Home Office. The scheme, however, did not meet with approval at Home, and ever since it has been under consideration. It is quite probable that the Islington Commission may take up this question.

Railway Allotment.

THE Secretary of State has sanctioned an additional grant of Rs. 1½ crores to the Railway programme during the current year, thus bringing the total railway allotment to Rs. 15 crores for 1912-13. This additional grant, it may be stated, is independent of the wagon shortage question which is still before the India Office.

Free Primary Education.

PRIMARY education has been made free in the Jhind State.

Poona Fergusson College.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR GEORGE CLARKE, on September 5th, opened the N. M. Wadia amphitheatre as part of the Fergusson College. This college, which is managed by the Deccan Education Society, secured a grant of Rs. 25,000 from the trustees of the Wadia charities and decided the name of the building after them. There was a large gathering present to witness the ceremony. Sir George Clarke made a long speech eulogizing the work of the College and combating the idea of colonial self-government as something that involved absolute destruction of all that is most deeply ingrained in the life of the people of India.

Moslem Education Cess Bill.

A HUNDRED Muhammadan Zemindars of Larkana district, Sind, at a meeting on 27th August declared themselves in favour of the Hon. Mr. Bhurgri's Education Cess Bill and urged that the Bill be speedily passed.

Moslem Educational Conference.

IT HAS been decided to hold the annual All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference at Lucknow in Christmas week, when Mr. Amir Ali is expected to be present.

Indian Pan-Islamism.

(FROM THE "STATESMAN.")

FROM time to time writers given to hasty generalisations upon rumours and misunderstood facts have announced to the world that Islam was about to unite its forces in a holy war. The failure of their predictions seems to have no discouraging effect upon these alarmists, and one is not altogether surprised to find that one of them has seized the present opportunity to discover a revival of Pan-Islamism in India, and to proclaim his apprehensions in the Times. There can be no doubt that Indian Muhammadans have lately undergone much annoyance and irritation. Sir Edward Grey's extraordinary deference to the machinations of the Russian Government in Persia has moved their indignation. There is probably no Muhammadan who does not believe that Mr. Shuster was dismissed, with the concurrence of England, solely because he was an honest and capable man who was beginning to create order amidst chaos. The pretence that he was got rid of on account of his over-weening preference for British officials impressed no one. The charge was not true and cannot have been seriously made by a Power which is on terms of friendship with Great Britain. Muhammadans may be excused for treating the official version with scepticism and preferring their own theory that Mr. Shuster's real offence lay in the evidence which he gave of a sincere desire to maintain Persian independence. In these circumstances his dismissal may well have occasioned some bitterness among the thousands of Muhammadans in India who feel a lively sympathy with Persia in her difficulties. The unprincipled attack of Italy upon Tripoli could not fail to increase their exasperation. If ever there were circumstances in which Turkey might hope to appeal with success for the intervention of the Powers, the justice of Europe might surely have been invoked to defeat a wanton and unprovoked act of filibustering. But the Powers declined to interfere, and the assent of England to the conspiracy of inaction was scarcely calculated to appease Muhammadan sentiment in India or elsewhere. The revocation of the "settled fact" of the Partition of Bengal has since been followed by a bitter disappointment over the conditions under which a Muhammadan University may be founded at Aligarh. One can readily perceive that out of these materials a writer obsessed by the Pan-Islamic myth could evolve a very plausible account of the growing solidarity of the Muhammadan community and of the development of a sharply defined Muhammadan public opinion, based on the wrongs which Islam has suffered. But the implied suggestion that this quickened sense of Muhammadan unity could ever lead to seditious action would be absurd even if it were not accompanied by the wild flight of the imagination which has led the Times writer to foresee the day when the Amir, intoxicated by flattery, will stand forth as the champion of Islam and presumably rally the Muhammadans of India around his flag. That the Amir is held in honour in this country as a great Muhammadan potentate is true. But it requires a singular combination of fancy and ignorance to conceive of a bizarre movement in which the educated scions of Aligarh and the peaceful Muhammadan cultivators of India will stand shoulder to shoulder with the Amir's wild and unruly warriors. It is not strange that the Times should reject this grotesque chimera, which is an insult not only to the loyalty but to the intelligence of the Muhammadan subjects of the King-Emperor.

Verse.

Ad Inertiam.

Nymph of the placid brow and eyes serene !
Sister of soft-eyed Peace and mild Content !
That love'st to dwell at ease, 'mid song and scent,
In blossomed groves or shady coverts green ;
That in cool streams, bright popped banks between,
Dost lave thy languid limbs 'neath branches bent
To intertwine for thee a leafy tent
Safe from man's gaze and Phoebus' arrows keen,
I fly to thee ! O wrap me in thine arms,
And lull my head upon thy gentle breast,
That, tangled in the mazes of thy charms,
My soul may lose its fever and unrest,
And be unmoved 'midst all the dread alarms
Of earthly life which haggard cares molest.

NIZAMAT JUNG.

TETE À TETE

THIS week we again publish the voting paper about the acceptance or non acceptance of the Muslim University on the Government's terms. Hitherto less than 300 votes have been received out of some 2,600 Muhammadan subscribers, and we cannot compliment our Muhammadan readers on the energy they have shown in expressing their views on so important a subject.

The Moslem University Voting Papers.

We are deeply attached to our readers for the constant support which they have given to us, but on more than one occasion we have had to complain of their actually doing several weeks later what they had all along intended to do. Life is too short for such dilatoriness, and in this matter the community must place sufficient data before the Muslim University Foundation Committee at an early date so that it may arrive at a decision truly representing the voice of the community. Our readers are by no means the least responsible or the least capable section of the Muslim community, and if they do not express their views soon enough, it would generally be understood that the question does not interest them, which, of course, would be entirely opposed to well-established facts. Unless our Muhammadan readers wish such a conclusion to be drawn from their delay in sending to us their voting papers, they should arrange to vote within this week. We are not quite sure whether we shall publish the voting paper in our next week's issue also, and there is all the more reason why all votes should be registered within the next week. We have received six votes for the acceptance of the University on the Government's terms to which conditions have been attached. Three voters desire that the University should be accepted on these terms for the present and then the Mussalmans should agitate to secure what is now refused. Another would accept it without the powers of affiliation on condition that Government would permit it to be named the Muslim University of Aligarh. A fifth would accept it if schools can be recognised by the University and if the powers proposed to be vested in the Chancellor are not to be exercised by the Governor-General in Council. A sixth voter would accept the University if it is to be called the Muslim University and the Viceroy would be the Chancellor. All these are included among those who would accept the University on the Government's terms although their acceptance is conditional. There is one voter, however, who would not accept the University on the Government's terms, but adds that the Mussalmans may temporarily and conditionally accept the University if the Government promises to permit it to affiliate outside institutions "in the near future, say, 10 years at the latest." The voting up to date has been as follows:—

For the acceptance of the University on the Government's terms ... 20
Against the acceptance of the University on the Government's terms ... 271

Total ... 291

WE PUBLISHED in the last issue of the Comrade a letter from Mr. Abbas Ali Baig, Member of the India Council, in which he explained his attitude towards the general question of reform in Muslim society. Such explanation was deemed necessary by our correspondent inasmuch as the reported versions of his speech on the subject, which he had delivered at the annual meeting of the National Indian Association, had given rise to much misunderstanding and hostile criticism in the Muslim vernacular press of this country. The two main points dealt with in that speech were the questions of purdah (or seclusion of women) and polygamy. Mr. Abbas Ali Baig had expressed his views with considerable emphasis on both these questions. He had told his audience that the seclusion of women was not sanctioned by the Koran. According to him, this "pernicious custom" had its origin in mistrust and was devoid of any authority. "The purdah system, with its concomitant and consequential evils of lethargy and disease, is acting like a heavy drag-chain upon the efforts of the Muslim races to rise to the level of those more fortunate nations who have not hampered themselves with any such handicap." The whole trend of his argument pointed to Western practice and usage as the standard that should be applied to measure the status of women in Muslim society. His remarks on polygamy were even more trenchant and he urged the Mussalmans to suppress the practice by means of legislation. We have no doubt that the views of Mr. Abbas Ali Baig are the fruits of genuine conviction, and it would be absurd to read into them any other motive than his earnest desire to bring about the social regeneration of his people. There cannot, at the same time, be any doubt as to the drastic character of the reforms he advocates. It is, however, his method of solution rather than his ultimate aim that seems to have alarmed his critics in the vernacular press. Enlightened Muslim opinion in this country would not oppose any measures that would lead to reform on the lines of least resistance. Efforts would be welcomed everywhere that would bring about the necessary change of conditions in the lives of the Muslim women and afford them freer and better opportunities for physical and intellectual development. All this, however, requires the creation of a new environment. The growth of education, of moral earnestness, of new social ideals and new criteria of social relations amongst men as well as women must precede all drastic changes in the direction of female emancipation. The question of purdah is as much an economic as a moral issue and cannot be considered apart from the existing conditions of Muslim society. Before undertaking far-reaching social reconstruction the woman must be economically enfranchised. She must be fitted by suitable education and training to accept freedom as a natural and necessary condition of her being and not as a luxury to be abused. Without this "emancipation" would be a mischievous sham even though the entire population of the harems were, in obedience to the fiat of a social reformer, disgorged into public thoroughfares. The question of polygamy stands on an entirely different plane. Islam allows its followers the liberty of marrying more than one wife up to the limit of four under certain very stringent conditions. If those conditions are observed as strictly as they are enjoined, polygamy would cease to be a serious social question for the Mussalmans. The liberty allowed by religion contemplates possibilities that would blast the happiness of many lives if the law did not provide for them in exceptional cases. That the liberty has been often abused does not by any means prove that there no longer exists any need for its proper use in the world. To legislate it out of existence would be to punish the innocent with the guilty and to assume the functions of Providence in a matter that Islam has left to the sense of moral responsibility and the conscience of its followers. Whatever its outward form and cloak, polygamy is practised throughout the world, and as long as the fundamental human needs and the proportion of the sexes remain as they are, it would continue to be practised, in spite of the very righteous indignation of social reformers and moralists.

WE ARE glad to note that both the Muslim League and the Muslim

The Muslim League and the Muslim Educational Conference.

Educational Conference have been invited to hold their next annual sessions at Lucknow. The meetings of both these bodies will be of more than ordinary interest, and we are sure they will be largely attended and lead to fruitful results. The Muslim public cannot but admire the enterprise and public-spiritedness of the Muslim leaders of Lucknow who have decided to bear the trouble and expense that the two most important annual gatherings of the community would naturally entail. Those who know how lavishly the members of the Constitution Committee were entertained by the Hon. the Raja Saheb of Mahmudabad on each occasion when they met at Lucknow may be perfectly certain of the warm reception and hospitality that await the visitors to the capital of Oudh during the next Xmas week, when the League and the Conference will hold their annual sessions. Every Muslim who takes interest in public affairs must have felt gratified at the zeal and energy with which the Hon. the Raja Saheb has been taking part in the public life of the community. We hope his example will influence at least some members of the Moslum aristocracy, who enjoy great leisure and position, to take active interest in public affairs and serve their community and their country. There is, no doubt, much truth in the assertion that the landed aristocracy of India is very conservative as a class and appears very little disposed to move with the times. It must, however, be remembered that the Indian landlord stands in a peculiar relation to the Land Revenue authorities of a district. If an over-zealous official happens to dislike his public activities, he can exercise an irresistible pressure on the offending landlord and speedily cure him of his unorthodox "views and opinions." Only a man of extraordinarily powerful moral fibre can be insensible to the terrors of an official frown that may mean the loss of lakhs and no end of worry. This type is unfortunately not yet common in any class of Indian society. It must, therefore, be a matter of thankfulness that a few individuals amongst the upper classes are beginning to think for themselves and exercise their due influence on public affairs. Oudh Mussalmans are fortunate in having two such patriotic aristocrats as the Raja Sahebs of Mahmudabad and Jehangirabad, not to mention others.

The Tail and the Dog. THE arrest of Shaikh Shawish, the Egyptian Nationalist who had settled in Constantinople a short time ago and had begun his career as Editor of Al-Hilal, would cause considerable surprise to those who still take an old-fashioned view of international relations.

A political refugee has always enjoyed protection in foreign lands and, according to the practice of civilised countries like England and France, has never been arrested and sent back to his own country for trial. Egypt is a part of the Ottoman Empire and we do not exactly know the laws that are mutually observed in such cases. If Shaikh Shawish has been arrested because he is charged with having issued seditious circulars against the Egyptian Government, and has thus been indirectly guilty of misdemeanour against the Suzerain power, the argument would sound plausible to people with conveniently short memories. Those, however, who have not yet forgotten the declaration of Egyptian neutrality just when the Suzerain was attacked by Italy can scarcely be asked to believe that the Egyptian Government is actuated by a very active sense of loyalty to the Empire. It is ready to act independently or claim all the privileges of belonging to the Ottoman Empire just as it suits certain interests. Here we have another instance of the tail wagging the dog. According to the latest news, many more arrests are to be made in Constantinople, and the Tanin has been suspended because it criticised the action of the Government. This affords rather a sad commentary on the ostentatious love of liberty with which the present Turkish Government entered on its career.

Medical Aid for Indian Women. OPINION cannot be divided over the question of the need for the immediate extension of the medical education of Indian women. No nobler effort can be made for the uplifting of our zenana population than the gradual diffusion among them of medical knowledge and domestic hygiene. We are gratified, therefore, to find that like so many of her predecessors, Lady Hardinge has decided to devote her energies to the solution of this problem. The scheme she has recently formulated for the establishment of a medical college and hospital for Indian women and a school for the training of Indian women as nurses and midwives should be welcomed with gratitude throughout the country. The question of medical relief for women in India is beset with many peculiar difficulties which are the natural concomitants of the present constitution of Indian society. The stolid conservatism of the Indian ladies and their ignorance of even the rudiments of domestic hygiene results in that highly insanitary condition of Indian homes which has been largely responsible for the high percentage of deaths among Indian children and mothers, and the generally poor physique of Indian people. While these circumstances rendered it all the more imperative that medical aid should be easily accessible to our ladies, the systems of pardah, of caste distinction and social restrictions have strongly militated against an adequate provision of that medical relief which they needed so sorely. The rigid system of seclusion made it impossible for the higher and middle class ladies to call in male doctors or take full advantage of the medical facilities afforded by the numerous excellent hospitals which the Government has established in most big towns. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, that medical relief should be offered through the agency of efficient Indian lady doctors who are fully conversant with the peculiar needs and conditions of the Indian harems and whom our pardahnashins are prepared to trust. The system of medical training which has hitherto prevailed in India has clearly failed to turn out lady doctors fulfilling the requisite conditions. True, Lady Dufferin's Fund did much to help forward the cause of female medical education. But as no arrangements were made for the establishment of separate medical colleges and training schools for women, the only class of Indian women who could take advantage of the commendable efforts of successive Viceroines for the extension of female medical training in India, was the small class of women that did not observe the pardah. Besides, most of these female students came from very poor homes and had neither the capacity nor the inclination to prosecute their medical studies beyond that elementary knowledge of midwifery and medicine which qualifies them for practising as nurses or midwives, or secures them the posts of assistants in female sections of the hospitals, so that in all the more important cases of medical or surgical aid they have been solely dependent on the co-operation of male doctors and surgeons. But many Indian ladies would almost suffer any tortures than call in the aid of male doctors. The scheme which Lady Hardinge has formulated should do away with many of these difficulties. The separate female medical training schools will throw open the facilities for medical training to all such ladies of respectable families as are prepared to dedicate their lives to the nursing of their sisters, and the separate medical college and hospital for ladies will be a great incentive to educated ladies of even the highest families to prosecute their studies to the higher stages of medical education and thus be in a position to help their sisters even in those cases where the highly unwelcome presence of male doctors is now indispensable. And surely a nobler vocation cannot be conceived of for the future daughters of "New India" than that of ministering to the medical relief of suffering humanity. India owes a debt of gratitude to Lady Hardinge which can be repaid in some measure by Indians contributing liberally to the Fund for the creation of these long deferred, much needed and most welcome facilities.

The Indian Judiciary. RECENT events have brought the question of reform in the Indian judicial system a good deal to the fore. Commenting on the Mymensingh Case only the other day the Times edited the world with its dogmatic protest against the desirability of continuing even the present imperfect separation of the Judicial and Executive functions in India. The unfortunate Midnapur Case has now raised a perfect storm of contradictory statements in which the British Press and the Anglo-Indian and Nationalist Presses in India are all taking part in a most lively fashion. Our "leading" contemporary of London has given a fresh exhibition of its naivette in dealing with Indian affairs by announcing that the whole difficulty of Judicial Administration in India arose out of the combination of two causes, viz., the political predilections of the Bench and the "gross latitude" allowed to the Bar. This evidently encouraged an Anglo-Indian contemporary notorious for its bureaucratic proclivities to openly suggest the dismissal of certain Judges whose decisions had been set aside by the Appellate Court. The National Press, on the other hand, is hysterical in its praises of the Indian members of the Bar. This confused hubbub, while it could naturally lead to no satisfactory solution of the problem, has served to emphasize the fact that something was fundamentally wrong with the system of Judicial Administration as it prevails in India. The first step towards cure is the right diagnosis of the disease. We are gratified, therefore, to find that attempt is at last being made in certain quarters to investigate the problem of the Indian Judiciary in a calm and unimpassioned manner. Sir Henry Prinsep, who has certainly a right to speak on the subject, has very recently contributed to the Nineteenth Century "a very suggestive article in which he accounts for the defective judicial system by the great inadequacy of the judicial training of the District Judges and of the Civilian Judges of the Indian High Courts." While we cannot agree with Sir Henry in his fears of a "Vakil Raj," we certainly think that the admittedly great improvement in the capacity of the local Bars and the ignorance of "His Honour" of "the tremendous complications and the innumerable technicalities of the English, Hindu and Muhammadan laws" are in a great measure responsible for the constant friction between the Bench and Bar in India. In November last in commenting on the "judicial presumption" of certain Courts, we had taken occasion to draw the attention of the Government to the great undesirability of appointing I.C.S. men with no training in judicial manners or judicial habits and but a bowing acquaintance with Law, to preside over Sessions and even Civil Courts, and deliver judgments on knotty points of law before a Bar which is famous alike for its subtlety and its masterful grasp of legal technique. Under the circumstances it was but natural that friction should arise, and we can hardly find it in our heart to blame the members of the ruling race resenting the superior powers of the Indian lawyers practising under them and protesting against "the license which it has been frequently decided is permissible to Counsel." The question is becoming daily more and more acute as the Indian lawyer becomes subtler, abler and more resourceful, and it is high time the Government saw its way to intervene. And if the Government is at all desirous of maintaining the high and pure traditions of British Justice it should act up to the repeated advice of the Press and the public and of several retired High Court Judges, and making it compulsory for all Civilian who are meant to join the judicial line to undergo a systematic judicial training for a considerable period, reserve all judicial posts in the District and the High Courts exclusively for these trained officials. We are perfectly aware that this will result in a partial separation of the Judiciary and Executive or at least, a more definite line of demarcation between the two main branches of the I.C.S. Doubtless, therefore, any such measure would be strongly opposed by the members of the Civilian Service. But we trust the Government will realize the extreme gravity of the situation. The Government owes it quite as much to its own prestige as to the best interests of the ruled no longer to be led away by a false sense of delicacy for the feelings of an over-pampered officialdom. As for the separation of the Judiciary and the Executive, we have a notion that Sir Harvey Adamson, as Home Member, announced a tentative scheme some time ago. But it was so long ago that we have forgotten whether there was such a scheme—or even such a Home Member!

WE ARE gratified at the reference made by the Times of India to our remarks on the subject of the desecration of the Delhi Jami Musjid by the visitors. Our contemporary fully endorses our view of the urgency of the need for passing a special regulation forbidding the visitors to stroll within the sacred precincts of the mosque without pulling off their boots or putting on boot coverings. It also agrees with us in not considering it an adequate explanation "that at the time of the restoration of the mosque to the Muhammadans the Government did not allow the managing body to compel European visitors to follow the custom observed elsewhere," and regrets the action of the Government in "still refusing to pass the special regulation asked for by the Managing Committee." "If it is the case," says our Bombay contemporary, "that the Moslem public feel very strongly on the subject, and it is natural that they should do so, here is a matter which the new Delhi administration can put right with very little trouble." We thank our contemporary for espousing the cause of the Moslems in a matter calling for immediate redress, and trust that the new Delhi administration will "see its way to do more than forbid the wearing of boots within the roofed portion of the mosque," and will protect from desecration the other portions of the mosque which are just as sacred in the eyes of the Mussalmans. We are confident that a Viceroy with such urbanity of manner and social sensibility as Lord Hardinge would not allow the present state of affairs to continue.

WE HAVE received, by the last mail, two letters sent to us from Derna by Maulvi M. Abu Saeed Arabi, a native of Rangoon, whose zeal has carried him to the theatre of war. He crossed the Egyptian frontier without much difficulty and was escorted to Derna by an Arab guide. He was most cordially received by Enver Bey, and his tent was pitched close to the tent of the distinguished commander and organiser of the Ottoman forces in Cyrenaica. It appears that he is not the only Indian in the camp of the Mujahideen, but many other Afghans and Indians are already there fighting by the side of their Arab brethren. "We are encamped," says our correspondent, "on a green mountain which, some time ago, was occupied by the Italians. But, after a bloody battle, the enemy was most successfully routed by Enver Bey and the Moslem Camp was transferred there." The correspondent saw with his own eyes three big guns which the Italians had left behind which are now being used by the Arab forces. Ever since Enver Bey appeared upon the scene and organised a disciplined force out of the wild fighting material for resisting the enemy, the Italians have been, like an army besieged, pinned behind defensive fortifications and seldom venturing out to fight. The Arabs regard them with unspeakable contempt. Never was an enemy so openly despised and sneered at. The Arab women have made Italian cowardice a byword, and an Arab child finds it difficult to think of the existing conditions of stalemate as a serious warfare. Our correspondent states that small parties of Arabs dash into the Italian lines under cover of darkness, inflict considerable damage and return with rifles and other booty to the camp. A number of volunteers once happened on a similar excursion to get into an Italian kitchen and carried off everything they could find there "except the walls." Again, an Arab soldier encountered an Italian sentinel, lifted him up, slung him across his shoulders and set out for his camp. The Italian remained for a few moments tongue-tied with terror; presently, however, this Arab's companion burst out into song and a volley was fired at the Arabs one of whom received a bullet in his shoulder. Instantly the Arab put down his burden, just found time to blow out the brains of the Italian; and then quietly walked back to his camp. As to the general state of the country, our correspondent assures us that the people are in a flourishing condition, and the trade of Tripoli with the outside world continues through Egypt and Tunis. Derna is connected with Benghazi, Salloum, Homs and Tripoli by telephone. The correspondent gives details of the daily life of Enver Bey, and speaks in terms of unbounded admiration of his energy, his enthusiasm, his unfaltering determination to defend the land, his personal charm and innate courtesy, his intense love of Islam, and the confidence and devotion that he has inspired amongst the Arabs. Much of his time is now spent in attending to administrative matters concerning the province of Cyrenaica. He has established order throughout the hinterland, organised the administration of justice, introduced new methods of collecting revenue and opened schools for the instruction and military training of Arab children. He has infused an entirely new life amongst the Arabs and become the idol of the people.

The Comrade.

"The Strangling of Persia.*"

THE last mail has brought us from the publishers Mr. Morgan Shuster's book,—a record of his remarkable experiences as Treasurer-General of Persia,—the publication of which had been announced some weeks ago. The announcement had created lively curiosity, as it was generally felt that the late Treasurer-General was the one man who was admirably fitted both by character and knowledge to lay bare the ghastly story of diplomatic and personal intrigue which culminated in his dismissal and the destruction of Persia's liberties. During his eight months' stay in Teheran, from the moment he took over the administration of Persian finance to the time when he left at the bidding of Russia amid the dumb sorrow and despair of the stricken people, the political stage was crowded with incident. The most intense moments in the drama of a nation's struggle for liberty were packed into this short interval; and he saw with his own eyes how the various threads of foreign intrigue and coercion, of domestic treachery and greed, of passionate hope and grinding ambition were weaving out episode after episode till the tragic dénouement was reached. An American gentleman of upright character and generous instincts, trained in an atmosphere of personal freedom and democracy, had gone to administer the financial affairs of an ancient Oriental kingdom which had just shaken off a fearful and soul-destroying despotism. The absolute personal rule had been destroyed, but the State was yet in the grip of the tentacles that the absolutism of centuries had left behind. The administration was in the hands of a hierarchy of old grandees whose sole conception of the Constitutional Government was that it offered every one of them an opportunity to become a "Shah." Foreign intrigues were thickening fast and the designs of the Muscovite to reduce the North of Persia to a political vassalage were daily becoming more aggressive and bold. Finances were in ruin; the crude administrative machinery was falling to pieces; the State organism was developing signs of complete disintegration and collapse. The one ray of hope in this dark and dismal atmosphere came from the Mejliss or the national elected body which represented the hope, the earnestness, the patriotism and the devotion of the people. If Persia could ever hope to rise united, free and strong from the crisis, the impulse towards her regeneration would come from the Mejliss. This body was at once her hope, her promise, the only symbol of her national life, the last rock of her salvation.

Such was the situation when Mr. Shuster appeared on the scene. A man of weaker grit and resolution would have completely lost his bearings. The American Treasurer-General was, however, a man of unbounded resource and remarkable strength of character. He entered on his almost superhuman task with a single eye to do all what lay in his power to evolve order out of the financial chaos. What he achieved and what he experienced—the obstacles he encountered and the grim and implacable forces of opposition that speedily gathered against him while he strove manfully at his task,—he has told with consummate ability, candour and directness in a narrative of surpassing fascination and interest. "The Strangling of Persia" is the tragic story of a nation in agony, of might pitched against right, of brute force trampling justice under foot, of sham diplomacy masquerading as law and plighted word, of how the pathetic wail of a down-trodden people for freedom and light passed unheard in the din of the diplomatic forces battling in Europe. It grips the imagination. It invades the feelings. It takes the reader breathlessly along from one chapter of scandal and intrigue to another till a coup d'état ends the Mejliss, the curtain is rung down on a prostrate nation and the voice of liberty is hushed under the heels of the Cossacks. In style and construction, Mr. Shuster's book is a narrative of immense vividness, simplicity and power. His descriptions of some of the dramatic episodes are thrilling and leave a deep impression on the mind. In moments of indignation the language never loses its dignity and restraint: the facts are told with marvellous cogency and they are left to speak for themselves. The interest is sustained throughout and the tale of intrigue and scandal never begins to pall. There is a judicious play of light and shade, and the many human touches relieve the gloom of political warfare, diplomatic tangle and of the hopeless chaos of affairs. In his Foreword, Mr. Shuster says: "In the belief that the real interests of humanity and betterment of international relations demand that the truth be told in cases of this kind, I have written down the facts with a bluntness, which, perhaps under other circumstances, would be subject to criticism." No one after reading his book can deny that he has "told the truth." His disinterested effort in the cause of right and justice will be gratefully remembered as long as Persia's fate will continue to move the pity and indignation of men.

* The Strangling of Persia, by W. Morgan Shuster, ex-Treasurer-General of Persia. Publishers, T. Fisher Unwin, London. 12s. 6d. net.

What that fate has been it is impossible to describe in full detail within the compass of this article. Only a brief summary of the story, as told by Mr. Shuster, can be attempted here. The Persian Nationalists had been brilliantly successful in deposing Mohammad Ali and sending him into exile. But the prospects of evolving a stable and orderly government from the complicated situation were far from encouraging. Such a Government must both command the respect and support of the majority of the Persians, and remove all reasonable pretext for a further intervention in their internal affairs by the so-called friendly Powers claiming to have special interests. The general administration of the country and especially the conduct of its finances had so absolutely broken down that Persia had credit neither abroad nor at home; and the utmost courage and patriotism were necessary on the part of her intelligent classes if she was to emerge from the administrative chaos and ruin. The internal difficulties were themselves formidable, but to these were added the open hostility of Russia and the scarcely less injurious timidity of England so far as thwarting Russia's evident designs upon the success of the constitutional Government were concerned. The greatest need of Persia at the time was money and honest, capable and trained officials to look after financial affairs. An effort was made to raise a loan in England on the security of the Crown jewels; but Russia intervened and the British Government vetoed the arrangement. After the famous Postdam meeting between the Tsar and the Kaiser, Russia adopted a harsh and drastic attitude towards the Persian nation without fear of interference or adequate remonstrance by her partner to the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907, on which all actions of Britain and Russia toward the Persian people were supposed to be based.

Towards the end of 1910, the Mejliss decided to secure financial administrators from the United States for the re-organisation of the "archaic and chaotic Treasury of Persia." An early attempt was made by Russian emissaries to employ certain persuasive and notorious members of the Mejliss to defeat the project. But the attempt failed. The American State Department was approached next, but the Department replied that it knew nothing of the affair and that the question would be dealt with when it arose. When, later on, the Persian Government requested the American Government to lend its assistance in securing the services of five American financial experts, the objections of Russia were waived aside both by herself and by England, and Mr. Shuster and his colleagues went to Persia "in good faith, and in the natural belief that the two Powers having (to use their own language) 'special interests' there offered no objection to the fair and honest accomplishment of our task." Immediately after reaching Teheran, Mr. Shuster set about his work in right earnest. The finances were in hopeless chaos. As he puts it: "I might say that they were tangled—very tangled—had there been any to tangle. There were no Persian finances in any ordinary sense of the word. The so-called Ministry of Finance, presided over by a succession of frequently changing Persian gentlemen, whose sole claims to financial genius lay in their having run through their own money and thus become in need of pecuniary recuperation, was in reality an unorganised collection of under-officials who had charge of various bureaux or offices through which the internal taxes, called, generically, malial, were supposed to be collected for the benefit of the Persian Government." There were no organised civil services or tests for fitness. None of the finance officials had ever known a thing called "the budget." Mr. Shuster first of all drew up a basic financial law which was adopted by the Mejliss. This law conferred on the Treasurer-General full powers of collection and disbursement of the revenues of the Empire. And when he asked the Finance Minister to turn over to him the bank balances and cash belonging to the public Treasury, the latter smiled and said to him in the most friendly manner:—"Monsieur Shuster, I am ready at once to transfer these important matters to you. Our current account is kept with the Imperial Bank of Persia. I believe that at present it consists of a deficit or overdraft of 440,000 tumans (about $400,000). Here is an order upon the bank instructing them to place the accounts to the credit of the new Treasurer-General." Mr. Shuster thanked his Excellency, and on that same day, i.e., 13th June 1911, he commenced his duties as "Treasurer-General of the Persian Empire." The Persian foreign debt consisted of several loans which the different Shahs had contracted with Russia. There was also the Indian Government loan, and, lastly, there was the so-called Imperial Bank loan of 1911. In addition to this there was a large and unknown amount of foreign claims against the Persian Government aggregating several millions of dollars. This was the general financial situation when Mr. Shuster assumed charge of the financial affairs of the country.

There were many obstacles to overcome before the gigantic task could be successfully accomplished. There were, first, the reactionary Persian officials, comprising men of great wealth, power and influence, many of whom had received European education and training. They had reached the conclusion that it was far safer to become the protégés of the Russian Government than to side with their own people struggling heroically against heavy odds. Then there was the silent and veiled hostility of the Russian agents who employed every means, however unworthy or base, to wreck all schemes of financial organisation. Then again, there was a continuous round of gossip, scandal and small talk with which the American finance administrators were laughed and jeered at by the European colony at Teheran. Mr. Shuster gives a graphic picture of the life of that colony:—

Imagine, if you will, a fast decaying Government amid whose tottering ruins a heterogeneous collection of Belgian Custom officers, Italian gendarmes, German artillery sergeants, French savants, doctors, professors, and councillors of State, Austrian military instructors, English bank clerks, Turkish and Armenian courtiers, and last, but not least, a goodly sprinkling of Russian Cossack officers, tutors, and drill instructors, all go through their daily task of giving the Imperial Persian Government a strong shove toward bankruptcy, with a sly side push in the direction of their own particular political or personal interests. In this pleasant diversion the gentlemen and even the ladies of the Foreign Legations were somewhat peacefully engaged, when several unfortunate Americans landed on Persian soil with the truly extraordinary idea that they were to be employed under the orders of the Persian Government.

The Persian Ministers and Cabinet officials were neither equipped by experience and training, nor suited by character and temperament to undertake the task of stamping out the corruption and venality that marked the administration of Persian finances. Only honest foreign finance administrators with independent initiative could hope to do it. The financial law of 13th June, 1911, conferred on Mr. Shuster full powers to administer financial affairs. His purpose was to establish a central organisation, having charge of the collection and disbursement of all the revenue and exercising full control over payments on behalf of the Central Government. He endeavoured at the same time, to organise a Treasury gendarmerie for the purpose of assisting the civil officials in the collection of taxes. "Despite the handicaps under which those charged with the new law laboured, and despite the abnormal conditions of war and disorder into which Persia was plunged but a few weeks after this law was passed, during the eight months of our work in Teheran a large proportion of the taxes stated to be due were collected both at the capital and throughout the provinces, the extraordinary expenses incident to the attempt of Mohamed Ali Mirza to regain the throne were promptly met, the salaries of the diplomatic representatives of Persia abroad were sent them for the first time in several years, all foreign obligations and the current salaries of the different Ministries were promptly paid, and a complete and accurate record of every receipt and expenditure was kept in the central office of the Treasurer-General." This was a splendid achievement, and if only the work could have been continued on the lines laid down by Mr. Shuster, the aspect of Persian affairs would have been quite different to-day. But it was exactly this kind of work that was not desired by Russia, by the corrupt Persian officials and by the powerful reactionary grandees. Opposition from these quarters assumed an organised shape, dangerous intrigues were set on foot and diplomacy and threats combined together to drive Mr. Shuster out of office and sweep the fabric of financial administration, that he was building up with patient toil and devotion, out of existence.

How the task of Mr. Shuster was rendered impossible may be told in a few words. The Russian Legation openly declared war upon the new financial law the very day it was passed and the Russian Minister announced that the Belgian Customs employees should not be subjected to the control or supervision of the American Treasurer-General. Even the French, German, Italian and Austro-Hungarian Legations rained protests upon the Persian Foreign Office. The British, Dutch and American Legations and the Turkish Embassy kept clear. The German Minister protested against "the infringement of German interests." It would be worth noting that these "interests" consisted of two subsidies of 6,000 tumans paid annually to two German subjects who were in charge of the so-called German School and German Hospital "which had been established in Teheran on the subsidy demanded and obtained by one of the richest and most powerful nations of Europe from the impoverished Persian Government." M. Mornard, who has been the Treasurer-General of Persia since the departure of Mr. Shuster, was at that time employed as head of the Customs. He has been a pliant tool of Russia all his life and his record of service is not free from shady transactions. When Mr. Shuster wanted to bring the Persian Customs administration under his control, M. Mornard, at first showed a spirit of defiance and openly flouted the authority of the Mejliss. When, however, it dawned on him that Mr. Shuster would not stick at half measures and that he had, in fact, asked for M. Mornard's dismissal, the wily Belgian came round to apologise and faithfully promised to observe the law.

Russia had by this time grown thoroughly alarmed at the honest, straightforward and business-like manner in which Mr. Shuster had set about to organise the finances of Persia. The Muscovite speedily made up his mind to get rid of the man who was building up the one straight and sure road to Persia's strength and independence. The opportunity was not long in coming. Mr. Shuster had, as we have already said, evolved a plan of creating an efficient gendarmerie for the Treasury. He met Major Stokes, Military Attaché of the British Legation, and after a number of talks with him he became convinced "that he (Major Stokes) was an ideal man to undertake the work of organising and of instructing, along technical lines, the officers and men who should compose this force, and finding that he was loath to leave Persia, in whose future prospects and regeneration he was sincerely interested, I made the proposal to him, informally, that he should accept the post of chief of this future gendarmerie organisation, under my own direct supervision and orders." Sir George Barclay, the British Minister, practically agreed and so did Sir Edward Grey whose only observation about the matter was "that Major Stokes, before accepting the command of the gendarmerie, will have to resign his commission in the Indian Army." After two weeks during which the matter had been regarded as practically settled, the British Government suddenly presented a note verbale to the Persian Foreign Office "warning the Persian Government that it ought not to persist in the appointment of Major Stokes unless he is not to be employed in Northern Persia." This remarkable communication went on to say that "if the Persian Government does persist, his Majesty's (British) Government will recognise Russia's right (sic) to take such steps as she thinks are necessary in order that her interests in Northern Persia may be safeguarded." This was the first occasion that Russia and England combined to intimidate the Persian Government in the exercise of its most elementary sovereign rights.

It was exactly at this juncture and when the European situation, on account of the Moroccan question, had rendered the diplomacy of Sir Edward Grey subservient to the Russian will, that Mohamed Ali was let loose on the country. This was, as Mr. Shuster says, literally a bolt from the blue. The reactionaries openly rejoiced, the Ministry was quite incompetent to cope with the situation and some of its members were even suspected of treachery to the Constitutional Government. The Persian army was as mythical an entity as the "the gnomes who had disturbed the sleep of the Rip Van Winkle and as elusive as the Golden Fleece." Every pie that the Treasury could scrape together was needed for administrative reforms. The woes of Persia weighed on the minds of her patriotic sons who keenly felt the selfishness and treachery of their own men and the cynical cruelty and injustice on the part of their unscrupulous neighbour. And yet, they made heroic efforts to save their country. The civil strife was due to the connivance of Russia, and her officials interfered in hostile spirit on numerous occasions in the defensive measures that the Constitutional Government was led to adopt. In spite of all this, however, the Shah's forces were defeated and his general killed. But Salar-ud-Daula still hung about the Turkish frontier. The Council of Ministers decided to confiscate his estates and those of other rebels and an order was accordingly issued and the Treasurer-General was charged to execute the same. The British and Russian Legations were notified of the contemplated measures as a mere matter of courtesy with the information that if any foreign interests should be found to exist in connection with the estates of Salar-ud-Daula and others, all rights of foreigners would be fully safeguarded. Neither Legation offered the slightest objection. But when the Treasury gendarmes were sent to take possession of the Shua-us-Sultana property, two Russian officers with a number of Cossacks came upon the scene, threatened the Persian Treasury Gendarmes and summarily asked them to go. Mr. Shuster protested against this to the Russian Minister and next day sent a large body of men to take possession of the various properties. Russian Cossacks and officers tried to interfere again. Here was a plain case of interference requiring thorough investigation and punishment of the Russian officials who were responsible for it, but the Russian Government upheld the conduct of its agents and disregarded Persian protests.

The Russian attitude in Stokes affair, the interference of Russian officials in the Shua-us-Sultana affair and the opposition of the Russian Government to the proposed loan of £4,000,000 which Persia had every chance of securing on satisfactory terms in England convinced Mr. Shuster and the Mejliss that "Russia had determined to take full advantage of the still disturbed European situation and the only too apparent weakness of the British Foreign Office in all its relations with Russia concerning Persian affairs." Mr. Shuster, therefore, prepared a brief statement of the situation and on October 21st, after consultation with a number of prominent Persians and with the unofficial sanction of the Cabinet, he mailed an open letter to the Times with a request for publication. On November 2nd, the Russian Minister called at the Persian Foreign Office and made a verbal demand, in the name of his Government, that the Treasury gendarmes should be immediately withdrawn from the park of Shua-us-Sultana and that an apology should be tendered for the "insult" which his Government alleged had been offered to its consular officers. On November 11th, a written renewal of the original demands of the Russian Government was presented at the Persian Foreign Office as an ultimatum to be complied within 48 hours. Meanwhile the Russian troops began to move out of the Caucasus. The Russian demands were, at last accepted by the Persian Government on the advice of Sir Edward Grey. The Persian Foreign Minister went to the Russian Legation and, seizing the Russian Minister by the hand, said:—"Your Excellency, I am instructed by my own Government to apologise in its name for the affront put upon the consular officers of your Excellency's Government in the Shua-us-Sultana affair." And then followed "the grim diplomatic jest which only a Russian Cabinet, with its utter disregard for fairness or decency, would think of perpetrating."

The Persian Ministers evidently believed that their self-abasement and the delivery of the estates would appease even Russian anger and settle the whole affair. A compliance with Russian demands was the very last thing that the Russian Cabinet desired. . . . What Russia plainly wanted was to have some pretext for continuing to occupy Northern Persia with her troops, a thing which she had started to do before her ultimatum to Persia had even been presented. . . . Persia's agreement to the demands of the first ultimatum was accepted, but the Persian Minister was informed that in the meantime another ultimatum was being prepared.

True to its promise, on November 29th, the Russian Government presented to Persia its second ultimatum demanding its acceptance within forty-eight hours. The demands included the dismissal of Mr. Shuster, an undertaking to be given by the Persian Government not to engage in the service of Persia foreign subjects without first obtaining the consent of the Russian and British Legations and the payment of an indemnity.

At last the final crisis came in Persia's fortunes and her fate as a free and sovereign State hung on the decision that she was to take. The Persian statesmen and chieftains who formed the Cabinet quickly decided to accept Russia's ultimatum with all it meant to the liberties of the people. There was, however, one body still left that had to utter the last and fateful word. On December 1st, shortly before the time-limit fixed by Russia expired, the Ministers appeared before the Mejliss to get its sanction. The Parliament grounds and buildings were packed with eager, excited throngs, while the galleries were filled with notables and representatives of the Foreign Legations. The fate of Persia as a nation was to be decided. And here we must tell the story in the words of Mr. Shuster:—

The proposal (of accepting Russian demands) was read amid deep silence. Seventy-six Deputies, old men and young, priests, lawyers, doctors, merchants and princes, sat tense in their seats. A venerable priest of Islam arose. Time was slipping away and at noon the question would be beyond their vote to decide. This servant of God spoke briefly and to the point. "It may be the will of Allah that our liberty and our sovereignty shall be taken from us by force, but let us not sign them away with our own hands." One gesture of appeal with his trembling hands and he resumed his seat.

Simple words these, yet winged ones. Easy to utter in academic discussions, hard, bitterly hard, to say under the eye of a cruel and overpowering tyrant whose emissaries watched the speaker from the galleries. . . . Other deputies followed. In dignified appeals, brief because the time was short, they upheld their country's honour and proclaimed their hard-earned right to live and govern themselves. A few minutes before noon the public vote was taken. . . . As each name was called the Deputy rose in his place and gave his vote; there was no secret ballot here. And when the roll-call was ended every man, priest or layman, youth or octogenarian, had cast his own die of fate, had staked the safety of himself and family, and hurled back into the teeth of the great Bear from the North the unanimous answer of a desperate and down-trodden people who preferred a future of unknown terror to the voluntary sacrifice of their national dignity and of their recently earned right to work out their own salvation.

Amid tears and applause from the spectators, the crestfallen and frightened members of the Cabinet withdrew, while the Deputies dispersed to ponder over the course which lay darkly before their people.

But the last refuge of the people's hope and liberty, the patriotic and heroic Mejliss, fell a victim to the coup d'état of the craven-hearted Ministry. With the fall of the Mejliss fell Mr. Shuster, and Persia as an independent country ceased to exist. The Anglo-Russian condominium has arrived. The Persians are, according to Mr. Shuster, doomed to political annihilation and economic servitude. The world cannot heed their moral appeal because they are weak and Asiatics. "Morocco, Tripoli and Persia, three Moslem States, have been destroyed in one year by their enlightened Christian neighbours. It is not a pretty spectacle." We must finish a brief and hurried notice of the masterly work which Mr. Shuster has produced and which must be read by every man interested in Persian affairs, by believing with him that

The Constitutionlists of modern Persia will not have lived, struggled and, in many instances, died entirely in vain, if the destruction of Persian sovereignty shall have sharpened somewhat the civilised world's realisation of the spirit of international brigandage which marked the wellpolitik of the year 1911.

The Muslim University.

III.

By far the most important decision which the Secretary of State has arrived at with regard to the Muslim University is connected with what Sir Harcourt Butler in his letter calls its "external relations." "His Majesty's Secretary of State has decided after mature consideration that the proposed University should not have powers of affiliation outside the locality in which it may be established".

In support of this decision, Sir Harcourt Butler has adduced in his letter an argument from the history of Muhammadan education in India, viz., that "the hope of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was to convert Aligarh into a teaching and residential University".

We acknowledge that the great founder of Aligarh was unrivalled in his farsightedness and in his confidence in the success of the institution of which he was laying the foundation. When he had only eight little urchins and a thatched bungalow in a deserted cantonment which was to be the capital of Moslem education, he designed plans of spacious buildings and extensive courtyards to house 1,000 students. When his friends contrasted the Aligarh that was with the Aligarh that was to be, and invited him to consider the wilderness in which wolves howled every night round his solitary tent his only answer was the smile of the man who had faith in his Maker, faith in himself, and, we believe, faith in his community. Nothing was planned on a mean scale and only a generation has justified the bold designer.

But our admiration for Sir Syed Ahmed Khan's clearness of vision and boundless faith cannot transform the hero into the god. He had seen Oxford and Cambridge and he hoped that one day his own people too may have a similar institution at Aligarh. There is no evidence to show that in his heart of hearts he was disappointed with the progress made during his lifetime, and were he alive to-day the sight of 1,200 lusty and refined youths fired with his own zeal and united in a single aim could not but gladden his heart. But he would be a bold man indeed who could say that Sir Syed Ahmed Khan had hoped to achieve in 1912, only 37 years after the foundation of a small school, a university for more than 1,000 undergraduates. More money flowed into the college in the first decade after his death than he had himself been able to collect during his lifetime. But great as was the financial success of the college in the régime of Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, it sinks into insignificance by the side of the money collected in a year and a half since it was announced that His Majesty the King-Emperor would visit India, and the Muhammadans combined to make a heroic effort to collect the necessary funds before their Sovereign graced India with his presence and granted them a Charter for the Moslem University. We, who have more often complained of Muslim indifference, indolence and absence of organization than praised Muslim generosity and Muslim energy, must acknowledge that, although the whole idea of a deputation under His Highness the Aga Khan emanated in a humble way from ourselves, we had never hoped for such eventual success as has crowned the efforts of the promoters of the Muslim University. It would, therefore, be wholly without justification to suggest that Sir Syed Ahmed Khan ever expected the results which have been achieved under these special circumstances. How much more unjustifiable would it be to assert that the founder of Aligarh had expected that the Mussalmans would have within 50 years of his founding a school an undergraduate population at Aligarh exceeding that of Oxford or Cambridge.

But that is what we confidently predict. And if we praise the far-sightedness and self-confidence of that bold designer who planned everything for a thousand students when he had not enough funds at his disposal to provide adequately for the education of fifty, shall we not be guilty of short-sightedness and lack of confidence in ourselves if at a time when we have got the wherewithal to educate 1,000 undergraduates, in addition to some 600 school-boys, on a scale even higher than that of the best Government institutions in India, we do not prepare plans for a future in which Aligarh would have to close its doors if its undergraduate population was to be circumscribed like that of Oxford? That is where the argument from the history of Muhammadan education brings us. To think that because Sir Syed Ahmed Khan had drawn an arc, his successors should not complete the circle, is neither good logic nor good history.

Let us look into this question in some detail. The latest report of the Principal of the Aligarh College issued this week tells us that the college had on its rolls some six months ago no less than 610 students, 531 of whom were resident undergraduates. We leave out of account the collegiate school altogether, for in a discussion about the University it is best to concentrate our attention on the number of undergraduates alone. At the same time last year, the number of undergraduates on the books of the college was 502, of whom 437 were resident students. This shows an increase of more than 20 per cent. in the total number of undergraduates, and of 21½ per cent. in the number of resident students, in a single year. But high as this rate of increase appears, it is wholly misleading. What would give a better idea if the attraction of Aligarh for Moslem undergraduates is the number of applications for admission which the Principal receives each year. Mr. Towle received no less than 500 such applications for the current year but could accommodate no more than 69. In his report for 1911-12 he says "no large increase can be expected for 1912-13, but for the following year there should be a further advance of about 150 students in the college." This is accounted for by the fact that sufficient accommodation could not be provided for more than 69 in addition to the number on the books of the college in the previous year, but that in 1913 when two more blocks of the Minto Circle are to be completed, 150 more students would be accommodated. Now the funds collected for the Muslim University would suffice for 1,000 undergraduates, even if the Mussalmans follow the very high scale of salaries insisted upon by the Education Department in estimating the expenditure of the University. As the college already has 610 students on its books, and as no less than 431 were refused admission this year on account of lack of accommodation, it is clear that had the University come into existence, and had the accommodation for 1,000 undergraduates been ready, the University would have been completely filled to-day, and some 40 candidates for admission would have been refused. At this rate it is not difficult to calculate in how many years Aligarh would have an undergraduate population of 3,000, which is the utmost limit of Oxford and Cambridge. We believe, given accommodation, it would take no more than five years to reach this number. As for accommodation itself, it is a question of money, and although 30 lakhs have been collected in a year and a half under abnormal conditions, the existence of a Muslim University would itself increase the flow of charity towards it, so that, at the rapid pace of progress which has been noticeable in recent years, we are justified in believing that, if in 35 years a small school could grow up into a university for 1,000 undergraduates, it would not take more than 15 years at the very outside for that university to grow into three times the size it would have been to-day if it had been permitted to come into being.

In other words, the Mussalmans would have their Oxford in Aligarh at the latest by the year 1930, though there is a greater probability that they would have it by the year 1925. When they have secured that, what are they to do? Surely those responsible for Muslim education could not follow the example of the Punjab Chief Court in the matter of lawyers. They could not open the door of higher education only to 3,000 Muslim youths, expecting that the community would be satisfied with that, and turning the rest of its youngmen into farriers, as one ex-professor of Aligarh, a protégé of Sir Theodore Morison, had nobly suggested. They could not follow the example of the Presidency College of Calcutta either, accepting only a number, and even then only those who had matriculated in the First Division, and turning back the rest to wander like their first parents, and find like them that "The world was all before them, where to choose Their place of rest."

This only the Executive-ridden Chief Court of the Punjab and the Swaraji Department of Public Instruction in Bengal could do with any hope of success. Having founded their Oxford at Aligarh, and filled it to overflowing within the next 15 years, the Mussalmans would have to found their Cambridge, and at that rate we shall find that once in every 10 years, and subsequently once in every five years, the problem of creating new universities would have to be faced if in the important particular of numbers the example of Oxford and Cambridge is rigidly followed.

The Mussalmans have a tremendous leeway to make up even to reach the level of their Hindu fellow-countrymen, and those who reflect on the fact that there are only 180,000 Mussalmans who are literate in English as compared with a million Hindus cannot be expected to rest on their oars. The Hindu population is nominally 217 millions, and if the 60 million untouchables, to which no section of Mussalmans corresponds, are excluded, there remains a residuum of 157 millions. On the other hand, the Mussalmans number 66½ millions. The Hindus have therefore no less than 63·7 per 10,000 of literates in English, whereas the Mussalmans have only 27. The Mussalmans have, therefore, not only to keep pace with Hindu progress, but have to make up for lost time by increasing the number of literates in English from 180,000 to more than 420,000. Now the Moslem proportion in literacy in English is not so bad as in the number of college students, and they could not hope to keep pace with the Hindus unless they established within the next fifty years five universities with 3,000 students in each. That is what they have got to achieve, and, in the light of the progress made since the foundation of a school at Aligarh 37 years ago, it is not too hopeful to trust that they would achieve it. The appetite for knowledge grows with what it feeds on, and past experience has shown that educational charity grows in volume and rate with the advance of knowledge.

We have outlined above the requirements of the Mussalmans and also expressed a hope that within 50 years those requirements will be satisfied. But we have still to consider the methods which the leaders of the Mussalmans have in their minds for achieving this ambitious programme. Past experience has shown to the Mussalmans that progress in order to be real must be gradual, and if the Mussalmans are to establish as many as five universities of their own in India, it is not enough to dream of them and see visions of glory. A nucleus for each of these universities must be found in some educational institution established by the Mussalmans of each province themselves, no matter how humble it may be. The only college outside Aligarh which the Mussalmans ever established is the Islamia College of Lahore, and naturally that must receive the earliest attention. In addition to this college, there are schools in various provinces, such as the Sindh Madrasah at Karachi and the Anjuman-i-Islam School at Bombay. These have got to be developed into First Grade Colleges within the next five years. Other schools have to be improved and a great many have yet to be established. The educational programme of the Mussalmans should be to concentrate their efforts in a properly regulated order on such institutions as are already in existence. They will have to improve in the first place the existing college at Lahore, till one day like Aligarh itself, it is converted into a university. Next in order would come the existing schools which would be improved in a manner that in later years they could be converted into First Grade Colleges. Thereafter their progress would follow the lines of the Aligarh College, and we would have in the fullness of time other Universities of Islam. The order, therefore, would be for schools to grow into colleges and for colleges to develop into universities. Unless this is done, the Mussalmans must either cry "halt" to their educational progress just after having made a fair start or increase the number of undergraduates at the University of Aligarh. There is no third alternative; for Government Universities cannot satisfy the requirements of the Mussalmans, and so far at least as this community is concerned, the Government would have to give up the idea of itself providing for its higher education instead of assisting Muslim institutions with grants-in-aid out of State revenues. Of the two alternatives surely no one can expect the Mussalmans to agree to cease to progress just after commencing to progress at all. There is therefore only one possible solution of the Muslim educational problem, and that is the establishment of new schools the conversion of existing schools into colleges and the development of these colleges into universities on the Aligarh model.

There is nothing in the programme which we have sketched to which, even with its new-born love for teaching universities, the Government can object; for we have always contemplated what the Government has now only begun to talk about, namely, teaching and residential universities. But teaching and residential universities do not come into existence like Pallas Athene, born fully armed out of head of Zeus. Before these universities can become exclusively teaching institutions, they have to put up with the compromise with which Aligarh has to put up. In other words, each of these five universities which we hope to see established within the next half a century will have to commence its career as a hybrid, teaching the majority of its undergraduates in the parent institution and affiliating neighbouring institutions till such time as they could grow into universities of the same type themselves. In the course of their growth the powers of affiliation would be atrophied and drop away. Progress is not possible on other lines; for, to judge from the analogy of the human family, a patriarch must have patria potestas over his children till such time as they attain the toga virilis and become patriarchs themselves. Thus alone shall the Mussalmans have the full consummation of the hope expressed by the great founder of Aligarh in the address presented to Lord Lytton on the 8th of January 1877, that "from the seed which we sow to-day, there may spring up a mighty tree, whose branches, like the banyan of the soil, shall in their turn strike firm roots into the earth and themselves send forth vigorous saplings." To-day the Mussalmans, who, but for the Secretary of State's decision, would have had the first university teaching no less than a thousand undergraduates, desire to re-establish a university which would be partly federal. But their educational programme does not end there. This is only the first stage of a progress in which the federation would be not of schools and colleges, but of universities. Progress on these lines would be on a system of proper co-ordination; but if the Mussalmans of each province were allowed to establish institutions as the fancy took them, there would be disorder and chaos.

But that is not all. Although the torch of learning must be carried into every province, it must be illumined from the central light at Aligarh if it is to be illumined at all. This would be apparent to anyone who reflected for a moment on the facts as they exist to-day. Is it or is it not a fact that Bombay, which has not yet established a college of its own, has contributed more than six lacs to the Muslim University, in addition to several lacs contributed previously to the college at Aligarh? Is it not also a fact that the Punjab has contributed over three lacs to the University, and, as everybody knows, has taken a leading part in financing the Aligarh College, while the Islamia College at Lahore itself has hardly a capital fund at all, and depends upon the contributions, made at the annual meetings of the Anjuman-i-Hemayat-i-Islam? What is the secret of the financial prosperity of the Aligarh College and the proposed Muslim University, as compared with the poverty of the provincial institutions in the Punjab and Bombay? It is this. Every province has not had a Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, nor has the founder of an educational institution in such provinces been able to gather round himself men of the type and character of those who were associated with the work of Sir Syed. The entire Muslim community has displayed a greater confidence in those responsible for the management of the Aligarh College and the promoters of the proposed University than the Mussalmans in the various provinces have shown in the leaders of the provinces themselves. When we say this we mean no disrespect to provincial leaders. What we wish to signify is that although there are enough trusty men to manage collectively the affairs of one central institution successfully, there are not enough of them in each province to manage equally successfully the affairs of the institutions in their respective provinces. That is why the men of the Punjab support the Aligarh College even more than the college at Lahore and that is also the reason why "the shrewd men of Bombay" from whom at one time a contemporary of ours expected the fatal policy of provincialism, have supported the proposed Muslim University even more than their local school. Now unless the promoters of the Muslim University, who are in the main persons associated with the work of management at Aligarh, took up the work of improving educational institutions in different provinces, and even establishing others where none exist, this work would not be performed for a long time, and all past experience shows that even if it is performed it will not be performed so well. The first condition on which managers of provincial institutions would permit the promoters of the Aligarh University to interfere with their work would be that the proposed University should undertake some financial responsibility for those institutions. If there is no taxation without representation, there is also no representation without taxation. We have then this difficulty, that existing provincial institutions are not likely to grow rapidly, and new ones are not likely to be brought into being within a reasonable time, unless the authorities of the Aligarh University lend them a helping hand in the matter of finance. But it is obvious that when financial responsibility is accepted to any extent, the institutions assisted in this manner should follow the general lines of Aligarh. But this is nothing less than affiliation; for it is absurd to conceive that while moribund institutions are tolerated by Government if they are affiliated to provincial Universities, Aligarh should not be allowed to affiliate them when it assists them financially, and takes a keener interest in their internal administration than the present federal universities with their loose organisation and absence of sentimental ties have ever done.

We have said enough to show that Muhammedans cannot keep level with other communities in India unless they have a much larger number of educational institutions than they have to-day. We have referred to the postulate that existing institutions cannot satisfy the requirements of the Mussalmans. And we have endeavoured to show that Muslim institutions cannot grow unless they are linked up with Aligarh. There is one postulate, however, which has all the time been at the back of our mind. It is this. Aligarh, as a local institution, though not as a movement, must not grow beyond the size of Oxford or Cambridge. Unless this is accepted, the whole of our argument falls to the ground, because it may be said that instead of the five different Muslim Universities spread throughout the country, with 3,000 students in each, the Mussalmans could establish only one at Aligarh and admit 15,000 students in the same. Some would think that distance would be an argument against such a possibility. But for our part, we are prepared to admit that the attraction of Aligarh would almost annihilate distances. There is, however, a very important consideration which must be fully understood. There is such a thing as the psychology of numbers, and if the Oxford that we know to-day could not be the same if reduced to a fourth of its present size, we say without fear of contradiction that it would be still more different if it had within its colleges four times the number of undergraduates that it has to-day. If Aligarh is to follow the lines of Oxford, it is much more essential that it should be limited in its numbers than that it should be limited in its scope and territorial jurisdiction. There is, therefore, no running away from the pointed horns of the dilemma that the Mussalmans must either have a hybrid University teaching in the main, and affiliating for so long as necessary, and in this particular differing to some extent, though not altogether. From Oxford, which has at least one college affiliated to it outside its municipal limits; or they must concentrate 15,000 undergraduates in one place and differ altogether from the model which they have always kept before themselves. We are not unaware that for all the glib talk of practical objections on educational grounds, other objections which are never publicly expressed have not been absent from the minds of those who are opposed to affiliation. But is it a greater danger to link up provincial institutions with the parent institution at Aligarh, or to bring together 15,000 lusty youths of Islam within the quadrangles of a single university, located in a single university town. To our mind both dangers are purely imaginary, though the publication of imaginary dangers sometimes brings them into existence. But let those who believe in the existence of danger for a moment pause and consider.

The Moslem University.

Moslem Feeling.

On the 24th August a mass meeting was held at Jodhpur and the following resolution was passed and a copy of it wired to the Hon'ble Raja Sir Mohammed Ali Sahib of Mahmudabad:—"The Muhammadans of Marwar and Rajputana desire that the Government should be respectfully and loyally approached to grant a University with full powers of affiliation. A local university is not needed."

The Moslem University.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Can anyone congratulate the Secretary of State for India on his decision recently communicated to the Hon. Raja of Mahmudabad through the Hon. Member for Education? There is no use denying that political considerations are in the main responsible for the view Lord Crewe has taken. Almost every member of our community realise that the Government do not wish that there should be a central movement established in the heart of the Indian continent, which should unite 70 millions of Mussalmans and, by bringing remote parts of the country in touch with the parent movement, bring about a solidarity that might prove undesirable. That is the real reason why the Secretary of State's sanction has been hemmed in by restrictions and limitations that would render the "University of Aligarh" a thoroughly impotent institution. But even on political grounds it is of the utmost importance to the maintenance of British rule that there must be some counterpoise to the power of the Mahrattas in the south, of the Bengalees in the north east and of the Sikhs in the north. Geographically Aligarh occupies a most central position and true statesmanship would point to its being strengthened by Government, whose experience of the Bengalee anarchists cannot be very old yet. But there is another result which the Secretary of State's decision might produce; and that is, a reconciliation between Moslems and Hindus. The Hindu and Moslem leaders equally realise what incalculable harm is being done to the cause of Indian progress by animosity between the two communities. But, thanks to Lord Crewe, he has afforded us an opportunity of joining in a common cause. The curt Press Communiqué is bound to accomplish what many a Reconciliation Conference could not have done. The Government may or may not look askance at the Moslems and Hindus being brought together in a common camp, but the fact remains that Lord Crewe has managed to unite the two communities in opposition to his "final decision." A shrewd English friend told me the other day that he considered the Secretary of State's action most deplorable because it supplied the two great communities of the country with a common grievance that was sure to produce agitation, and agitation would bring unrest in its train.

From political let us turn to educational grounds mentioned in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter. It is said by some good people that the Moslems have not met satisfactorily the practical objections to the scheme, though they have exhibited much warmth in criticizing the Secretary of State's order. To begin with Sir Harcourt Butler's letter has raised four important points on which Lord Crewe is not in agreement with the Moslem community. They are:—
(1)—Affiliation. (2)—Control by the Governor-General in Council.
(3)—Name of the University. (4)—Reservation of discretion as to certain matters. Whatever has been written in the Press in support of Lord Crewe's decision is almost exclusively confined to the first point. The most ardent admirers of his Lordship have not been in a position to adduce any arguments in support of his views on the last three points. By vesting the powers of the Chancellor in the Governor-General in Council the Mussulmans would be converting their University into a state department. We would have practically nine Chancellors in place of one and every one of them would have the right of advice and interference. As regards the name of the University one cannot understand why Lord Crewe should have scruples in calling a spade a spade. The University is a denominational university. Would your calling it "the University of Timbuctoo" make it any the less Islamic? The reservation of discretion by Lord Crewe, on matters not specifically mentioned in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter, is deliciously vague. The community through its representatives has submitted a full and complete constitution to the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and its desire to know to what matters, if any, exception is taken by Lord Crewe is hardly unreasonable.

There remains the all-important question of affiliation. Far from leading to competition and conflict with the territorial universities one would have thought that the foundation of the Moslem University would give an impetus to the cause of higher education in India. Nobody thought of taking the same objection to the establishment of the Punjab University in 1882 and the Allahabad University in 1887. The objection proceeds on the assumption that there would not be sufficient Government control and to this the constitution framed by the constitution committee is a complete reply. The second objection to affiliation contained in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter is based on Lord Crewe's solicitude for a teaching university. True we want to have a teaching university. But as affiliation shall not be extended to colleges not founded on the model of Aligarh College, there is no room for apprehension that teaching would become subordinate to examinations. The constitution committee has laid it down as a condition precedent that the College applying for affiliation must be a residential college. Again under the proposed constitution the Viceroy being the chancellor, it would always be open to him to withhold affiliation to a college in which there is not sufficient provision for the residence and teaching of students. The third objection lays stress on the tone or spirit of a particular college. But it utterly disregards the fact that the University cannot come into being before we have a number of colleges, properly equipped with hostels, in the neighbourhood of Aligarh. The present college at Aligarh covers several miles. If more colleges are to be built there, they will have to be located at places like Hardwaganj, Sasni and Bhikampur. That being the case it is difficult to see why the soil of these places, many miles removed from each other, should be more congenial to the growth of a certain tone or spirit than Karachi, Calcutta or Lahore. The last objection deals with the apprehended inability of the University to control colleges in different parts of India. Here again it is necessary to refer to the proposed constitution. Due care has been bestowed on the question by the framers of the constitution; and they have made ample provision for proper and effective control.

A close observer of the movement for higher education among Mussalmans cannot help remarking that the Secretary of State has attached too much importance to the affiliation question. It was not at all necessary to sanctify his decision by putting the seal of finality upon it. Even if his Lordship confers a general power of affiliation on the Moslem University, he should rest assured that the Islamia College of Lahore is the only institution that might apply for affiliation after many years' preparation. But the decision involves a question of principle. It may be forbidden to Indians for all time to have self-government on colonial lines. But why should that principle be extended to matters educational, especially when the constitution seeks to arm the Viceroy with very vast powers as Chancellor. The question that would suggest itself to every thinking man is, how is it that the Secretary of State did not hint his disapproval when the funds were being collected. By his silence he not only acquiesced in the proposal, but held out encouragement to the community to go on with the work. Would it be statesmanship now to undo what has been done with his Lordship's tacit consent. Subscriptions have been paid on the clear understanding that the University is not to be confined to any locality or province. That being the case I deem it my duty as an humble member of the Moslem Community to raise my feeble voice and say that the foundation committee would be acting against the unanimous will of the community if they accepted the University on the terms mentioned in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter. This is not the stage when we should enter into discussions as to what should be done with the money. We simply want to make it known that we never wanted to have such an impotent, emaciated, lifeless University as the Secretary of State has been pleased to offer us and we will have none of it.

Is not a compromise possible? Compromise is a very good thing indeed and the life of individuals as well as of nations consist of a series of compromises. But what hope of compromise can there be when the Secretary of State's proposals involve a negation of the basic principles on which the entire fabric of the movement is built? Whatever their other failings may be, Indian Mussalmans are not an unreasonable people; but to expect that they would accept any modification on the two questions of affiliation and the vesting of the Viceroy with the powers of the chancellor is simply hoping beyond all hope.

Any compromise on these two points means that we toiled hard since 1898, sparing neither energy nor trouble, obtained 30 lakhs and more from a poor community on false promises, and then went to sleep by making it over to Government with the consolation that a Secretary of State who has hardly been in office for a couple of years, knew more about our needs and requirements than ourselves.

MORADABAD,
2nd September.

S. RIZA ALI.

SIR,

You announce in your issue of the 24th August that the Moslem University Foundation Committee will meet at an early date to decide the fate of the University project. Will you kindly give publicity to the following views with regard to the questions which the Committee will have to decide.

No question in the modern history of India has moved the Indian Mussalmans so deeply as the question of the Moslem University. The enthusiasm displayed by the community over the question has been so warm that there is a suspicion whether it has not actually outstripped discretion. The unexpected check which the enthusiasm has received is perhaps only a God-send to afford the community an opportunity to reconsider coolly the merit of the whole project. What do we want a University for? Mr. Editor, you have answered it by saying that the movement is based upon the conviction of the Mussalmans that their supreme need is to evolve a distinct type of higher education for their community. Will the University even as projected by the Constitution Committee serve this purpose? I am afraid not. The University will still be too much dependent upon Government. Government cannot, Government will not recognize any type save the type Imperial. It is idle to expect the Government to countenance the growth of a distinct Moslem type. Government may countenance denominational Universities. But the countenance will go only so far as these Universities will represent different methods adapted to the special circumstances of the respective communities in order to train them up to a common Imperial type. In short, Government wants us to be British citizens first and Moslems afterwards. The Mussalmans, on the other hand, want to be Moslems first and British citizens afterwards. I do not know if a compromise between the two ideals is possible.

The dream of a Moslem University is however a legacy left to us by Sir Syed and his gifted son. The dreams of such men never remain unfulfilled. I suppose we have only failed to read the dream correctly. According to Dr. Ikbal مسلم ہیں ہم وطن مسلم ہیں ہم وطن the Moslems are all one nation, the whole earth belongs to us. (I generally read مسلم ہیں ہم وطن with a hyphen.)

A University which will serve the need of a people like this cannot be confined to any locality, province and country. We should avail ourselves of the best opportunities provided for the training of young men which the earth can afford. Let our young men learn science in Germany, Arts in France, Industries in America, Commerce in England, Theology in Egypt, and Modern Islamic culture in Turkey. Let us send forth young men all over the earth to glean of the best they can find. The funds collected and promised for the University will yield an income which will enable the community to maintain some 200 young Mussalmans in foreign countries, and in a few years we might welcome them back to our land—the pioneers of thought, culture, commerce and industries. We want a distinct type of higher education for our people. The distinctive feature might be obtained by a period of compulsory sojourn in some Moslem land.

Such is the University which will suit a community like ours. It will be more effective for the speedy advance of our people than any local University. I believe it will also be more economical.

Mr. Editor, you are of opinion that any diversion of money to any other channel than the projected University would amount to the breach of a solemn trust. I hope, the Foundation Committee will look at the matter differently.

A SILENT MOSLEM.

SIR,—I find that you have invited the subscribers of your Journal to say if the Mussalmans should or should not accept a University on the conditions laid down recently by His Majesty's Secretary of State, namely, that the proposed University should not have power of affiliation outside the locality in which it may be established and that in future it should be styled "the University of Aligarh" and not "the Moslem University." You do not refer to any of the other conditions insisted on by the Secretary of State either specifically or in general terms. Now it seems to me that this invitation is rather premature. The decision of the Community must be swayed by various considerations. The Mussalmans desire a practically autonomous University, and one of the most important considerations in deciding the question at issue must be the extent of power ultimately left in their hands. For the degree of the usefulness of a separate university established at an enormous cost must largely depend upon the extent of that power. So until all the objections and suggestions that His Majesty's Secretary of State or the Government of India has to make in respect of the Bill as already drafted by the Constitution Committee, both as regards matters of principle and details, are made known the Moslem Community will not in fact be in a position to pass a final verdict on the question.

The funds of the proposed University were subscribed on the understanding that it will have power of affiliation of colleges outside Aligarh, the Secretary of States, decision in that respect has come to us as a surprise. What the final verdict of the Community as a whole would be when it is in possession of all the possible objections and suggestions on behalf of the Government, is more than I can tell at present, but of this much I am sure that an overwhelming majority of the Mussalmans is, as at present inclined, against the acceptance of a University without such powers of affiliation.

I am afraid that if objections are made by instalments and we go on accepting them in the same manner, we will have only a shadow of power left to us in the end, and the Moslem University will be little better than a magnified religio-secular Government College based on the residential system.

The objection that a university at Aligarh would be quite unable to control Colleges situated in different parts of India, has very little force. There is at present only one Muhammadan College in the whole country. There is, however, a chance of a Muhammadan College being established in each of the provinces and presidencies within a decade or so, but no more. Any one province or presidency can scarcely provide a sufficient number of Muhammadan students for two Muhammadan Colleges in it. It is not at all likely, therefore, that there would be more than seven Colleges which could be affiliated to the Moslem University, and the task of controlling these seven cannot be so difficult as His Majesty's Secretary of State imagines it to be. The question of their affiliation would, moreover, have to be decided by the Government which might refuse to affiliate a college if it should find that the Moslem University would by reason of its distance or otherwise, be quite unable to control it.

The McCormick Case.

Defamation Case Proceedings.

ON TUESDAY, the 14th July, the hearing of the charge of defamation preferred against Mr. C. Arnold by Mr. G. P. Andrew, which had been adjourned from the 27th June in order to allow of the arrival of Lieutenant A. McL. Finnie, was resumed by the District Magistrate.

Mr. Rutledge: Your Honour, I have Mr. Finnie here and I propose to call him.

The Court: You wish to call him next?

Mr. Rutledge: I wish to call him now because he speaks to the earlier parts of this case and produces documents which Mr. Hamlyn referred to and said that he would require them for the further cross-examination of Mr. Andrew.

Mr. Hamlyn: Do I understand that my cross-examination is going to be interrupted by putting a witness for the prosecution into the witness box?

Mr. Rutledge: I am doing this as Mr. Hamlyn requested it on the last occasion.

Mr. Hamlyn: I made no such request.

Mr. Rutledge: As far as I recollect on the last occasion Mr. Hamlyn stopped the cross-examination of Mr. Andrew because he said he understood that Mr. Finnie was being called and he wanted him to be present before he proceeded with the further cross-examination of Mr. Andrew.

On Mr. Hamlyn rising to make further objection, His Worship intimated abruptly that it was not his intention to proceed with the case any further but to send it up to the Sessions; and he quoted the section on which he relied in his decision.

Mr. Hamlyn, after reading the section: Of course, Your Honour, I cannot prevent you from taking such a course. You have, I admit, already intimated during these proceedings that this case will go to the Sessions; but I must emphatically protest at your decision at the present stage.

The Court: The only thing necessary now to do is to examine the accused.

Mr. Hamlyn: I don't know whether Your Worship has sufficient material before you on which to send this case to the Chief Court?

The Court: My opinion is that it should go to the Sessions. I have already expressed that opinion twice.

Mr. Hamlyn: I want to get in a lot of documentary evidence in order to facilitate the trial in the Chief Court. I take it that before I know what is established against my client, Your Worship will want me to send a list of my witnesses?

The Court: Yes, within three days.

Mr. Hamlyn: That is quite an impossibility.

The Court: I cannot help that. I will now examine the accused. Mr. Arnold, will you go into the witness box, please.

Mr. Arnold accordingly entered the witness box.

The Court: You are Mr. Channing Arnold mentioned in Exhibit A, are you not?

Mr. Arnold: Yes.

The Court: Were you the Editor of the Burma Critic dated the 7th March and 28th April?

Mr. Arnold: Yes.

The Court: I take it that you assume the responsibility for these articles?

Mr. Arnold: Absolute responsibility.

The Court: Do you wish to say anything else?

Mr. Arnold: Yes, I wish to add my protest to that of my Counsel against your whole attitude over this case and your action in committing it to the Sessions before hearing the case through.

The Magistrate then charged Mr. Arnold under Section 500, I.P.C.

The Magistrate, taking from his pocket a statement which he had brought into Court ready written, said: I will now read out my reasons for committal.

The order was then read.

Mr. Hamlyn: Your Worship will remember that some ten days ago an application was put in by me on behalf of Mr. Arnold asking that certain books and documents be produced at this hearing.

Mr. Rutledge: I got the notice on Tuesday last and at considerable expense I telegraphed to Mr. Andrew to bring them or such as he could. If the case had gone on, I would have taken objection to several of them being produced on the ground of their being absolutely irrelevant; for instance, the Shooting Case which occurred last October at a considerable distance from McCormick's estate. These documents were sent on from Mergui in a registered bag addressed to me. I have enquired of the Post Office but have not got them yet.

The Court: I take it that they will be produced in the other Court.

Mr. Hamlyn: I understand, Sir, you made an order for their production. I want inspection of them to see what witnesses are necessary to call and what witnesses to leave out.

Mr. Rutledge: I have no objection to Mr. Hamlyn perusing in my office any documents that come to me from Mergui, but I certainly wish to object to them as irrelevant and encumbering the case.

Mr. Hamlyn: I accept Mr. Rutledge's challenge that several of the documents have nothing to do with the case, but I shall like to see them for myself. I understand Your Worship to say that you have committed the case to the next Sessions.

The Court: Yes, the Sessions of the 13th August.

Mr. Hamlyn: We are very anxious that the matter be expedited, but we must have sufficient time. There are certain witnesses in India whom it is necessary for us to call. I wish to put in a list of witnesses as soon as possible and Your Worship will see that everything is done to get them here.

The Court: I will, yes.

The Court to Mr. Rutledge: You will give Mr. Hamlyn inspection of the documents?

Mr. Rutledge: As soon as I get delivery of them I will.

Mr. Hamlyn: If Mr. Rutledge will give me inspection of the documents in the course of to-morrow it will facilitate the matter very much.

The Court: Then in that case you can let me have the list the day after to-morrow?

Mr. Hamlyn: Provided I have inspection of these documents. I don't know how these documents would come from Mergui. There is only one boat a week I understand and that arrives invariably on Sunday.

Mr. Rutledge: I expected them by the mail by which I got the advice that they had been posted.

Mr. Hamlyn: Very well, I understand that Mr. Rutledge has intimation that they are in the post.

Mr. Rutledge have had intimation that they were sent.

Mr. Hamlyn: In that case he ought to get them by Monday next. Do I understand Mr. Rutledge that what documents I have asked for are on their way? I should like a list of these documents.

His Honour read out a list of documents.

Mr. Rutledge: I think I had a letter stating what documents were forwarded. One refers to the Shooting Case. Then there are various applications of McCormick for land. There is no telegraph despatch book in the Deputy Commissioner's Office or in the District Superintendent of Police's Office. There are four counterfoils of telegrams, I think. I am speaking from memory. I think four counterfoils were sent in this parcel.

Mr. Hamlyn: Well, I take it all these documents will be in this Court or the Chief Court. I take it they will be put into the custody of the Court?

Mr. Rutledge: I will exercise my discretion whether I will produce them or not.

Mr. Hamlyn: I insist upon their production for my inspection. In the ends of justice these documents are absolutely necessary and I invoke Your Honour's aid in order to get them. I think you can order them to be produced under Sec. 94 Chap. VII.

The Court: Mr. Rutledge, do you object to these documents being produced?

Mr. Rutledge: I object to them purely on the ground of irrelevancy. As soon as these documents arrive, I will put them before Mr. Hamlyn for his inspection.

The Court to Mr. Hamlyn: I think that is all, Mr. Hamlyn, you are entitled to.

Mr. Hamlyn: Your Worship has already decided that the case shall go to the Sessions and Your Worship is not acquainted with what the accused's defence is and I want these documents. Mr. Rutledge won't even admit any of these documents.

Mr. Rutledge: I have not got possession of any of them. I am not responsible for the Post Office.

Mr. Hamlyn: If these documents, Your Honour, are not in existence some explanation will have to be forthcoming why they are not. I shall ask Your Honour to put the machinery in motion under Sec. 94 to get them.

Mr. Rutledge: I protest that Sec. 94 does not give Mr. Hamlyn any right to have the documents produced in Court until he proves that they are necessary and desirable. I have gone out of my way to give him what I could.

The Court: I think, Mr. Hamlyn, your best plan would be to see these documents first.

Mr. Hamlyn: Your Worship, I have put in an application for certain documents and I expect these documents to be produced. I can quite understand, knowing of what importance these documents are to the case, that the prosecution are undesirous of producing them.

Mr. Rutledge: The prosecution are not undesirous. That is a particularly fatuous remark in the face of the fact that I have offered to put them at Mr. Hamlyn's disposal.

His Honour then passed an order with reference to the documents in the foregoing argument.

The Court: Mr. Hamlyn, will you let me have a list of your witnesses by the 19th instant?

Mr. Hamlyn: No, Your Honour, I cannot until I have had inspection of the documents. There are certain officials who will have to come from their employment if I do not get these documents, and it will put Government to a great deal of inconvenience. I understand that some of the documents are in the post and some are not coming at all. When I have seen them, I shall be able to make up my list of witnesses. As Your Honour knows very well, these articles containing the allegations against the prosecutor are very lengthy and it may be necessary for me to call fifty or a hundred witnesses to establish them. I wish to save the necessity of calling witnesses by getting the documents. I will ask you to give me a week, as I do not know how long it will take to inspect these documents.

The Court: Very well, I will let you have a week, up to the 23rd July.

Mr. Hamlyn: I don't think it is necessary for me to ask as to bail.

The Court: The same bail, as before.

Mr. Hamlyn: Your Honour can cancel the bail bond if you please and if Mr. Rutledge does not oppose that.

Mr. Rutledge: I certainly oppose that, but I do not ask it to be increased.

The Case in Parliament.

In the House of Commons on 2nd July Mr. Kellaway (M.P. for Bedford) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies:—If he is aware of the complaints in Burma of the conduct of the trial of a planter for abduction and rape of a girl of ten years of age at Victoria Point, Tenasserim, in August last; if he is aware that the friends of the girl appealed to the Lieutenant-Governor to remove the case from the Court at which it was heard on the ground that the Magistrate who held the first enquiry and the Judge who conducted trial were both personal friends of the accused; that such appeal was refused; that bail was allowed, although abduction is a non-bailable offence, and that the accused admitted holding the girl in his house for three months, refusing her access to her parents and not allowing her to see her father during his illness or attend his funeral; and if he will inquire into all the circumstances connected with the trial.

Mr. Montagu, who replied, said:—This case, on which the Government of India has made a report to the Secretary of State, will shortly be the subject of judicial proceedings in Burma, pending which, I must of course, decline to express any opinion on the allegations made. But I may explain that the Magistrate's Court has power to allow bail even when the offence charged is described "as non-bailable."

The McCormick Case Petition for Revision.

Mr. Clarence Hamlyn, acting on behalf of Fatima, the mother of the child Ina, filed the following petition on 9th August in the Chief Court.

In the Chief Court of Lower Burma, Criminal Revision No.— of 1912.

Fatima, widow of Malassa, of Pulo Ton Ton, Lower Burma, Petitioner versus

Captain McCormick of the eighth mile, Victoria Point, Lower Burma, Planter, Respondent.

The application for the revision of the proceedings Criminal Regular No. 27 of 1911 of the District Magistrate's Court, Mergui. Respectfully sheweth:—

(1) That Petitioner is the mother of one Ina, a minor twelve years of age.

(2) That in or about the beginning of July 1911 Petitioner made a complaint against the Respondent before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Victoria Point, as to the abduction by the Respondent of her said daughter (sec. 363 I.P.C.). Subsequently a complaint of rape (sec. 376 I.P.C.) of her said daughter was added against the said Respondent.

(3) That a warrant in respect of the said offences was issued by the said Sub-Divisional Magistrate for the arrest of the said Respondent.

(4) That the Police investigated the said offences, before and after the issue of the said warrant, in a manner to which Petitioner took exception.

(5) That the D.S.P. delayed to execute the said warrant issued by the said Magistrate and tried to intimidate him into withdrawing it, and subsequently telegraphed to the Deputy Commissioner, Mergui, to admit the Respondent to bail, which the said District Magistrate did in Respondent's own hands of Rs. 500 only, an act which your Petitioner has been advised is illegal.

(6) That the case was ultimately sent up to the Deputy Commissioner, Mergui, for trial or enquiry.

(7) That Petitioner for divers reasons believed that a fair and impartial enquiry could not be had before the said District Magistrate, one being his friendship with Respondent, and Respondent's influence.

(8) That she caused a petition to be made, and filed it through the Magistrate at Victoria Point, requesting that the case might be transferred from the said District Magistrate's Court to some other Court. She likewise caused a registered letter to be sent to the Commissioner of that Division for the like purpose, and also two telegrams to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province with the same purpose in view.

(9) That no notice was taken of the said petition by the District Magistrate, and nothing was done in relation to the said letter and the telegrams; and her said petition for transfer was wholly ignored by the said District Magistrate, who went on with the said enquiry or trial, using as an interpreter one who was a paid servant or agent of the Respondent, notwithstanding objections being made to the said interpreter on petitioner's account.

(10) That though the case was in charge of the Police, and though Petitioner and her friends earnestly requested the aid of an Advocate, to conduct the said case, and was led to expect that one would be provided, by Government, no one was so provided, nor did the Police conduct the said case in Court before the Magistrate.

(11) That some of Respondent's servants were called without the consent of Petitioner as witnesses for the prosecution, and they were not cross-examined on Petitioner's account. And moreover, some of Petitioner's own witnesses were not called at all, although they were on her list of witnesses,—witnesses who could speak of the circumstances of the actual abduction and who were in the vicinity of the Court waiting to be called.

(12) That the said District Magistrate discharged the Respondent and described the allegation of "rape" as "false," and that of "abduction" as "mistaken."

(13) That the Police failed in their duty in consenting to the trial or enquiry being thus conducted or held at all before the said Magistrate and in not filing an application to this Court to set aside the said trial or enquiry as being illegal. And a record of the case, Petitioner is informed, went through official circles to the Commissioner of the Division and the Local Government, and nothing has been done in connection with the said illegal trial or enquiry. Petitioner is a widow with six children and is in impoverished circumstances.

(14) That Petitioner being aggrieved in consequence of the aforesaid, and of the trial or enquiry being held by the said District Magistrate at all, and by the discharge of the Respondent, applies to this honourable Court to revise the proceedings thereof (vis. Criminal Regular No. 27 of 1911 in the District Magistrate's Court, Mergui, K.-E. versus McCormick) on the following, among other grounds:—

(a) That the said trial or enquiry was illegal ab initio in that the District Magistrate proceeded with it knowing Petitioner desired it to be transferred and had filed a petition to such effect.

(b) That the said enquiry or trial was illegal in that the said District Magistrate did not call all the evidence which Petitioner desired to call, and was ready and willing to call, the said witnesses being in attendance for that purpose.

(c) That the Police having charge of the case and the said District Magistrate trying or enquiring into the matter allowed defence witnesses to give evidence in the case for the prosecution, and such witnesses were not cross-examined.

(d) That the discharge of the said Respondent on the facts and in face of the circumstances was illegal and improper.

(e) That the facts prove that the case was not judicially or legally gone into and the said case should be gone into de novo.

Wherefore Petitioner prays:—

(1) That the said order of discharge of Respondent by the said District Magistrate be set aside.

(2) That the said trial or enquiry ab initio may be set aside as being illegal, and a new trial or enquiry ordered before another Court.

(3) That a warrant be issued for the arrest of Respondent and that he be brought before such Court to stand his trial for the two offences mentioned, or that the Respondent be committed for trial to this Court itself.

(4) That all such necessary orders may be passed as to this Court seems right.

(5) That the Records of Criminal Case No. 27 of 1911, District Magistrate's Court, Mergui, may be sent for, and of the District Magistrate's Court, Rangoon, Criminal Regular No. 83 of 1912.

Comments of "Burma Critic."

On the petition of the mother of the child Ina, that the finding in the enquiry by Mr. Andrew under Chapter XVIII into the charges of abduction and rape against Captain McCormick should be set aside and that a warrant for the accused's arrest be issued, the Chief Judge has passed the following order:—The application will be considered after the termination of the case against Mr. Channing Arnold, and not before.

This decision of the learned Judge surprises us, and it will no doubt surprise those members of both Houses of Parliament who are watching the case on our behalf. The comments in the London Press show that it has been generally concluded from the reply made in the House of Commons by the Under Secretary of State that a new enquiry into the charges against McCormick had been ordered. Inasmuch as the illegalities rendering the enquiry before the Deputy Commissioner of Mergui null and void have been already admitted by him and as the proceedings are thus proved to have been illegal, we should have thought that any further delay in putting the accused on his trial would have been best avoided.

Morocco.

News of the Week.

A company of French troops has been landed at Magador to protect the foreign colonies.

Reuter wires from Paris on 1st September:—A message from Tangier states that it is reported there that the negotiations between France and the pretender El Hiba have resulted in the release of the French prisoners who were handed over to the pretender by El Glawi at Marakesh.

Reuter wires from Paris:—Colonel Mangin advancing southwards encountered and repulsed on 29th August the pretender El Hiba. The whole force under El Hiba's Khalifa suffered heavy losses. The Matin on 1st September confirms the report that El Glawi has effected the release of the Marakesh prisoners who are now with him.

The situation in Morocco gives cause for increasing anxiety. France has already 58,000 French troops in Morocco, of which 46,000 are in the western half, but the whole country from Fez to Marakesh is in a turmoil. Further reinforcements are proceeding from Casablanca. Native reports as to the release of the French prisoners have not been confirmed.

Reuter wires from Tangier on September 5th:—The French Commander has decided to advance to Marrakesh in spite of the risk he will thus cause the captured Frenchmen to incur. Although the Frenchmen were reported by the natives to have been released, it appears that they are still in El Hiba's hands. It is reported, however, that the Pretender's popularity is waning.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, August 18.

General Moinier, who is expected to spend several days at Marseilles, has been sent for to Paris by the Minister of War. He has come home on sick leave and has no intention of returning to Morocco, where he has been almost continuously for the last four years. Meanwhile his successor in command of the troops in Morocco has been appointed. He is general Franchet d'Esperey, who until now commanded the 28th Infantry Division of Chambery. General Franchet d'Esperey, who was born in 1856, has a remarkable record of distinguished service. He has 13 campaigns to his credit, most of them in Tonking. He has also been in China. His appointment is received with general approval.

According to telegrams from Toulon, General Lyautey has been summoned home in order to discuss the situation with the Government. The cruiser Jules Ferry is under orders to start for Morocco to-morrow evening, and will return with the Resident-General. Two fresh battalions of reinforcements will leave Toulon on 27th August and 15th September.

The special correspondent of the Temps at Tangier telegraphs that Mulai Yusef was proclaimed Sultan on August 13th. The letter announcing his accession to the Throne was read in the mosques at 9 o'clock in the morning of August 14th. Mulai Hafid, who is on board the British liner Macedonia, is expected to arrive at Marseilles on August 15th. M. de Billy, the French Diplomatic Agent at Tangier, has been appointed by the Government to be in attendance upon the ex-Sultan during his residence in France. Doubts are expressed in various quarters here as to the suitability of Tangier as his future place of residence and the point seems still undecided. "Accounts of conversations with General Moinier, who arrived yesterday at Marseilles on board the steamer Chanina, are published here. General Moinier is inclined to regard the situation in Morocco somewhat seriously. "Le gros point noir," in his opinion, is in the southern country round Marakesh, on which town it is known that the Pretender, El Hiba, is now marching. Telegrams from Marakesh state that El Hiba's prestige is daily growing and he is said to have some 50,000 men at his disposal, all well armed and equipped. It was hoped that an agreement which had been patched up between the two kais, El Glawi and Mtugi, might have led to their combined action against the Roghi of the South. Neither kaid, however, is willing to enter into conflict with such a powerful adversary and it has hitherto required all the French influence to prevent Mtugi from openly declaring himself in favour of the Pretender.

Abdication of Mulai Hafid.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, August 11.

THE native officials have been confidentially notified to-day that the Sultan Mulai Hafid has already carried out the formalities of his abdication, and that when he leaves Rabat, probably to-morrow, his abdication and the succession of his younger brother, Mulai Yusef, will be publicly announced. Mulai Yusef is now Viceroy.

It is just four years ago, on another August Sunday, that I was the sole European present at a great gathering of native officials and notables of Tangier, where, with semi-religious form and great enthusiasm, it was decided to proclaim Mulai Hafid as Sultan that same afternoon. He was recognized as the coming saviour of the country, whose strength of character, religious zeal and fervour, and surpassing intelligence would restore the fallen glories of the Moorish Empire. That afternoon, amidst the greatest rejoicings, which lasted for days, and the booming of cannon, Mulai Hafid was proclaimed Sultan.

To-day, another August Sunday, I have again been the only European at another gathering of the Tangier notables, many being the same men who were present at the gathering four years ago. With the exception of a few cynical remarks as to the past and hopes for more peaceful times in the future the announcement of Mulai Hafid's imminent abdication and the succession of Mulai Yusef was listened to with absolute indifference.

Mulai Hafid is expected to arrive at Gibraltar to-morrow night or Tuesday morning. He there intends to embark in the P. and O. liner Macedonia for Marseilles on his way to Vichy. His harem and servants will arrive here to-morrow and will remain in Tangier. Mulai Hafid will probably make the pilgrimage to Mecca before taking up his permanent residence at Tangier.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, August 11.

In the Times of June 12th I gave some account of a long correspondence which had passed between the French Office and Mulai Hafid on the subject of his abdication. On November 17th, 1911, the Sultan addressed elaborate communications to M. de Selves, then French Foreign Minister, in which he dealt hypothetically with the eventuality of his abdication "in consequence of weakness or lassitude," and asked for assurances both regarding the succession and regarding his future place of residence. He desired to be allowed to reside, as he put it, "either in the place where his heir was or elsewhere in the Moroccan Empire, or in any of the numerous towns situated in the French or other colonies or at Medina or in any other Islamic towns." When, early in the present year, M. Regnault arrived at Fez on a special mission in order to obtain the Sultan's assent to the French protectorate in accordance with the terms of the Franco-German Treaty of November, 1911, he gave Mulai Hafid explicit assurances regarding the eventuality of his abdication, and added that he might, if he thought fit, designate one of his sons as "heir-presumptive to the Shereefian Throne." General Lyautey, on his arrival in Fez as Resident-General, acting on instructions from M. Poincare, induced the Sultan to defer his intention of abdicating. But Mulai Hafid, after the revolt in the capital, insisted on proceeding to Rabat accompanied by M. Regnault, and there or in the neighbourhood of that port he has been residing since last June.

Mulai Yusef, who, it is understood, will be the new Sultan, is said to be a man of "moderation and piety" and well disposed towards France. He would co-operate with the French Resident-General, and he enjoys considerable prestige in the Muhammadan world.

There is no profession of regret in France at Mulai Hafid's prospective departure. The Journal des Debats recalls the fact that in 1908 he made himself the instrument of Germany and placed many difficulties in the path of France. It was at the instance of Germany that he was recognized as Sultan in succession to his brother, Abdul Aziz, whom he had driven from the Throne. But he successively deceived every one who had anything to do with him. He enjoyed no respect and commanded no devotion in the country, and his attitude during the revolt and massacres in Fez last April is described as having been cowardly. The only possible consequence of his abdication which causes much concern is that the discontented sections of the population of Morocco might endeavour to represent him in his retirement as the prisoner of France and endeavour to excite insurrectionary movements in his behalf. It will be remembered that an appeal of this kind was one of the methods employed at Fez in order to prepare the insurrection of last April.

With regard to the abandonment of Mulai Hafid's journey to Mecca, which, it appears, he wished to undertake before abdicating, the Temps suggests that the pilgrimage might have had undesirable consequences, not only in Morocco, but also in Algeria and Tunis, and that it might have prejudicially influenced the disposition of the Sultan himself. His abdication after the pilgrimage might have been regarded as a religious protest, and might have inflamed Mussalman fanaticism.

(FROM THE "TIMES" TANGIER CORRESPONDENT)

On Board S. S. Macedonia, August 14.

Mulai Hafid desires to inform The Times that the troublous period through which he has lately passed determined him to abandon the throne of Morocco. He feels that the new régime requires new men. His one desire and prayer is for the peace and prosperity of his country. He looks forward with great pleasure to the opportunity which his landing on French soil to-morrow will give him of expressing to the French Government and people his friendship and his thanks for all the sympathy and kindness shown to him.

Mulai Hafid arrived at Marseilles on board the Macedonia at 10 o'clock on the morning of the 15th August and was received by the Prefect of the Department, the Governor of Marseilles, and M. de Billy, the French Diplomatic Agent at Tangier, who has been appointed to be in attendance on the ex-Sultan during his residence in France. Mulai Hafid sat in a rocking chair and received the salutes of the officials with a slight bow. In reply to the Prefect's words of welcome Mulai Hafid said:—"I am very happy to hear the words of the representative of the French Government, and I rejoice to see France, to whom I owe much." Then, with a smile he shook hands with the Prefect—a gesture which he has only adopted since he ceased to be Sultan. His personal retinue consists only of 15 slaves and 12 servants. Mulai Hafid was then conducted ashore, where he was received with military honours, and to his hotel. He will arrive on 16th August or of 17th August at Vichy, where he will occupy numerous apartments at the Hotel Majestic.

The New Sultan.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, August 15.

The vague sense of depression regarding Morocco which is manifest in French public opinion at the present moment finds relief in the belief expressed by General Moinier that the situation will be much improved by the disappearance from the scene of Mulai Hafid. As for Mulai Yusef, it is recognised that he is not a particularly shining light, but it is believed that he is capable of inspiring confidence in his people and of co-operating loyally with France in the work of pacification and re-organization. His conduct during his tenure of the Khalifate of Fez has been entirely satisfactory.

Discussing the new Sultan—whom Mulai Hafid named as his successor in his letter of abdication, thereby avoiding the difficulty of an interregnum and enabling him to be proclaimed at once by the religious authorities as the legitimate sovereign—the Journal des Debats hopes that the Government will abstain from the mistake of conferring upon him a French decoration. In the case of both the previous Sultans the reception of honours was followed immediately by very regrettable events. Nor, it thinks, must there be any question of allowing Mulai Yusef to visit Paris.

Persia.

News of the Week.

A message to the Times from St. Petersburg on September 5th states that the British and Russian Governments have agreed to make another small loan to Persia.

Router wires from Teheran:—It is reported that Yar Mahomed Khan acting on instructions from Salar-ed-Daulah has seized the Customs House at Kermanshah.

Reuter wires from Teheran:—It is expected that the approaching visit of M. Sazonoff, the Russian Foreign Minister, to London will have important consequences with regard to the Anglo-Russian Convention.

The Trans-Persian Railway.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—Just as I am leaving London I see that you have opened a rather belated fire upon a speech that I made in the House of Lords on 15th July, more than three weeks ago, about the projected Trans-Persian Railway, accusing me of rhetorical exaggeration, and so forth.

Your present opinions are not, so far as I know, shared by any of those who are best qualified by experience and authority to speak on the matter, other than the few able writers who have converted you to their views. Ever since we had an external frontier in India our policy has been to save India as far as possible from direct contact with foreign Powers. This has not been a policy of selfish, or foolish, or old-fashioned isolation, but has been dictated by the highest considerations of economy, prudence, and national security. Continental railways in the long run involve continental frontiers, continental complications, continental burdens. If passengers and mails can be carried by an international railway to India, equally can soldiers and guns, and whatever the advantages, if any, it is not possible to contend that India will be as safe as before.

What reason, I ask, is there for building (largely with British or Indian money) a line to India that will thus weaken the security of India, will do no good to Great Britain, and be of very doubtful advantage to British or Indian trade? Anyone who heard the debate in the House of Lords could see that Lord Morley and Lord Crewe disliked the idea almost as much as myself (and are therefore, I suppose, equally open to your disapproval), but that the Government have been compelled to lend a Platonic support to the investigation of the scheme by the threat that if they did not some other Powers would do it in spite of them. In my view this was a brutum fulmen; but even supposing it to be otherwise, it does not provide a very sound or creditable reason for British co-operation.

You say that after advising the Government to hesitate a hundred times before taking such a step I added, "That was the opinion of India." I neither said nor even hinted anything of the sort. You have apparently taken these words from the exceedingly condensed report that appeared in the Times of July 16. I neither spoke them, nor anything like them, as the Parliamentary report will show. As I said in a recent debate, it is impossible to speak in general terms of the opinion of India about anything, and I assuredly should not have been so foolish as to predicate it about a subject of which 999 out of every 1,000 of the Indian population must be profoundly ignorant. So far as I can judge from a perusal of the Indian Press, the majority of the English newspapers are suspicious or hostile, and the native newspapers, as a rule, entirely hostile. But the argument is one that I did not use then and refrain from using now.

You express surprise that I doubt the advantage to Persia of the proposed railway, and you actually quote, in support of your argument, some phrase that I once employed about the beneficence and unifying influence of railways in India. Do you really contend that there is any analogy between the two—between a country with 315 millions of people, a bountiful trade, and an ordered Government, and a country whose entire population is less than ten millions, which consists for the most part of deserts interspersed with bare oases, and the Government of which is in a state of such hopeless collapse that it cannot even keep order on the few highways, and is in almost hourly danger of complete dissolution? I can imagine railways which might do good, even now, to Persia, but they would not be on the alignment or with the objects of the Trans-Persian scheme.

But surely the question ought to be asked, do the Persian Government or the Persian nation want this railway, that, according to you, is to confer upon them such blessings? Have they asked for it? Are they behind the project? As I write there is before me the letter of the Persian correspondent of the Near East, dated Teheran, July 4. This is what he says:—

The Trans-Persian Railway scheme is again the absorbing topic. With the exception of those who expect to benefit directly by the consummation of the proposals, the labours of the Société d'Études excite but little enthusiasm amongst the native population here, while there are many who regard the scheme with suspicion and consider it as another step in the direction of absorption. The sanction of Persia will have to be obtained under pressure, for it is no exaggeration to say that the bulk of Persian opinion is opposed to it, whilst it is just as true to state that the most popular scheme here is that which will satisfy in large measure her present needs.

If this be the attitude of Persia, why should we join in forcing upon her a railway that she does not want, and which she rightly thinks will rivet upon her the fetters of foreign domination—all the more so that we have not even the selfish excuse of thinking that it will be of any benefit to ourselves? Such a policy is to me inexplicable, and seems to rest upon no foundation either of expediency or statesmanship.

But really what are the practical chances of the railway being made, at any rate in an early future? You quote the Secretary of State for India as saying that not a rupee of Indian money is likely to be spent upon it. Do you imagine for a moment that Great Britain will find the money or give the guarantees? And, if not, who is to do so? Are we to contemplate a railway being made to India, through territories under our influence or protection, where not actually under our rule, by money raised on the Continent of Europe (for there is none in Persia)? Would any British Government be found to acquiesce in such a solution?

For this reason, not least, I deprecate official encouragement being given to a project that appears to me certain not merely to do harm, if carried out, but to cause international friction and annoyance if, as seems to me more probable, it is foredoomed to failure.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CURZON OF KEDLESTON.
